CHAPTER ONE.

CHAPTER ONE.

EXPERIENCES OF VIOLET AND HER SISTERS DURING THE FRIGHTFUL BATTLE OF MINA KONIDA ON THE MOUNTAINS NEAR N. N. N.

Violet alone on a spying expedition stole her way through the early March darkness that brooded over the street of one of the enemy encampments. Her eyes cautiously searched the shadows intently watching clipped tightly the automatic in the side pocket of her gray uniform coat. The silence was ominous made all the more so by the wild sounds that came from various other parts of the Mandelstian encampments, outside of where Christian Arabians the day before had been "mopping" up on all suspecting Mandelstian patrol scouts. A great battle was threatening. Now and again Violet heard the spangling to ports of rifles through the darkness and the thin whispering stream of men whose bodies met the laden slugs of death. Her face was very grim. Even Christian soldiers under cover of darkness could shoot with impunity blaming the darkness of the night if their mutterings did not yield any one whose death might become an international incident. Violet was something from the untimely hour at which she had made Minna a hot season that past year moved on swiftly never to return.

It was nine o'clock at night and she had been over an hour in reaching this dismal company street where she was to meet her sister Jennie Vivian.
And she saw a strange red glare in the sky which seemed to her an open doorway to an ugly looking tent. Here she knew she was to find her sister. The reader may know by now that Violet and her sisters were brave and adventurous, and as no one else knew how to do it they and even Penrod had engaged themselves to take part in a dangerous mission. Tim also had accepted to go with them and the exact nature of the mission he was to learn from Violet and her sisters within the very few hours; when he met them there. Violet herself reached the open door of the ugly tent just as Tim came up. He and she peered in and discovered that it entered a house by means of a door and that beyond was thick darkness.

There was no sound nothing to indicate a living presence not a sign of her sister or Penrod. Violet drew out her gun, hesitated for an instant and then followed by Tim stepped stepped silently ahead through the door. She had taken a few steps forward when she and Tim paused as his foot touched something soft on the floor. Carefully he drew a flashlight from his pocket.

The white disc of light gleamed upon a dead soldier. He was uniformed as a Mandelstian but his feet were a Christian. Rayonets had ripped his body to shreds. Violet's heart hammered with more excitement than Tim's did.

This she realized explained why there was no one at the designated secret meeting place. Evidently the spy rendezvous had been discovered by the enemy and whether Jennie or Penrod had been captured or had escaped was a question that she could not attempt to answer and she felt saddened and off at mid.

Tim himself swung around as he heard a very slight sound behind Violet.

The light in his hand gleamed upon a tanned face with a square topped hat in which blue eyes glittered malignantly upon an upraised hand. A rayonet swished through the air, and as it did so Tim hurried Violet gently but suddenly to one side. The hand that held the automatic flashed down caught the Mandelstian soldier a hard and killing blow on the head with the heavy barrel. Tim did not dare to fire the gun for there was no telling how many others might have entered the company street. The man dropped to the floor of the room as the automatic crashed down again and Violet followed suit with her heels.

Then Tim turned the beam light on the still figure. He was sure that this Mandelstian soldier had followed them--it was possible that there were others who knew that he and Violet, and her sisters were within the Mandelstian encampments. But he and Violet had come here to meet Jennie Vivian and her sisters and Penrod--that they make some contact with the police and his sister's was vital.

Swiftly Tim and Violet left the house. They hurried back toward the far end of the street moving as silently as possible through the darkness and muttering prayers for success. Then abruptly he paused cautioned Violet and they both ducked into the shadows as they heard the pattering of swiftly running feet. They both waited tensely, their automatics ready. An instant later a tall figure loomed against the light-gray gray that was the entrance to the dismal street. Tim uttered a startled exclamation as he realized it was a fellow for a foreigner who approached him who was not disguised either. The new arrival drew closer, and Tim alone stepped out of the shadows.

"Wait!" he said sharply in English. The man came to a stilling stop as he recognized what he thought was an American boy within the Glandelinian encampments. "Who are you boy, and what are you an American doing within these camps?" he asked.

"I'm not an American. I'm an Abbiannian boy spy, but I can speak English. I'm Tim O'Connell. You?"

"John O'Connell." The voice was that of a high descent. "We'd better get out of here. The Glandelinians were after me."

"Why?" asked Tim tersely.

"I'm Frank Walter's secretary. The Glandelinians suspected Mr. Walter's of being a spy and sending information to the Christian lines through the Vivian girls."

"They got him then?" demanded Tim.

"Yes. Broke into his house tonight, shot him and ripped the place to pieces with bayonets and set the ruins on fire. It was horrible--ghastly. I managed to escape with his little daughter before she actually knew what happened. The Vivian girls are here at large too and the Glandelinians are looking for them high and low. They raided their headquarters somewhere in this camp but they escaped with their brother."

The customary reverence among the Abbiannians was forgotten in this situation of terror, where all foreigners become allies. Instinctively the man and the boy trusted each other.

"Where is the little girl now?"

"Hidden on the outskirts of the town, but we'll have to get away from here as soon as possible."

Then the man passed at the boy.

"What are you doing here?"

"Scared out of my mind. I'm here and he's sister's!" asked Tim.

"Of course, of course," O'Connell listened for a moment--there was no sound of pursuit.

"The house's windows of them being little girls and possessed, and who hoped to crush wicked Glandelinia and establish a part of the Abbiannian empire in Glandelinia states."

"Well, and one of their sister's came here to meet them," said Tim. "Then I reached the place, found no one there but a dead soldier."

"Did you what please?" asked O'Connell.

"I've got to try and find Penrod and his sister's for Violet & she'll worry terribly," said Tim quietly. He thought rapidly for a moment. "Meanwhile you had better get the little girl. I'll meet you two miles below Glandelinia station, toward the river."

"Right," O'Connell swung around and soon disappeared. Tim stood for a moment watching and listening. Far in the distance the sound of rifle fire continued steadily and more vividly. He signalled to Violet who joined him and they both advanced slowly toward the intersecting company street praying fervently all the while not for themselves but for the safety of her sister's and Penrod. Just as they reached it his foot struck a block of wood and he fell tripping forward on his face bringing Violet down on top of him.

The fall saved their lives for a Glandelinian rifle boomed like a dynamite explosion from somewhere across the company street. They saw the flame of it headed the bullet thud into the wall of a tent behind them. They were up on their feet running in not more than a second. They plunged back down the dark length of the company street it being useless to try and find some further trace of Jennie Vivian and her sister's or Penrod now though Violet was distressed and almost weeping. The Glandelinians were too hot on their trail.

Jennie's orders had been for Tim to come and join her brother and sister's without fail, there to await further orders if he were unable to make contact her and her sister's. His task in this part of the Glandelinian camps, the tone of the communication had left no doubt as to the importance.

Tim and Violet had to get to the left wing of the camp, and perhaps at the same time he might be able to assist O'Connell in getting the little Imperial girl a place of comparative safety until he could get her to the Christian lines. He and Violet rushed on, then slowed their pace as they glided silently in among the shadows at the far end of the company street. Suddenly a loud and clear Glandelinian bugle blared behind them. Glandelinians blew bugles in the same tone as bugles do in the United States Army.

The same in the Abbiannian Army, but the bugles of the Glandelinians have a different sound or tone and are louder. Penrod was grinning and increased his pace holding Violet by the hand as he did so. The Glandelinians were a tipping their hands that they were after them. They had no intention to allow him or Violet to live to report their activities. However his connection with the other P.T. increased and their brother had undoubtedly been brought to their attention, and knowing Violet or Tim couldn't be captured they decided to kill them on the spot. Then a strange sound came from directly ahead. It was the same plaintive plaintive wailing of some thing that sounded like a Chinese flute. Instantly Tim momentarily revived tales he had heard from Penrod of how in Chicago certain Chinese could communicate messages by means of the flute of five notes. No foreigner could understand how, and but few Chinese, for to learn the code one must be an expert in the Chinese classics. Tim didn't understand how it could be sounded within a Glandelinian encampment but there it was. One day for the fun of it he meant to find out. He supposed that the book of changes held some sort of key to the plaintive sounds of the musical instrument. The sound almost unnerved Violet, and she shivered shivered.

That flute was indeed a signal and the proof of it was that the next instant a flute answered over to the left and much closer. The flutists might be friends to him and Violet, or it might be Penrod who may have learned it as he once said, but Tim or Violet couldn't be too sure of that. It was very possible that the flutists or Penrod might have some such method of communicating with their spy agents secure in the knowledge that the Glandelinians wouldn't understand. But with the Tim or Violet had no way of verifying their guess. The players might well be Glandelinians who may understand the notes. He dashed on followed by Violet on hearing the pursuit gathering behind them get underway. He spared a second for a thought of O'Connell, wondering if the brave foreigner would get through. The bugle was answered from dead ahead, then from the left then from the right proof to Tim and Violet, that they were being hemmed in. He gritted his teeth and went forward. But now he and also Violet carried their automatic pistols.

In their hands their muzzles to the fore. A sudden hot wind rose and the bugles shrilled nearer.

There came the sound of heavy soldiers' feet he knew slugging through the dry dust. Commands from some Glandelinian officer rang through the night. They could also hear very excited words from the interior of some tents among which he and Violet passed. He feared to the left wing Violet on to miss contacting what he guessed by the sound to be a Glandelinian encampment patrol. Then they darted back on their original bearings.

There was a high white house to his right. A light glowed at the gate of the house's entrance compound for a moment, then blinked out blown out by the strong wind. Having Violet still by the hand Tim bore more to the right. At a dead turn they crossed a broad encampment thoroughfare, and vanished again among the tents. But a hail of bullets hammered at them just as they disappeared. Had they had ten paces further to go the Glandelinians surely would have got him and Violet. They increased their stride. He was breathing heavily, Violet was not, which showed she could endure running more than he, but he nevertheless felt queerly light and agile too was tempted to turn back.

His conclusions with the foe camp patrol, but Violet decided against such a foolhardy proceeding, and urged him frantically ahead. A bugle blared almost in their faces as they rounded a corner and ran squarely into four Glandelinian soldiers who cursed and swore and even blasphemed. They were Scotchmen by the shape and size of them and both children caught the very vibrant gleam of light on cold steel. With sudden bayonets they waited to be close them crying out to "surround us," but Tim and Violet knew their bayonet stuff. They had even taught it themselves. They didn't even pause. Both Violet and Tim hurried themselves forward.

A bayonet lunged at Tim. The attacker made no sound save that which his heavy feet drew from the ground. The weapon was aimed at Tim's throat, he shot his right hand across his body his own body, striking its palm against the steel blade deflecting the aim so that the savage point slipped past his left side. The impetuous of the assailant carried him directly against Violet after he missed his bayonet thrust, and the little girl struck him twice with swings surety with the muzzle of her automatic to make sure.

Both boys crashed home with telling force to the skull of the assailant. The Glandelinian went down, Tim whistled. The other three Glandelinians were attacking from either side. Ten paces away the blugler was fleeing blowing his bugle frantically as he ran, calling calling for help. Tim stopped suddenly as Violet downed a second man leaving him only two to deal with. The two Glandelinian soldiers estimating their forward speed instinctively had timed to catch the two children as they passed between them. Tim or Violet could have shot them then.

as they stood, but the blanking back of the automatics would have revealed their position in the darkness. The men almost drove their bayonets into each other, but he alkized the blonde in time and halted the reflexed motions. Then they realized nothing whatever for the fatal battle of both children struck again simultaneously--and struck with all the force of their command. The two Glandelinian soldiers fell against each other and their red-tipped bayonets driven deeply into the dust. As they crashed forward the two rifles quivered up and down on the tips. Violet and Tim considered for a brief moment, then taking each rifle along one over their shoulders so that it was behind each and only their weight was against their backs. The shouts and curses of the persecutors were now very close and they were blaming a each other too because the fugitives escaped.

Tim grinned to himself. He knew well that what he and Violet had done would be an excellent excuse in any international chancery to explain their "death" but they didn't plan to lose sleep over that. They must get on. Putting the rifles into position they took up the trail again. Tents were scarcer now proof that they were approaching the end of this part of the encampment. Once out in the open, the Glandelinians would have an excellent opportunity of downing him and Violet with bullets, but they had to take that risk and they prayed harder than ever. They didn't even hesitate. Nevertheless Tim was enjoying himself hugely. He and Violet had at least an equal chance with their desperate persecutors. They were so many he could handle them without trouble, but Violet couldn't. She was too excited and the sounds they couldn't help making drowned out from their ears any he and Violet might have made. The set up to a bux adventure was perfect. Endless excitement excitement was absolutely certain. They ran out into the open as signaling. Perseus was still among the tents. Then he stumbled fell headlong bringing Violet with him whom he still had by the hand and they both fell into a deep gully.

In bottom when they reached it finally was something staggering to rent of water. Water was up to their hips when he first struggled to his feet and helped Violet to rise dripping and almost crying.

He had bumped his head on a stone and it hurt awfully. Tim considered for a moment. The Glandelinians when they reached this spot would believe they had managed somehow to float downstream. Instead the force he turned and slouched his way up stream bringing Violet with him, each walking swiftly keeping within the edge of the stream to hide their foot prints. He and Violet also inspected the rifles they had captured and the automatics too, but the water did not wait them through some reason. Now the important thing was to get clear away. They rounded a bend in the gully just as the Glandelinians reached the place where the two children had fallen. They stopped, stared intently about and then looked down into the gully. Tim almost held his breath as he stood with water whirling and swirling about his hips while Violet stooped, both keeping motionless so as not to be betrayed by their whereabouts.

Slowly commands rang out. The Glandelinian soldiery started up and down stream content with their expectations. Tim and Violet nevertheless waited silently to see if any of those ordered up stream on the off chance they had gone that way would come up close enough to see them. His keen eyes watching the sky line for the first warning shape of his enemies. Five minutes passed and they did not appear to come closer but soon went out of sight. Violet's shout had almost died away with distance down stream.

They then waded across the stream the swirling water rushing up to their shoulders in the center and almost sucking them under. With the greatest difficulty they clambered out on the opposite bank (not bank) both soaked to the skin, with water cascading from their clothing, and shivering about in their shoes.

Then satisfied that they were safe for the time being at last, they started forward bearing to their right to contact with the same railroad line they had crossed in the past. The raid some days before. They were aided in this by the lights of a train pulling into the enemy's camp station from the direction of battle toward Ophelia. All the two children had to do was keep going straight ahead. The lights of the station were a beacon to show them absolutely where they would strike the tracks, but never once did the two brave children grow careless. Their eyes were keenly alert to every thing against the sky, their ears keen for every sound. At the end of an exhausting hour they reached the railroad embankment. Putting they flung themselves down. Finally they heard furtive sounds mere shades of voices. One was the voice of a man, the other that of a frightened little girl.

"O Connel," cried Tim guardedly. His automatic was to the fore ready to spit bullets--at the slightest suspicious sounds if those voices were only prisoners of approaching Glandelinians. Some one gasped.

"Tim O Connel."

"Yes indeed?" said Tim with relief, recognizing the voice of the American. "This way."

A man and a little girl approached him while Violet and Tim watched warily for fear of other enemies sneaking up behind them. A man appeared taller than usual men appeared through the smoky mark, and then a hand a little childish hand came out grasping that of O Connel. O Connel exclaimed at the cold touch of the automatic. The second figure the size of a nine year old male child like a small ghost beside O Connel. The Irish American spoke meaningly.

"This is the little girl. I'm making myself as possible for her until I can get her safely to the Christian lines. I did not tell her anything about her father's death yet." He spoke in Abbeismian to Tim so the little girl could not understand for he was loath to see the grief that would follow at the news of her father's death. And too Tim was not recon recognized the warning in O Connel's voice. The American had not told the little girl of her father's brutal slaying by the Glandelinians, and Tim gasped under his breath. His own way would have been to tell her at once and get a harsh duty over with. But perhaps this was the best as usually a grief to a little girl would be somewhat difficult to manage, and the little girl too would be buoyed up by anticipation if she did not know the truth--anticipation that she would soon see join her father. Tim and Violet considered her while from the long brown curls she howled under the large girl like hat she wore. He wasn't sure he but he believed she was younger than nine. He put his automatic into his belt to take her hand. It was cold to his touch in spite of the hot weather caused by the distant forest fires.

"I'm scared," she said, and her tone was not steady. "That Mr O Connel is afraid to tell me where something happened to father or not. Something inside tells me that dad has been hurt. There have been whistles against him, stories that he sides with Abbeismian--against Glandelinia. But I'm believing because Mr O Connel wants me to believe and because I have to if I'm to be safe."

Tim only grunted.

"Well we'll have to keep moving," he said shortly. "Toward Ophelia if we can get the relief we're traveling at top speed we should be able to make it before morning and get a train out."

He had instantly resolved to get the little girl out and into the Christian line lines proper before going on with his work. To see her safely out of his danger zone one became a word less agreement between the American and himself. Tim led the way at a rapid rapid walk. Reaching the tracks they stepped briskly along toward Ophelia feeling in the dark for the ties. The little frightened girl did not complain but her breathing was labored within the first half hour. Tim hardened his heart necessarily to sympathy if she were allowed to rest or if the little expedition slowed down to accommodate her the chances of escape from these desperate Glandelinians would be impossible. They might all be killed or be discovered far from any refuge from cover when day broke over the war torn country. And the little girl understood, for she offered no protest and walked steadily on with them, head high, between Tim, Violet and the Foreigner. After an hour had passed her small hand clutched forward at the American's sleeve. She was making a game fight, and Tim had been astonished at himself that he had not in his excitement thought to again offer Violet the aid of his hand. But he had had so many things to think about. He spoke tersely over his shoulder to the American.

"Got any Glandelinian money?"

"About thirty thousand dollars I should say."

"Good. Bribery is often effective in this section of the country." They had definitely left that part of the camp behind them but they were reaching a notion of it that was just as dangerous and yet it still seemed to them as if it was as far as away as the moon. They seemed to be making no progress at all though they were traveling as rapidly with the two girls as they would have been able to travel without them. Tim found he couldn't blame the new little girl for their seeming malice, but he lengthened his stride and stride a little nevertheless. He tightened on his sleeve her only hint that she had discovered his increase in pace and wondered how a boy his size could walk almost faster than the man.

"Say Tim?" protested the soldier who'd negated the "Can't we slow down a bit?"

"The little girls you know."

"The girls after me and my little girl friend here (indicating Violet) and probably you too by now and yet my girl friend comes first" said Tim decisively. "We can't wait time. He'll have to stand up under it."

"But maybe she won't be able to. He's not used to this sort of rough walking."

"Then we'll take turns carrying her. We sure have got to travel if we want to save both little girls, and before all other's Violet comes first in my esteem."

"Don't worry about me," said the little girl spiritedly. "I can keep up as well as you three can."

"Why me before the others?" said Violet. "Every body is our equal despite my rank. Rank put no matter what you esteem if of me or my sisters you will never succeed in spoiling us."

"I had to hear it," said Tim. "More has been done for you and your sisters than anybody else and yet you're more good and unselfish than even I'm some times a little afraid of you and your sisters, Violet. You seem so super natural in goodness."

Violet laughed, and this showed there was high courage in her when she should laugh in such peril. Something clutched at his heart as he caught the note in that laughter. Violet and her sisters only feared sin. You could hold a man in front of any of them, and then she would only gently take it from you and liberate it. As he succeeded here, he allowed himself to think very serious thoughts--of the sort of little girls who would accompany a man and boy who probably would go to the end of the country to stick his nose into deadly danger for the sake of their country's cause. Though Coward in Abbie Annia were found in Germany, yet it never was yet found amongst those of Americans yet, no matter what Nationality they represented, and some how his picture of such little girls fitted not only Violet, but the other little girl who clung to his sleeve and fought her way over the ties.

It must have been close to four o'clock in the morning when they made out the large river between Ophelia and Hamberlane, and walked unhesitatingly out onto the trestle. How indeed they were excellent targets for Glandelinian marks men--and the Glandelinians would certainly be guarding this bridge.

But they could never cross the river at this spot otherwise because though it was not deep its bed was such sort of quicksand that a light weight stick of wood would not take long in disappearing.

"To cross the bridge has to be done. Better be killed by bullets than perish in that miserable way, and too Tim could scarcely believe it when they reached the other side safely. Either the Glandelinians forgot to have the bridge guarded or maybe some of the guards shirked their duty. Then as one of the four swung down to the right and crouched under the embankment as loud voices came to them through the black mark showing evidently that it must be some Glandelinian patrol which were coming toward the bridge, had they been even a minute more on the trestle they would certainly have been challenged. Tim let his breath out explosively then caught and held it when Violet's hand clasped his arm convulsively. He patted the hand. The Glandelinian patrol slowly went passed looking in every direction as if they were themselves afraid of being attacked in the dark. Tim finally whispered the word to go to continue.

They kept below the embankment until they reached the first ten in the largest section of the cities of encampments. From ahead there drifted back to them the clamor of whistles and shrill protesting bells of locomotives. Tim began to shape the plan in his mind very rapidly. With money money or by force the thing could be worked. They skirted the main part of the Glandelinian encampments to avoid the sentries and pickets, the railroad going through the encampments, and they came out beyond the encampment station/ which was however only a very high and long tent. Then Tim drew his three companions close.

"We've got to get out and get through to Ophelia Mr O Connell," he said. "We might wait here for ever for a train. I've got a good plan. That train on the main track is headed for Hamberlane also in possession of a vast part of this enormous Glandelinian army. We'll get to it somehow, uncouple the locomotive and tender, then take possession of the locomotive. We'll high ball out. If we get caught,--well we'll have to risk it, and there's the chance too that we might meet with another train. What do you think?"

"A train pulls into Ophelia from here about two hours from now," objected Mr O Connell promptly. "Unless Glandelinians have drastically changed the schedules, which I don't seem likely because of the conditions of the rail road lines in their possession. We are bound to meet that train even if we get away with you plan. I And heaven only days lad who's going to amongst us operate a locomotive, one of us even know the makings of a railroad engine. Therefore it won't do us any good."

"I'd like to see the rail road engine if my sisters cannot operate or explain all the different parts," said Violet. "If Tim wishes the plan through I'll run it."

The men didn't doubt her word. He had heard of Violet and her sisters and he believed if they would run run the air if it stopped.

"And it will at least put a big distance between us and the foe who are pursuing us," Tim brushed aside of the danger. "The only way they can stop us is by pursuit only slowing up the track ahead of us. When we meet the other train we'll start the locomotive bucking up, jump off and proceed from there."

the best way we know how. We must find a place where we'll not Violet's sisters and brother for Violet believes she knows where they have gone to." The other little girl did not demur, nor did the man protest any further, as being a great boy scout leader Tim was the head of the party now.

Tim again led the way, keeping the train between themselves, and the lights beyond the station. They reached the train followed along its length toward the locomotive.

Behind the tender Tim fiddled noiselessly with the coupling for a moment, came back to whisper to Mr O Connell and Violet;

"All set, be ready for anything. When we start out there'll be as they say in other countries "Hell" to pay."

The American chuckled. The two girls gasped. Time eyes were glowing with excitement in the darkness--which had not yet been lifted or been freed from the endless down pour of rain that had now started. They stood under the cab. Beyond the rearway the Glandelinian engine and fire man were standing in the cab door, looking back as if awaiting signals. Tim went into the caboose with a leap. He had drawn his automatic, and now three muzzles pushed out against the backs of the Glandelinians. Violet herself spoke softly to them.

"Get off this cab instantly my friends to rise the alarm and you're dead," she hissed. "Turn around slowly. I'll operate this engine and if you make a noise we'll kill you both instantly. If it's fair to kill children as you say it's fair to kill you too."

The men froze. They hesitated for a heart breaking moment, and Tim knowing the unusual Glandelinians indifference to death was afraid that one or both of them would cry out a warning and therefore knocked them senseless with the butt of his pistol.

"We have already uncoupled," said Tim to Violet. "You and your sisters do know how to operate engines for often you ran off with one. All we need to do is start going."

Violet took her place at the lever. The cabs wheels squealed as the throttle was opened and the engine sought for traction under the spinning of her huge drivers. The locomotive began to move with her usual loud "choof, choof, choof, choof" and gathered head up head up headway, but the loud choof, choof of its small smoke stack as it aroused Glandelinians from somewhere who noticed the engine pulling off alone. Shots and bullets came from behind them, the bullets hammering onto the cab.

Violet, and the three others knew they were taking chances, but they didn't even look around. The locomotive gathered speed. Tim looked back. Another locomotive was being switched onto the main line not to connect with the train but to start in pursuit and it had a coach attached loaded with armed soldiers. Then that part of the camp was lost in the dark behind them. The cab itself was rocking and rolling from side to side as the speed increased to terrific proportions. Tim led the other little girl into the tender. He took of his coat and made a seat for her on the coal, out of the fire man's way for Mr O Connell was now the fire man. Then he stood watch near the cab with one of the automatics in his hand. The locomotive seemed literally to jump ahead.

Tim looked out of the cab first on one side, then the other, watched for signs of obstructions ahead. But nothing met his gaze except a wall of rain and the smooth track stretching before them. It was now five in the morning and a southeast wind was blowing adding a smoke fog to the rain. Tim hoped it wasn't raining in the forest fire region or otherwise there would be smoke for so fierce and hot were the fires that an all day downpour like cats and dogs would not put it out but only make dense clouds of smoke that would darken the skies over the whole nation. Their escape seemed now to be suicidal, but Tim grinned contentedly.

Satisfied at the moment that everything was running smoothly, Tim dropped back and spoke frankly to Violet who was at the throttle but she sweetly motioned him away saying;

"Tim dear please don't bother me when I'm at the throttle. My mind now must be entirely on my work or we'll be in a crash."

Tim then politely went to the man who spoke frankly to the boy.

"All right me lad dish the dirt. What brought you and the little Princess into such dangerous territory?"

"Frankly I'm one of the heads of the boy and girl scouts, engaged by the brother of these fair princesses on a very special war mission. I won't give you the details of that mission for I won't know anything about them myself any way until I finally reach the Prince and his other sisters. But I do know it is very vital for me and Princess Violet to be present at the meeting they are going to have. Though they left the place where I expected to see them first, do know where they have gone and am going thither. How long have you Americans been out here?"

"Five months and two weeks," said O Connell.

Then you know a lot of what is going on your self. Are you sir a mere refugee or are you in our service."

"I'm not in the service I'm really a refugee but I'd like to see any one dare tell me, don't know what is going on. That is why those glandelinians are so hot after me."

"All right sir spill it."

"Well this territory is a hot bed of war troubles. If there's a big battle in the offing it'll start somewhere soon on the Mic-Whither or Mic-Whi-ther Run grounds. Everything surely is for it, nothing against it and military Glandelinia wants to cut through here to cut through the main territory so the main Glandelinian army can escape from Big Girl Knool, which Emperor Vivian won't let him do. Now the whole world knows that Emperor Vivian is not a retreating man. That trick will Manley do is a puzzle. He wants other generals to do everything for him but does nothing himself. He sends other hat peg grade Glancy but he doesn't come yet. If he comes and strikes here look out. Glancy is a dangerous man. Only the Vivians can lick him."

"No doubt of that said Tim. But supposing they couldn't. Hanson almost got it at Lebanon. Well go on."

"Almost anything may happen even at Emperor Vivian's headquarters" said O Connell. "Of course all Abbissianians are guarding the Emperor as though he were the most precious jewel, but his daughters are in greater peril than he is. I'll tell you violet, and her sisters have to take every conceivable precaution against assassination."

"Why'll thought he was in greater danger than they were."

"The answer seems fairly obvious doesn't it? They don't. The Glandelinians don't want him killed, because they'd rather make him suffer by the deaths of his little brave daughters."

"Is there a chance that an attempt on them will be made?"

Tim knew there had often been a chance for the foe, was more than half certain that was why Prince Penrod wanted him at the council, for him could better than Jack Evans even prevent anything wrong happening to them, but he wanted to learn all he could from O Connell.

"There's always a possibility when the Vivian girls die so much." The American said. "Violet and her sisters are such a peril to the Glandelinian Government and its cause that the Glandelinians are taking no chances. If those little girls are angel possessed as it is said, do you think the angels could save them."

"They have so far why not now." said Tim. "And who in the world besides the nutty Manleys would also wish to kill them."

"The Omarian Glandelinians for one thing. They almost got the Vivian girls on certain occasions, because they couldn't stand their efforts against the Glandelinian cause any longer. And they are not fooled now. And if Emperor Vivian their father becomes victorious all along this immense territory, and his brother Hanson, Vivian decides to push on and step into Mic-Whi-ther run and take over, Glandelinia will be right back where she was in 1912 and chances to even win the war will then be small. Emperor Vivian has plenty of dangerous Glandelinian enemies and so have his daughters."

"But if Glandelinia killed him or the Vivian Girls, Abbissiania would make dreadfully drastic reprisals. I'd shudder for Glandelinia had as she is."

"But Abbissiania is not a revengeful nation."

"Oh no. I agree like this I'll say she is. The destruction of Abbissian is avenged. All destruction is being repaired by Glandelinian soldiers prisoners under the bayonet and lash. And not a cent do they get for the work either and their food is just what they can expect to get. Log house way into the night. Serves them right. He who does treachery must be punished."

The merri can paused for a moment in thought.

"Even though you're quite a bright boy scout me lad, you are overlooking something" he said. "So cleverly are Glandelinian spies that one can't tell the difference from even for a moment in thought. Even this cab may have ears that comprehend English. The Glandelinian Government could secretly hire a good pay some wicked foreigner to assassinate the Vivian Girl princesses or their father, and if that sort of plan was carried out you may rest assured that Glandelinia will not shoulder the blame."

O Connell left it there for Tim to draw his own conclusions. Tim's mind raced over the possibilities.

"Then General Concentinian Aronburg is watching every move that these Glandelinian armies will make with anxious eyes." Went on O Connell. "If Emperor Vivian establishes his strongest military army here his next step will be one of aggression toward Glandelinia. If any one of the Vivian girls will be one of aggression toward Glandelinia. If any one of the Vivian girls princesses dies that will be delayed, delays that will give the Glandelinian armies time to prepare. The Manleys are afraid of the Vivians, Glancy ain't."

Glancy ain't afraid of the devil even. But Concentinian Aronburg is determined to thwart that attempt on Manley's part if possible and had many patrol roles in disguise out watching from what direction General John Quimble Glancy will come from. If he advances Concentinian Aronburg will strike him at Casa de Rosa if possible."

"Why?"

"Concentinian Aronburg no more wishes to let Glancy come near Lebanon than Emperor Vivian does. If Glancy finds a chance to move in with his invincible Glandelinian armies, a battle may result which no one wishes for. The battle may be too severe."

"So far so good. If spies are working on them they'll all face certain execution if caught. My reason why Glancy would like to assassinate the Emperor or the Vivian girls."

"Yes. Because he wishes to get even for the defeat he blames them for at Lebanon. He decided to get Glandelinians to disguise as and pretend to be foreigners, do the assassination and cause the Emperor to be so grief stricken that he'll be discouraged and abandon his attempt upon the Big Girl Knool territory where he has been ever since the titanic struggle there last November."

"Suppose" said Tim slowly "That Glandelinia for all her desire to see the destruction of the Vivian Girls, should herself conspire to hire international spies to have them conspire behind the scenes to assassinate Violet or her sisters in such a way as to lay the blame on Abbissiania in order to have an excuse to advance armies into the middle of Calvernia, or on Glandelinia state in order to spread the war the other way toward the Angelina Gathia, or in order in some way, to force the war progress through Angelina State."

"All I can say to that" said O Connell "Is that Glandelinia vigorously denied all evil intentions toward the Abbissian Emperor or his daughters. Glandelinia even now blames it on Jealous Abbissianians disguised as Glandelinians. And God knows it is not so. One never knows what Glandelinia will do."

Tim was silent for a moment. He knew that in the turbulent maelstrom which whirled through Calvernia the names of Emperor Vivian and Violet and Violet and her sisters and now also Penrod were whispered by those who understood the awful chaotic conditions as "Man and children of Abbissian Holy Destiny." There was true Abbissian blood in their veins, and he dreamed of forcing Glandelinia into exile for Her Treason and re-establishing the old empire there. Therefore any amount of people would be sure that Emperor Vivian or his daughters would not even be harmed.

Tim turned to enter the tender to see how the little rescued girl was getting on. As though his turning had been a signal a frightful scream came from her lips and she started to shriek and cry like a frightened terrified little girl. Violet couldn't turn she had to keep her mind and sight on what she was doing. O Connell had seen to his feet but Tim had leaped past him. A huge Glandelinian soldier was just coming down over the coal, leaping toward the little girl with bayonet fixed in his face in the mark was ghastly, fiendish. Tim took in the situation instantly, knew how it surely had happened. This soldier, somehow had noticed what had happened back at the camp station, and had grabbed the tender as it pulled out. He was a big man palpably a native of Scotland, where they grow them big. He had watched his opportunity and as now preparing to strike a blow for Glandelinia. He had planned to slay the two little girls first, then get the man and boy. Only his turning, her frightened scream and crying had tripped the would be killer up.

O Connell's automatic was the first to go off, it spat flame and bullets. The lead ripped and tore at the brazen uniformed covered chest of the soldier. The man's mouth went ludicrously open. His rifle clattered into the coal which slide back and forth in a strange black ferment with the wild motion of the tender. The Glandelinian soldier fell on his face and slid down in a huddled heap almost at the feet of the little girl. O Connell jumped past the dead man to the top of the coal heap looking back to see whether there were any more Glandelinians on the tender in hiding. But there were none--and but for a stroke of luck the whole passenger list of three children and men and men might now have been dead.

O Connell came back.

"Look the other way" he snapped at the little girl. She turned the other way covering her face with her hands. O Connell dragged the body of the Glandelinian soldier into the cab, dumped it out, watched it strike the steps and bounce into the gloom. He rubbed his hands on his handkerchief, and returned to the little girl. She was standing again at the swaying side of the tender, below the pile of coal looking very sick. As Tim who was closest stared at her, she swayed toward him. His arms encompassed her. He barged against him, her face against his wet shirt.

Well he scarcely blamed this little girl for fainting. "His own heart had gone numb for a split second when he had seen that monster come over the coal. But O Connell's hand had worked automatically, and his bullets had sped through to the mark as his big finger had worked the trigger without command from his numbed brain. He placed the girl back on the coat. The rain in her face would revive her. It was the best he could do. He returned to the cab to see how the incident had affected Violet, but she was still at the throttle as unconcerned as if nothing had happened. A series of sudden explosions sounded from outside. Violet and Tim turned as if they had been shot. Violet's hand moved to the throttle.

"Pockets under the wheels" said O Connell. "Signals to slow down, to prepare to stop."

"Tell Violet to keep moving," said Tim.

"But there may be a barricade around a bend ahead which will wreck us," Violet seems to expect something of the kind."

Tim shrugged. It would do them no good should the engine pile up somewhere. Violet began to slow it down. And now they began to find themselves afraid it would not slow down on time. It was going into a curve at frightful speed, but Violet applied the brakes sending the tracks to help the wheels to grip and hold. It was slowing. The working from side to side was decreasing. The head light bored into the gloom but a short distance. A pile of ties loomed up ahead a few squares across the tracks. But not a soul moved nearby unless there were hidden men beyond it. Now indeed there was nothing to do but stop and back up from a dangerous trap. But one must stop for a moment before one could back up—and while one was stopped, if only for a second, almost anything a nothing might happen.

The crowd gathered halted within twenty feet of the barricade. "Reverse" yelled Tim. He spun backward but it was too late. From both sides of the track nondescript men, all looking like civilians engulfed the locomotive and tender. Violet sat in her place a look of resignation on her pretty face as the men surrounded the cab. Tim peered out, could make out several Glandelinian officers among the attackers—and several officers he set down downed. School Scoodlers with the light of wicked fanaticism in their suspicious cruel eyes. Suddenly two men one on each side of the cab leaped forward for the entrance. Suddenly Violet's guns blazed, and even Tim turned a little sick as the two men fell dead. But before she could fire again men poured into the cab. Tim and O Connell backed against the tender out on tracks ready, each resolved to defend the two little girls to the last. One of the first men in spoke;

"General Manley counsels submission to arrest. Developments late you're charged with the stealing of a locomotive from a train."

"How do you know?" demanded Tim.

"Got the signal in this location by telegraph. You're under arrest."

Manley whose place whom O Connell had seen in evidence.

Tim's heart was in his mouth. Couldn't the crazy attackers see that he and the Irish man were protecting something, indeed hiding something from them? Tim knew how Glandelinian soldiery treated Christian girls and women—just because the Glandelinians hated God so terribly—and his weapons and that of O Connell had already been taken away from them. They could do nothing to protect the two little girls except give their lives in a desperate suicidal hopeless struggle. Tim prayed to God most fervently to allow the possession angels to take care of them. As yet nobody looked inside the tender. Tim didn't know whether this was done through carelessness on the part of the attackers or their belief that only a man or boy too were the only defenders. Or it might be that the Glandelinian officials of General Manley, who must be everywhere amongst these camps as it seemed were maneuvering the masses of attackers to keep them from seeing the two little girls.

Still Tim held his breath and never ceased praying silently to himself. Indeed O Connell did like wise, for he would dare any one to deny the fact that he too was a Catholic, and an Abbeismian citizen though a foreigner before. The end for the little girls might be horrible if Glandelinian history of past reigns of terror repeat itself, and they were taken.

It didn't happen. Instead iron and hand cuffs were brought forth and the boy and man were securely bound—and a hurried into the tender. Tim managed to give a look at the spot where he had last seen Violet, and the other little girl.

They were no where to be seen. Had the enemy crept over the coal as the first man had done, and spirited the two of them away? Or had the little girls tried to escape over the rear of the tender? But that would have been impossible for Violet, who wouldn't desert any one to save herself whether it was a boy, girl, man or woman.

And the latter thing too he knew was utterly impossible, for the engine was totally surrounded, and had been from the beginning, and too the two little girls could not have got ten away without being seen, and even if this were to be really possible in case miraculously the possession angels helped her, she alone couldn't remain at large in this enemy filled country unless the angel appeared in person and guided her through with a flaming sword in its hand.

This attack was ostensibly by Omarian cavalry. But Tim saw so many infantry like uniforms (Glandelinian cavalry wear different uniforms than their infantry, though hats are the same) beyond the lights furnished by the open furnace door, that he knew infantry commanders were in charge and that many School Scoodlers were also with them. And then he saw where the two little girls had gone. No doubt Violet herself herself had used intelligence. A big pile of clothing in the lower right hand corner of the tender was suspiciously thicker than it had last been. Violet had simply saw her chance and dragging the other girl down with her had crawled under it hiding both herself and her companion, folding them selves into a big ball and still armed were awaiting developments. Tim and O Connell exchanged swift glances. They did not again look toward the big pile of ragged cast off garments. A Glandelinian officer came forward. He was certainly dressed to kill. King George of England would have envied him for his uniform and yet the man was only a lieutenant. Tim could see that by the shoulder straps and the hat. He was dressed as a high lord (maybe he was a high ducky duck) but there were innumerable things that gave him away when he spoke in halting English first to the Irish man and then in Abbeismian to Tim. He seemed to be in command of the whole troop which used a certain cleverness, was trying to pass as a lieutenant and yet he really was a high general, yet after speaking to Tim when he again addressed the American his speech sounded with a polite hissing intake of breath which none was but a polite Japanese would ever use—a fact among the Japanese known the world over.

This hissing intake of breath meant no doubt "That my humble breath may not blow upon you a foreigner" and was the acme of politeness. Tim knew that the Japanese would have spoken thus to an enemy awaiting the services of a firing squad, but to hear a Glandelinian speak this way was really very astonishing.

"It is with great disappointment" said the Glandelinian general bowing low "that we loyal followers of his Majesty King Proclis of Glandelinia must subside with you especially to the end that you a foreigner will honor us self unselfish by returning under guard to the main encampments at Pass. There the great military court of our great general John Manley, and that is me myself may pass upon your case. You of course will be treated with most kindness being a foreigner but if there is a break for liberty there may be a resolute determination forcing of finding to the end that the honorable one may die instantly of bullets. Though you don't seem to be in the war against us, and am wearing no Christian dog uniform you will have to explain to me there why you are in company of this here a boy whom I see must see me to know so well despite his disguise Timothy Scoveton. Yet you alone may carry with you the hopes that you alone may be able to acquit you self yourself with honor in advance of execution by firing squad as an accomplice to this little spy, who is a Cond Confederate to the Vivian girl Princesses who are so extremely dangerous to the Glandelinian cause."

Tim grinned. He found it easy to grin at this bumptious fool who for all his wickedness presented a nation who knew what it wanted and went for it seeming even to be perfectly willing to give its life and existence to attend their wicked and even if it is to drive itself itself down to the infernal regions. The Glandelinian officials now backed off and looked over their followers. Tim studied the general noticed the strange shaped black hat he wore, the professional look the spectacles gave him and that the decorations of his gray blue uniform was red instead of black as is seen among other Glandelinian officers. It was so utterly silly, but life and death rode with the jest. The general signalled only to two men. Tim's eyes narrowed as he looked at their blazing eyes. They were big stalwart men both beaming the scars of many war battles. Omarians. That they had seen plenty of military service and survived many battles was evident by the way they carried themselves.

They were prouder than a peacock.

"These gentlemen" (Tim wondered where he got the word "Gentlemen") "These gentlemen will see you back to the Glandelinian camp" said the general again drawing in his breath hissing like a snake (in fact a snake is more honorable than him) "But I'll have to find a man to run the locomotive though any one can fire."

Finally he did succeed. In rattling words he gave orders to take Tim and the foreigner back to the Glandelinian camps. There they were to be turned over to the Glandelinian Military Court or Tribunal for investigation. Tim studied the huge Quarrians. One of them had a beard that literally covered his throat. The other was clean shaven. Both were armed with rifles, pistols and had their bayonets in their chests but had big knives in their belts. Though they were wicked Glandelinian soldiers they were strikingly handsome and did not look at all as fierce as they were. Two Glandelinians dressed like the Engineer and fire man settled in the places recently occupied by the Glandelinians who had been driven off by Tim and O Connel. One look at them and Tim knew they couldn't be forced off under any conditions. They seemed as determined and invincible as an American himself. If himself and all seemed utterly under the thumb of their Glandelinian commanders. The crowd crowd gave ground as the general signalled the engineers to start backing the locomotive.

The wheels spun and the engine got under way as the general leaped off. Tim and the Irishman stepped back and as if by common consent to forestall the Quarrians from doing the same sat down with their backs almost against the pile of stuff under which the two little girls were hiding. Their chains clanked as they sat down. The two Glandelinians stood over them speaking together for a moment. Then the man with the beard deliberately kicked Tim in the side, a terrific wallop. The other Glandelinian did likewise to the American.

Both were spilled on their sides by the blows and before they could do anything the Glandelinians did what it seemed not to occur to the general to do-- went through their pockets thoroughly. Their guards exclaimed with delight with the amount of money they stole from the American. Tim had nothing in his possession. Then as matter of course they fell into an argument as to its proper disposition. O Connel on the point of expostulating that the money was his personal property and that these men would be in serious trouble if they took it, closed his mouth instead, better not let them know he understood Abissinian or they would be suspicious more than ever that he too was a spy.

He did speak to them in English after he managed to sit up again. The terrific kick had almost caved in his ribs, and had left a throbbing pain in his side while Tim was still groaning miserably. When he addressed them in English the Glandelinians only looked at him blankly. Now they spoke freely after asking if both the man and boy understood Glandelinian and were relieving headsakes from one. O Connel told a lie but it seemed he had to.

"If it is known that our prisoners had this money," said one of them. "The officials will demand that we turn it over. It will buy much that we now lack. I do not wish to turn it over again as our officials do not allow robbery of prisoners no matter who they are. What then are we to do?"

Tim listened his breath held tightly in his throat so as to make no sound. The locomotive was again rolling and rocking as it gathered speed backward toward the Glandelinian camps. The other Glandelinian soldier considered for a moment.

"If we were to slay these two Christian Dogs little punishment would come to us, and as for the foreigner we would not cause any trouble with the United States, since they can lay the blame on somebody else. We can say that the man and boy tried to make an escape and we were compelled to shoot them. Then if they ask us about money and papers we can deny knowledge of any such. When the bodies are found who is to say has stripped one of them of every thing of value since they will be found naked any how?"

Tim darted a quick glance at O Connel. The American's face was pale but he bowed his head so that the treacherous Quarrians could not see his palpable give away of the fact that he understood their words.

"You would suggest then," said the bearded man. "That we kill them both?"

"It is obviously the thing to do. It is or, am quite sure that we could do something of the sort else why did he send us instead of other soldiers?"

"Absolutely he did so intend. When shall we kill them?"

"As soon as after we have decided upon the proper division of this money. Plainly or plainly the major portion of it should belong to me, since I had the idea first."

"But I offered the suggestion, which would save us from trouble and will myself say the two to turn my share."

"I shall sir, remove that difficulty by myself slaying the boy--so that you cannot offer such a claim."

Tim looked at O Connel wondering if he dared after all say anything to him in English for he was an Abissinian and the foreigner was not. Tim could speak it having learned it. Then he thought of a lingo which not even a cultured Glandelinian linguist would understand--American slang. But would O Connel get it? Tim doubted it, but it was worth a try. He hoped too if Violet heard she could also understand and make her plans. He tried;

"Say Mr O Connel if I were to be such a nut as to crack down hard on you with a big flock of Hooey dooey poeey in Yankee slang would you get me and come back with the right answers."

The Glandelinians looked at Tim wonderingly. O Connel cleared his throat. "Shoot the works you big overgrown little Mug de pug," he said. "I'll get you a drift de buff. I was in dr gains great big business office in New York city for five sneers."

"Then get this at a straight the first time. These two big overgrown peak cocks or roosters are planning a bump off of us truly, O Connel and Tim Grovostonia et al. I say we beat the big overgrown buzzards at it. We're in the right and surely it would be a sin not to do it. We have our only dukes but may be we can spread em enough for throat clutching. I can do it even though I'm a boy for boys here usually are as strong as any man. We can hope for two little chickens to help us."

"I'll take the big bimbowith the big growth of how horse hair you take the other gorilla," suggested the American. "Jump hard and fast and give em the whole works. Then we'll scramble the hash of those big bellies in the cab hoping again the little chickens will aid us some how."

"What's the tip off when the show starts?"

"We are passing through some big ten tent city now. We'll spring our crazy looney stuff when we're going good and hot again."

"O kay fall in. We'll have to lean against their big bread baskets to keep em from scragging us."

"I know---gaw what is that spinach sprouting buzzard gawking at?"

Now the eyes of both Glandelinians were on a spot somewhere between Tim and O Connel. Those eyes were bulging so they could have been snapped off with a thumb, as though they had been marbles and their necks were stretched as if they were trying to be hens. Tim and O Connel looked in the direction indicated by their set glances. Right between the two prisoners a tiny well shod foot, with mud on the sole had slipped from under the pile of rags. It belonged to the other little girl, not Violet. The Glandelinians had seen the shoe and the barest fraction of a well turned little girl's ankle. There was a murderous fierce look in their eyes. Tim and O Connel laughed as though at a signal, and looked at their guards. The Glandelinians were arising to their feet. Tim and O Connel tensed themselves.

"No," said Tim. "We dare not miss for good's sake. God please for a good cause and the safety of the little girls aid us we plead. Up we come." The two Glandelinians paused as the two prisoners came to their feet as one. Both prisoners with a snarl like wild beasts lunged to get their hands extended and as far apart as their hand cuffs would permit. Their hands were like tarlons. Tim lost sight of O Connel but his own hands went to the throat of the bearded man--and his smaller body pressed hard against the soldiers' undrawn weapons. Behind them Violet herself scrambled out of the pile of rags followed by the other little girl.

Tim and O Connel both knew that they must make an end swiftly, for the Glandelinian engineer and fire man hearing the racket mumpus, the rattling of their chains, and the noise made by the big Quarrians would come to investigate. They had split seconds in which to do the desperate thing they knew they must, to save their lives and the lives of the two little girls. Tim struck like a thunder-bolt and proved his strength despite his size and age. His hands went to their disappointed objective with a surety which long practice, plus desperation made possible. His side went against the soldiers' weapon, against the pistol in the man's belt on the left leg. The victim too who did not seem to know what hands were for as also fighting tools, spent most precious time clawing for his weapon, while Tim squeezed mercilessly against his throat causing his tongue to protrude. The other little girl swung past Tim, her slim right hand came out as the boy could see from the tail of his eye, and grabbed the pistol. Then she vanished behind him at a call from Violet.

The Glandelinian soldier was a powerful brute, and he acted as if he had no wish to be killed. (Maybe he knew where he would die when he died) Now he clawed for his knives, while thrashing all about the place making so much noise that Tim expected the two other Glandelinians to arrive at any moment. And O Connel O Connel was having plenty of trouble too with the bearded man. Tim as the Glandelinian began to weaken squeezed tighter. O Connel heard a solid thumb behind him, and a faint sigh. It was followed by the falling of a body and the breath rattling heavily through a constricted throat. The thumping sounds he believed was caused by Tim down on the floor of the tender being the head of his adversary against either the hard lumps of coal or the solid wood. The locomotive still rolled and raced on. Still the Glandelinian fire man and engineer had not come to the rescue of their two struggling companions. It was strange unlocked for. The Bearded Glandelinian soldier's feet eyes were rolling in a constricted face but his tongue was not out. His body twisted, writhed and heaved. Out desperation seemed to have given the American the strength of two average man-urmen. He merely frightened his strangling grip on the throat of the Glandelinian and waited for the man to die.

Then a boyish hand was placed on Connors' shoulder and Tim's voice spoke in his ear. He was amazed at the boy's coolness.

"Never," said Tim, "try to choke a bearded Glandelinian soldier by getting his beard in side your hands. It won't work. You have to get your hands under the beard."

In any other circumstances the thing would have been absurd. But the American in his eagerness to get his man before the Glandelinian could get him had squeezed his beard against his throat--and the beard was very thick and bushy.

"Here," said Tim, "let me show you."

And amidst clanking of chains, Tim pulled the reluctant American from his man and dropped down to take his place. The Glandelinian soldier was a limp.

The American glanced to his left. The second Glandelinian sprawled supine on the floor of the tender, sightless eyes staring into the growing dawn body rolling with the movement of the cab. The American shivered a little. The whole thing was rather awful, but there was one consolation in the slaying which was really a ghastly slaying. If they had not killed the two scoundrels they themselves would have been slain in a cowardly manner, and the two little girls would go through hell to die, or wish for death in the end. Tim rose from the floor, his enemy was now quiet, motionless also save for the movement lent to his limp body by the rolling of the tender. Now Tim remembered the two Glandelinians and whirled to look into the cab. The men stood in the opening between cab and tender, looking in. They had made no move to come to the assistance of their Comrade. And for every good reason too.

Both Violet, and the other little girl a look of determination on their faces beneath a mask of grime and coal dust were covering the Glandelinians. The little girl with the weapon she had snatched from the other Glandelinian while Violet had her own. The other little girl was holding hers in her two hands.

Tim looked hard at the two Glandelinians whose bland faces were so non-committal.

"Well," he said, "how about it. Do you wish to go the way of your two comrades?"

One of the Glandelinians shrugged and answered;

"No thanks if you don't mind, though we could have downed both of you before the little girls covered us with that pistol. But in secret I am not your enemy but a secret agent of Schofield Penrod the Prince of Abbieannia. This other man is--I don't know what, except that he isn't of the Christian side. I shall take you both to the Prince and his sisters. They dwell some slight distance from the right of way, between here and the main Glandelinian encampment."

Tim was suspicious, though the man's excellent Abbieannian manner of speech and accent did much to dispel his doubt.

"You come in too handy my friend," he rejoined, his eyes narrowed. "I can't see how you happen to be right on hand when so badly needed. I don't believe so much in coincidental coincidence when Glandelinians too are distressed as Christians."

"No perhaps not," said the engineer, "but managed coincidence is something different."

"Yes," he said, "well tell me how you do happen to be here."

"It's very simple. Last night Prince Penrod Vivian was in the southern wing of the Glandelinian army to contact a boy and girl the boy whose name is Tim Grovelton, and the girl who is Penrod's sister. The two escaped a Glandelinian trap of death. I presume it is either you yourself or your friend and that girl indicating Violet. Prince Vivian who happens to be my honorable leader, therefore signalled to his agents in the camp by use of a five note flute, telling of your escape, stating that you would surely travel towards Ophelia and perhaps manage to get to the Christian lines proper. His message was passed on from one part of the camp to another and also from town to town, from farm to farm, by the five note flute--and his secret agents merely rallied to the signals. They filtered into every Glandelinian group which might come in contact with you along the line to Ophelia, especially if you were captured. God himself knows as soon as I had the chance I suddenly covered you, captured you and kicked them off the train and brought you to the Prince myself. Simple isn't it?"

Tim grinned at the fully.

"Yes, very simple maybe--to a Glandelinian. To me it sounds blurred complicated. It is true Penrod can do many strange things he learned in a foreign country but where did he learn the five note flute. That is absolutely Xian Chinese."

"There are no secrets among him as the Prince also knew many Chinese and I learned things from them too. He can send messages faster than they can be sent."

In English or other languages over telegraph or telephone lines and rendered into Christian or Glandelinian dialects. My way here we allow I'll find out how my comrade here feels about us, and about Prince Vivian and his lovely sisters. My name is Pagan Henry donia."

Henry donia turned to his comrade, chattered to him so rapidly that Tim scarcely gathered more than that Henry was asking the man where he stood in this case. The second soldier began to tremble, tremble, his lips quivered and he licked them with a sudden dry tongue. Henry's face hardened.

"If I were to throw him off the locomotive now at this speed," he said to Tim, "he would never need worry further about this man. I estimate that that we are making something like seventy miles an hour. Tim shook his head. He preferred to accomplish his ends without bloodshed when ever possible."

"No," he said, "let down and dump him off. A long walk may do him good."

"It would be simpler to strangle him with his neck tie," said Henry donia harshly. "Then he wouldn't be able to carry tales. These Glandelinians are dangerous."

Tim shook his head. Henry donia shrugged, stepped into his place and closed the throttle. The locomotive started to slow down. The two little girls still held their pistols pointed at the trembling soldiers. At Henry's command the other man stood in the door of the cab. The engine had slowed to half its usual speed, then to a quarter. Henry donia suddenly put his foot into the back of the Glandelinian and roughly pushed. The man plunged suddenly out of the cab with a loud scream on his lips. Henry donia grinned at Tim.

"I obeyed you almost to the letter," he said, "but it came to me if the man did ever carry tales he would carry them less rapidly if he had one or two broken legs."

Henry donia seemed entirely unconscious of the heartlessness of what he had done. He merely stepped back and opened his throttle wide again.

Tim spoke to the little girls.

"You might sit in the cab," he said. "It's dry here, and ---" he nodded his head toward the two still Glandelinians. They were not nice to look at. They shuddered, then smiled tremulously. At Violet's request Tim gave her his handkerchief and she began to wipe the smut off her face. He took a seat in the cab and he watched her and the other little girl helplessly. How would all this result for her and especially the other little girl. Would they end by falling into the hands of the enemy? Tim's jaws set tightly. He wouldn't allow it to happen. The locomotive was traveling again at what appeared to be about seventy miles an hour. The American had taken keys from the pockets of one of the dead Glandelinians and both Tim and himself were free again. They or he had retrieved their money too. They heaved great sighs of relief. Death had been very close---and Tim was conscious of the fact that but for the two little girls they might well have been killed. For too how was he to know as a certainty that Henry donia had told him the exact truth. How was he to know that the man whom Henry donia had kicked off might not be Prince Penrod's agent if indeed there were any such, and if Henry donia himself a wily agent of general Hanley?

Tim turned to the girl the little stranger girl and moved forward to thank her.

"You're like a little Abbieannian girl, you have plenty of courage," he said quietly. She looked up at him. He didn't smile, though Violet did.

"I didn't realize what I was doing," she said. "I just found myself doing it as though I was obeying orders from somebody else."

"It still was courage. You saved our lives and the life of the Princess here. And I'm dreadful sorry that we're going back into the foe camp---and and afraid for you."

Her little face set.

"I'm not afraid," she said. "I know in spite of my friend trying to keep it from me for my sake that my father is dead. If he is then I want to do every thing I possibly can to punish and injure who ever killed him."

She might as well have it.

"Yes," said Tim grimly. "He's dead, murdered by Glandelinian soldiers. You'll have to depend on Violet, the man and me. Need I say that we'll stand by you as long as we are able."

"I know that my friends," she retorted, though her eyes filled with tears. Tears when Tim so quietly confirmed her fears by admitting his knowledge of her father's death. "Maybe some day I can thank you very much for what you have done. Now the least I can do is to ease your little trouble as possible. If I'm too much of a burden drop me somewhere and I'll manage to make out somehow."

That was all there was between them in words yet as he shook his head Tim felt that something far more important had been said---without words.

The locomotive stopped just as dawn was breaking. Henry donia waited until they were off, then opened the throttle half way and also eased the locomotive carrying its load to go on its way. For two hours they marched at right angles to the right of way. When they stopped at a small house in a small town that seemed to be deserted, a town which plainly had been ravaged by the "Glandelinian soldiery, and he knocked on the door. It opened to disclose a very princely looking boy--and Penrod bowed smiling to his visitors.

The princely boy thrust out a hand his hand to Tim, even as he stepped aside to allow his visitors to enter though he looked questioningly at O Connel and the other little girl. He lifted his voice and a strange language looking elderly woman came in to whom he barked words in rapid English. Seated at a big table studying something were Violet's sisters who were at first so absorbed in what they were doing that they did not even look up when the three entered. The woman smiled at the three and Tim knew that the little girl would be taken care off here in a motherly fashion. He smiled at the three as they followed Penrod into the room and toward the table.

"Despite your disguise you're Tim Br Oveton my friend," said Violet. "Penrod. It was an abrupt statement, not a question though he eyed the man and the little girl and this time so did Violet's sisters."

"Yes."

"And these two will be O Connel and a little girl refugee with him."

"Yes."

"We've plenty to do," Jim said, "poise herself looking up from her work as Penrod mentioned the boy and man and little girls to chairs." "We will talk later while we eat. My brother got a signal an hour ago that you were coming, and Jennie herself cooked as only the best of cooks can cook it, and it will be along shortly. But we'll be lucky if we can even stay to eat it. In a small hollow back of the town (not night town) we have a score of good fast ponies, the fleetest we could secure by capturing them, to gather together with our riders. We did not wait for saddles. We'll be traveling soon."

Yet Penrod and Violet's sisters looked at O Connel and the little girl thoughtfully. They thought fully an even after Violet herself explained. There was a question in their eyes. It came to Tim and also Violet after all that her sisters or brother knew nothing about either O Connel or the little girl. The man might be a secret agent of some sort and the little girl might not be a refugee. But Tim would have sworn for them both. He felt he simply couldn't be wrong about the man in particular for there was no American found who was for Glandelinia and that if he were other than he seemed to be, he himself would know it. And too if the little girl were all right she would not be with a man who wasn't. That made O Connel okay. Besides Tim had already told O Connel that he himself was working with Violet and her sisters and her brother.

"John O Connel is all right," Jim said. "Are you sure for that matter that you know me?"

"Of course you have been identified by the man whom I sent to engage your service. He was in disguise and watching when you arrived. Besides I'd know you through any disguise and your voice betrays you and therefore I know positively you're Jim."

Seeing however that the little girls still eyed the two others very searchingly Tim and Penrod moved away out of earshot of O Connel.

"Go try and Violet failed to contact you in the street in the southern camp," said Tim. "What in the world happened?"

"We were discovered by the Glandelinians," stated Penrod. "Fortunately Jennie downed one of the men and in the confusion we managed to get away. A fanatical light gleamed for an instant in the eyes of the Prince. 'What does anything matter if we can eventually bring back the old time freedom of California and her sister states from the invasions of old Glandelinia. That is the dream of my heart and those of my sisters Tim--a dream that must be realized if it is God's holy Will, but if not we must be resigned.'"

"And my mission is what?" Demanded Jim.

"In our attempt here to learn some desperate information to guard secretly and protect my sisters, to be sure we'll be successful in our mission. I have sent for you because from my recent adventures with you I know you are clever, dangerous, dangerous to the enemy, may more dangerous than I am, and fearless. As a Glandelinian boy scout in the make up you can remain close to my sisters and guard them from trouble or from death if that threatens. I am as you see again 'Adeldefob.'"

"But as for the ability you have and with all your strange tricks you know why do you think, a common ordinary boy scout will be able to do more than you, or your own followers?" Asked Jim in evident surprise. "Why in our work, and my sisters will have to depend on me and we are of opposing sides and therefore for a few I cannot do anything suspicious. Glandelinia too knows that all the Glandelinian generals would give anything to see my sisters and associated since they can't be done away with in other methods. As you know my sisters have millions of deadly enemies among the Glandelinian armies in officers alone not counting the armies who do not desire to see them or their fathers and mine too succeed in bringing this wicked war to a speedy close. But my esteemed ancestors were of the Glandelinian Blood--and with all my shrewdness and theirs and your help and the Glandelinian organization of spies here I shall bring this war into a situation that the whole will have to get out or meet disaster it will never be so self-recovering."

Tim felt that Penrod was clinging to a dangerous fantastic dream, and yet his love for him and his sisters was such that the boy scout leader was willing to do every thing in his power to insure success and protect Violet and her sisters. It might be that in so doing he could serve a double purpose, for if Violet and her sisters went through an adventure of this kind he could see them esteemed as more famous than even he was a good brave boy scout indeed because he loved the danger, the zest of conflict. That he had often battled in lost battles did not matter, nor did the pay he received for his services. It was the love of country, of God and the Prince and Princesses and the adventure of it all with them that was the breath of life to him Gveton.

"Your sisters will be guarded to the best of my ability," he said. "But what about them now?"

"There is little danger until we start off," stated Jennie herself just coming in dressed more like a little cook. "We are sure that those who plot against our lives desire to make our deaths very spectacular--something which may prove a cause for our side to lose the war. And remember we have not started anything of our adventures yet."

"You shall be safe through fire and water," said Tim quietly but firmly. Penrod, Jim and Violet and her sisters smiled their mutual understanding. Some servants came in with food. Penrod mentioned the man and the other little girl to chairs and the little girl herself looking much refreshed. Penrod bowed to her with a courtesy that was more like the Chinese do his hands reaching for his sleeves as though he had forgotten that he was not wearing Occidental clothing but a uniform of a famous high ranked Glandelinian boy scout leader.

"Little Jim, full of courage," he said will be sent safely out of this territory and into the Christian lines. With my organization that will be simple. I can have her safely within the Christian lines within two hours and she won't be in danger once. He may get into serious trouble here with us for the Glandelinians are too close on my trail or at least the trail of my sisters if not at me secretly as we have tried to keep it."

The little girl tossed her head. There were spots of bright colors of something in her cheeks as she said somewhat haughtily not knowing he was a Glandelinian prince:

"I'm not going to the Christian lines until my father has been avenged until his murderers have been punished. I'm going with you and the little angel girls you have with you as companions."

Penrod's face hardened severely.

"It's no work of for a little girl of your kind," he said brusquely.

Tim knew that Penrod spoke the truth, that he could get the little girl into the main Christian lines proper, as he had said he could. He wondered why he hesitated.

"Will it be even safe to send her out with only O Connel for company contemplating that he is an American, and Americans are the fiercest of fighters. As we all know from experience?" he tempoized.

"It will be safe," said Penrod. "Trust my men implicitly, and there will be such a small body of them traveling at night, that they can pass unnoticed. If not they are a force sufficiently enough to hold out a regiment in a regiment if not wiping it out. The only trouble is that they will travel in a direct line avoiding all railroads and trails and we won't be able to get word to them until they've reached the Christian lines. You won't mind that Mr O Connel?"

The American shook his head, but he didn't commit himself further than he had already by his silence. He was watching brave little Nell and waited to see what decision should be reached regarding her. And Jim desired was of finding out how matters stood over with them both spoke bravely.

"I don't see why since she knows what she is facing the little girl can't stay with us if your sisters are really angel possessed that might also be a protection for her providing if she is good then to them and friendly."

The little girls face flamed with anger.

"I'm going to the Christian lines" she said. "If I can't travel with you Master Addisob then I'll go my own. I won't be ordered around by any landlinein boy about whether he is good or bad, sides with the Christians or not. I'll leave the decision to Violet or her sisters an v not you." Jim couldn't help grinning as he looked at Penrod.

"What would you say to that Adelaide?" he asked.

"If the matter were entirely in my hands," said the Prince grimly, "knowing the situation as I do, I would send the little Miss out of here and to the Christian lines by force if she refused to go otherwise. I'm not responsible for what may happen to her if she does not go."

"That's the only way I'll go" she snapped.

"Very well," said Pen and he rose to his full height. "I'm not Adeldefob that is my assumed name. These little girls here are my sisters and I'm Prince Schofield Pen and son of Imperorvivan. What do you say to that?"

The little girls face blanched w for she had not know that.

"since you have spoken to me thus, when Heaven knows I know best" he went on I'm going to punish you and so will my sisters. you're going along with us.
That is the punishment. And you'll have to share our danger as come what may.
and if after all even though you are not dressed as a girl scout, you fail us you shall be charged with desertion. remember that you may go with us, and and what happens we wash our hands of all responsibility since you're so reckless a girl."

Still him offered no objection and the American understood the boys feelings. Both would be pleased to have the girls companionship on the trip through the enemys dangerous territory, but the American couldn't remain within the islandellinium arms when there was a way out offered him--merely to be with her and share her dangers.

"I'll go to the Christian lined" said the American.

The little girl, and even the Pdn women looked at him contemptuously.

"I'm afraid you can't pipped up pussy flatly. "I was only going to have my brother send an expedition to the old christian lines on account 'l little Wells account. If she refuses to go, and Pened decides that she man be main with us and take the chances for her foolishness then you'll have to stay stay too and we'd be afraid to let you go until we know you better. I really can't let any one go now. You must stay. If you're a good man as you are said to be you would any how love your company."

"The American pinned"

"he wouldn't," he shot back?

The party had been eating as they talked, wolfing as you say the food following the lead of Penrod as they had not time to eat. Now they mashed back their chairs. The woman already stood in the doorway, a bundle of belonging in her hands looking away toward the Christiana line. She was ready to vanish, it was time for all to go. Suddenly she turned to Penrod.

"The glandinian soldier y come Prince," she cried. "Many men on ho - ses. I loked the party seeing if the weapons were in good condition moved six swiftly. Penrod having an extra supply armed the little girl leading that the child did not know how to shoot. Then the party moved six swiftly. Penrod led the way out of the place by a rear exit and twisting and turning among the dense red burned burned shrubs they headed in what Tim guessed to be the general direction of direction of the objective point of escape.

"They'll find the remains of food on the table Adeldefob" He muttered.

"They'll count plates and know what's up."

"They'll count plates and Panrod shook his head.

"The woman will look after that. When the enemy arrives the house will look as if it has had never been occupied for weeks---like the others here."

"which reminds me" said Jim "what has happened here? There doesn't seem to be a living soul in the place."

"There isn't except us," snapped Penrod. "They were wiped out by the enemy. The are unfortunate inhabitants of the place are buried in the deep gulley where out horses are waiting."

His statement put an effective damper on the party. They increased their stride as if by common consent. They came at length to the edge of a large gully and looked down into and across the wily long haired ponies used by Glandelinian cavalry were waiting for them. The men were dressed like Ozadians and Scoodles. They were members of the Gemini in disguise. The faces of the men were some of the party were at once looking. Yet the faces especially of Violet and her sis - a went white - still when they saw what else was to be seen in that awful gully. Graves all of them practice practically hundreds and hundreds of them. Jim wondered if the inhabitants had not been herded in to this gully and shot or cut down without mercy. He put the question to Ben - red!

"No they were not shot," said Pen and shortly. "They were murdered like the glandelinians do it, entrails and all cut out of their bodies. They were believed to have harbored men enemies of the glandelinians."

The party began to move quickly mounted silent in the midst of the sounds which were of significant to the minds of what might happen to them. Penrod took command, and even his sisters offered any protest. The other little girl was ordered to the head of the column which was forming with unusual speed. Very many had hand grenades besides rifles and pistols. O'Connell followed her, then Penrod signalled to Tim and the two rode side by side with violet and her sisters at the columns rear. The party started swiftly up the draw where women at the ready.

I "If it had only been our selves"said Pen nodding with a frown toward the toward the little girl "We'd have traveled on foot keeping to cover. The girl makes the calvacade ne. necessary."

"But I protested him" The column was already in readiness. you were going to travel this way before a little bell refused to go into the Christian lines." Penn Penrod grinned tightly.

"Yes," he said. "I know she wouldn't go. I spent some time in American places knew many American little girls where I learned that American girls can't be driven to do even that is wise for them and many go to the ruin or destruction. I did try, though I knew it was a waste of time, but Heaven knows she is alone responsible for what happens to her if it does and not us, but if it is really absolutely necessary that the danger is too great she'll go back even if she has to be a spy or prisoner until she is within the lines. Careless fools got to learn."

The column at the head of which rode little Nell with the ase of a born horse woman instead of a little girl was galloping swiftly up the little Canyon. Her pace was amazingly deceptive, until one looked down to discover that the fleet ponies ran with their stomachs close against the ground, their heads thrust forward, their manes flying (not crying) and that the ground was literally a blur in passing. Jim looked back. The groves were vanishing around a bend in the valley.

A head of him to the accompanying of accompaniment of the spanking of a rifle, a pony suddenly went down as though its legs had been knocked suddenly from under it. The rider plunged to the ground ahead of the animal and sprawled out his head twisted under him at a most signing angle. Little Nell didn't look back, and not mercifully heard the rifle or seen what it had done. Jim and Penrod and eldest and her sisters hurried the dead horse and rider and sped on, Jim still carrying the two rifles which he had managed to dry about the train which by now must have delivered the two landellinian dead to some point of objective. He unslung one rifle and passed it to Pen Penrod. Each weapon carried only the shells now in the chamber but Jim had bullets that would easily fit these rifles even though they wouldn't explode as loud as glendelinian bull to do making a sound like an exploding dynamite stick.

Mounted men appeared on the rim of the valley behind them, then plunged down to begin the grueling chase. Jim edged grimly to waste bullets at that distance. The column sped madly on. The Yank nodded approvingly when Tim told him to place himself directly behind Little Nell, his body would stop any bullet coming from the rear intended for her. Tim looked back again.

The pursuers were spreading out the foremost man carrying a cavalry standard and kneeling the animals into top speed.

"They'll never catch us now except perhaps with an occasional bullet," said Penrod. "My men are all members of the Gemini as you know. They know tricks I have also learned to them which Indians learned. I even know I've learned more tricks than I had a chance to do yet, but I'll soon show one that'll do k fine. That party is the O mai Ozu rian outfit and they hate us like poison."

"Do they want to destroy your good sisters under any conditions?" asked
 "No, they want to destroy only the princesses."

"A wise leader doesn't reveal his plans to any one or every one," said Sam, and additinally, "I do not believe in even my own men knowing too much Pen had critically. "I do not believe in even my own men knowing too much for one can tell if there is not a secret enemy among them."

"You are right in that," Jim leaned forward to a large pile of more speed. The little animal answered with alacrity carrying his riders weight on the back it was nothing. Up ahead little Nell had thrown aside her little girls hat and her long bobbed hair flew backward in the hazy sun. Jim could fancy the light of excitement in his dark blue eyes. Again he looked back. The Glandelinians on the rim of the gully, and on the gully floor were now firing in desperation as they pursued. He heard the snapping of bullets past his ears like the stark striking of a drum head with a small hammer. He saw sparks of dust kicked up by bullets which went too close and too low.

Another Christian rider went down, but this time his pony ran on. He was rolled to his back as Tim rode past him. A bullet had struck him in the back of the skull had come out in the middle of his face. Jim was glad that little Nellie, even violet or her sisters had not seen that. It even made the Yank accustomed to all sights of violence in war time a little sick and filled him with renewed anger at the pursuers. The gully curved. There was a ravine branching off.

Ten or twelve of the column suddenly disappeared into that gully, and the American was amazed as he went past it the next moment to discover that the dozen men had vanished completely. He turned and looked his surprise at Penrod and Jim both who grinned.

"The Gemini through my Indian tricks learned them know every nook and cranny of the land. The Glandelinians, they know as much of it as the hen knows the geography of the moon. The Glandelinians can't catch or find them. Good place for a deadly ambushade but we haven't time for that. My men could go into that curving ravine moving on a vine for two minutes and even, couldn't find them. Their very tracks will be rubbed out behind them."

"But we may need all our men," said the American.

"They will be on hand when we need them," said Jim himself enigmatically. Bullets were coming fast enough. The American looked back himself. The Glandelinians were ruining. He paused, whirled his pony, flung rifle to shoulder drew swift bead on the foremost of the pursuers and pressed the trigger with the expert rifleman's care. The rifle crashed with an explosion that made little Nell suddenly look back toward him in excitement. A distant Glandelinian toppled from his pony, sprawled in the dirt. The wide-eyed animal circled back into the pursuing force. Bullets from the Glandelinians increased in volume. Again the American fired the rifle. Again he fired. He fired six shots in all and six Glandelinians bit the dust causing some confused confusion among them for they observed that man was a deadly marksman indeed. Even violet and her sisters were astonished. He reloaded and fired again, until it was empty and then used his pistols and never once as quick as he fired missed a man. He strewn the path with fallen soldiers. The Glandelinians in the foremost rank halted in consternation. Then he looked back to the front and gasped in consternation. Little Nell had vanished from the column ahead as though she had been miraculously erased or vanished into thin air like a spirit. One minute and she had been there galloping in the wind. Now she was gone.

He started to drag his pony to a halt. Penrod snapped at him.

"He's all right. Can't you see that? The him and even my sisters are missing too! I ordered it. They've gone into another ravine to ambush the pursuers if they come this way. If you had not been busy shooting you'd have seen the ravine."

"At the skunks may go after them. This time maybe you're gang can't be able to protect them."

"The pursuers," said Penrod after a moment. "My sisters set out to save them we must keep those devils on our own trail. If they get too close they'll wish they hadn't. I'll use some of my Indian methods of shooting."

The American noticed that three or four of the disguised Gemini had disappeared with the eight little girls and Jim. He looked back to see the pursuers pass the mouth of the ravine without even glancing aside. The Glandelinians had made to learn of a far side of Penrod's style especially this queer game of hide and go seek in which the Gemini thanks to Penrod's training were so adept. The American realized suddenly that he had the cooperation of perhaps the best organization to be found at that moment amongst all Christians an organization better than anything that Glandelinia had yet ever thought to get together. No wonder the Glandelinians were so intent in wiping out Christian child scouts. As long as these child soldiers soldiers rode the soil of Culverina against them, Glandelinia would never conquer even a portion of one of its provinces.

There was much about Penrod that the American and perhaps others didn't know. There would always be much, for no Abbeonnan boy scout of any kind no matter how friendly could tell anything until it was demonstrated in case of necessity. Next time men branched off from the column it happened when for a brief moment, they had dropped the Glandelinians from sight behind them. The Gemini looked back at Penrod for a signal, got it, turned into a ravine and were gone from sight by the time Penrod and the American had breathed the ravine. Now the column was reduced to a mere half dozen men. The Glandelinians seeing only the rear guard, could not know that the column did not reach ahead as numerous as before around the curves of the canyon.

Penrod and his men had selected their best route with great care and cleverness. The American could imagine the savage frustration of the pursuers when they should discover the ruse. And then all at once Penrod and the American rode along—and the Prince was looking at the American. The American was looking at the American strangely.

"Now we take to the open," he said. "I'm a rotten shot! Suppose, merely carry this other Glandelinian rifle and hand it to you when it is next necessary. I can with good aim handle an Abbeonnan rifle but not a Glandelinian as it kicks too strongly with the loud explosion of the cartridge. And listen my friend pray to God that you pony doesn't step into a hole or break his leg for I have much to do with for Abbeonnia and for the care of my sisters and to avenge their sorrows and miseries of the past and could not turn my pony over to you! I would be compelled even against my will most strongly to make my escape with out you."

"I'll get along all right." The American smiled lightly.

Penrod laughed.

"That being understood," here we go," he said.

He whirled his pony to the right putting the animal at the wall of the ravine. The Glandelinians saw the break. Bullets whined whined all about them. The ponies scrambled up, scarcely breathing hard as yet. They were now out on a level plain. The American looked back. Atmospheric conditions were such that the pursuers looked dangerously close close—until he tried to make out details of their uniforms or outlines when he realized that they were barely within possible range—but coming on as before. The Glandelinians banished their doubts. They thought that the two had deliberately broken away to throw off pursuit. They fired furiously taking good aim but the pursued ones were not within range. The two ponies bent to their tasks. Penrod and the American rode with their bodies close along the necks of their animals.

The American glanced back along his pony's rump. As far as the eye could see—though they were less than a minute from the ravine they had left—the whole land seemed to be one level plain with a forest beyond. Even the gully had been lost to view. Penrod laughed.

"What is the greatest Grace of God out here," he said. "And we'll make these Glandelinians look silly before we have finished if your horse or mine doesn't break a leg, or a bullet doesn't get us."

The Glandelinians must have begun to understand something of this too, as though Penrod's words had been wafted back to them on the breeze of their flight, but if so then some of them must have understood English for Penrod spoke in English to his companion. Now bullets began coming low absolutely aimed at the legs of the horses. The American held his breath and prayed fully expecting one or the other animal to fall.

Now and again he paused whirled on a dim, flung his rifle to his shoulder and pressed the trigger—and always when he did this, the leading pursuer toppled from his pony and sprawled on the soil of Glandelinia.

The American aimed for the men. It wasn't their ponies fault that they were being used in a relentless chase with murder and mutilation at the end of it.

Gradually because they held to a straight line, and were not loaded down with equipment as were the Glandelinians, Penrod and the American drew away from away from their pursuers. The Prince was eagerly scanning the way ahead.

"In five minutes we'll lose them entirely entirely," he said.

"And in about that length of time the American gasped looking down into a deep canyon to his left. They had approached the place from the canyons very starting point.

Penrod slid his pony slowly down the incline. The American followed. The desperate pursuers were lost behind them. Their race continued around a turn to the right, another to the left, then a sharp turn that led away to the left again, to follow which was to take them far to the left of the line of pursuit. Then Penrod slowed to a trot, which continued for almost an hour. By this time the two little ponies were wet with sweat, panting. They had been ridden for what to them must have been an eternity. A turn to the right again and the sound of a five flute note broke on their ears loudly and clearly. Penrod listened, and turned to the American.

"You'll be pleased to know," he said "that Jim with that little girl and my sisters took it on himself to make a dash for the Christian camps all alone with them while I will follow eventually later."

"Will he make it?"

"He'll do anything. In case case any one pursuing him won't live to tell it. There are other Glandelinian men who follow with him that do work for violet and her sisters."

"They turned right into a sort of amphitheater filled with

tents. About the tents were all the ponies and all the men who had no other occupation separated themselves from them along their line of flight. To Penrod a detachment standing at the door of one of the tents was violet and her sisters and the little girl and Jim. Jim explained that violet and her sisters wouldn't go unless Penrod went with them.

"Until to night," said Penrod dismounting, "when we push on to my spying headquarters where, have it located." The rest of the journey to the destined part of the more favorable for camp was made without molestation. The Gemini knew exactly what to do after they had eluded and outwitted their pursuers. The trip was continued by fairly easy stages. They approached the section of the encampments sometime just when it was beginning to get dark and when the camp fires were seen, Penrod gave low voiced commands--and the land swallowed up the Gemini. Penrod, violet and her sisters and little Nell went on foot the boy prince in advance. He led the way in by a circuitous route, but one which he plainly knew very well. Silence deep and impenetrable hung over this large section of the Glandelinian encampments, as though the armies of the enemy were waiting for some something to happen. A small alleyway like a street between the city of tents, narrow and hilly, was flanked by the tall, striped colored tents and at a strangely odoriferous, swallowed them. (My it must have been gun hungry.) Penrod moved without sound. Finally he put his hand back, took that of Violet and Jennie, told his sisters in signal to hold to each other tightly and the other little girl too and led them into the caveous mouth of what appeared to be a black doorway into a hole circus shaped tent.

To their surprise (except Penrod) steps led down--down seemingly without end. Then their feet touched even again. Light suddenly flashed on, after Penrod had closed a door.

They found themselves in a vast room, with small doors giving off from it, which might once have been a throne room. Rich rugs lay on the floor, strange priceless scrolls on the walls; everywhere were teakwood stands and tables and chairs, screens of lacquer, vessels of bronze and gold and porcelain. The little girl Nell gasped, but Penrod and his sisters smiled tightly.

"Here is our home until we find out what is what," Penrod said. "Mildred Jones come forth please."

As he called, (tee hee!) a door opened and the old lady they had left in the burned village where they had first met, entered. Her mouth hung open.

"When an Abbeonnan over on a foreigner loyal," said Penrod. "He or she is loyal to the uttermost. I knew she would be here. Now we have plenty of work to do."

"So you think something may happen right away?" the American himself queried in English.

"One of my most trusted men has gone out to see if he can easily find out what is due to happen or not to happen while we have our secret conference down here. I discovered this place two days ago and so far as I believe only know the where abouts unless we have secret enemies among our followers."

After the American had eaten with the two boys and the little girls Penrod was informed by a code note brought in that his spy had returned. Penrod hastened out; out of the room. Jim and the little girls, and the American talked lightly and usually until he returned.

"An attempt against my poor sisters will surely be made as it is known where down here," Penrod said. "It is unavoidable. So far I have not found out the details of the wicked plot. My man could get no definite lead. You will have to get busy at once. Jim dear."

"Of course," said Jim viciously. "I'm ready."

"I would like to see the 'fun' start too," said the American. "We Americans will use American ways. That will insure success and your sisters will be as safe as they are now."

"Good. I believe it from my experiences with Americans. I wish my armies could fight like American soldiers. The enemy would wish they had not started the war. Now for plans for the frustration of the enemy moving forward for concentration at Linda. Linda. You Tim would instantly be recognized. I myself cannot remain with my sisters or otherwise to them the danger would be doubly great and your effort to save them would be futile. You too Jim have made quite a man for your role through the whole Glandelinian army as a daring boy scout. Your danger too is greater because never before in his life that I know of did a general of high rank ever been forced to surrender to a boy scout as a high Glandelinian ranked a ranked general was forced to surrender to you at the battle of Gun-a-Fee. I am arranging papers for you. You will attend the council with my sisters but not to join in but keep close as possible, as a Glandelinian boy scout offered in full uniform. There will be no many of them at that spot that a note will scarcely be noticed.

After only he noticed. The American himself will stay at some long distance and secretly keep watch on any persons acting suspiciously toward my sisters. My sisters come off safe they'll reward you and so will I." Both Jim and the American nodded in silent agreement their minds already busy planning ahead. And so it happened that on that very fateful morning some morning, when for some unknown celebration among the enemy armies every company street was brilliant with flags and streamers above all of which over every general's headquarters soared the national flag of the wicked rebellion, when the company at tents and houses within the camp were packed with scores of hundreds and thousands of Glandelinian soldiery and also the American, O'Connell went out among the crowd, one as a Glandelinian officer of high rank and Jim as a boy scout serving under the leadership of "Adelsob." Both were determined to keep as close as possible during all the strange ceremony, to Violet and her sisters, who might be recognized despite the disguises they wore. The American himself also knew for he himself had made the main arrangements, that Penrod's men were scattered all through the crowd, with orders to handle expeditiously and surely any one who even spoke ill against violet and her sisters or who suspecting them would interfere with them or try to do them harm in any way possible. Nor would any one of the Glandelinian girls were fatally hurt. However it would nevertheless be the worst for the Glandelinians if it was known, for if Glandelinia could be blamed, the hordes of the American, would pour upon the Glandelinian armies and roll over it as though it never existed at all and would massacre all the Glandelinians who did not escape in cold blooded horror on.

At first violet and her sisters were not to be seen anywhere though it was said they were to go forth amongst the crowd and try to learn what general Manley intended to do. At us slow step followed slow step beginning with the side of the military designate from his headquarters to the place where he was to hold a council with his officials and no one could obtain any view of violet and her sisters anywhere. Tim and the American began to hope that they had wisely changed their minds and had not taken chances of coming here.

Neither of them had not seen the Christian Abbeonnan prince for two hours nor any familiar face that they could have recognized. The little girl Nell had been left in the underground room. Tim and the yank were entirely at their own. The one expected an at any time to feel the feel the authoritative tap on his shoulder but it did not come.

The ceremony always following a move of a high general to hold a council were its way along. The first part of it was a woe woe mixture of wicked Glandelinian ritual, and general Manley wore the uniform that would make you think that every King in the whole world and other worlds combined were far under him. He looked as if the uniform he wore might have cost more money than the richest man in the world could ever build up.

But the last part of it in which general Manley must come une with all his great generals; who had first come out was what Jim feared most the Glandelinian girls would attempt to see and overhear most. He saw seven little children now edging away off near the crowd. The council too was to take place in a great open space in the center of which were two long teakwood tables, fashioned like those used in a great banquet hall and the tables were surrounded by beautifully finished tables chairs made of the same. The top of the table was covered with all sorts of writing material and on the wall not far off behind the tables was a huge map.

This place was chosen by the enemy generals to plan what to do concerning movements upon the Christian lines near Linda. Linda on the Glandelinian.

About these long tables but at some distances were thousands of Glandelinian officers of different ranks, ranks generals and so forth. The American standing at the edge of the crowd knew that thinly dispersed among them were scores of Penrod's secret Service Gemini agents. There was left a vast empty circle between the rim of this mass formation and the tables by which all the officers were to hold council with general Manley. The brave yank knew much of the Glandelinian pageant pageantry the ceremonious adulation that went into all this, even as pruned down as it was by modernity. He knew that when the Glandelinian girls were close to the general too not an eye would be upon him but them. And it came to him in a flash that there was where it would happen.

Here unless he could succeed to stop the occurrence the blood of the brave little princesses might well stain the floor of this great space. Now came a great murmur of sound. Then a hush. Into the circle gathered in the splendid uniform of his great and high commission, the gorgeous light blue uniform coat with the golden decorations came a serious plain looking man his haircut in the fashion of the American way instead of the Glandelinian manner, and wearing horn rimmed spectacles.

His lips and rankel remained dropped behind him at the edge of the circle of fire, the general looking forward alone his face lifted as though he were already studying the blueprint and a profound silence held sway in all the vast gathering. The American seemed to have his head bowed, but he was looking sharply toward Violet and her sisters. He knew that all around the circle were followers of Penrod who also watched while seeming to do a brief homage. Penrod must be watching from somewhere taking his life in his hands as Tim and the Yank was doing, to do so. The Great Glandelinian general reached the first of the nine steps toward the platform on which were the two great long tables. Then to his horror he saw where Violet and her sisters were. In order to hear what might be said, they had gone some distance close out of the throng of Glandelinians, and both Tim and the Yank knew that they would stand out as the best targets a rifle man or a pistol shot could ask for.

The Yank's heart and Tim's almost stopped beating for something had come to him and the boy. If any man now moved to attack Violet and her sisters, the Gemini and others of Penrod's followers could not fire upon those without endangering the lives of hundreds. As though the vast concourse had suddenly realized that, there was a stirring and sighing among them. Now could any one dare for a moment to stop an attacker--for according to Glandelinian rules it was expressly forbidden, on pain of death and torture for any one to approach the big Tribunal room here in this his most dramatic hour.

Violet and her sisters were close to the Hunley stood before one of the tables. He lifted his face again to one of the maps, and two things happened so suddenly that for a few seconds the vast concourse of souls did not realize what was transpiring, at either Tim or the Yank had missed nothing. He was seeing toward Violet and her sisters indeed running as he had never seen before, and seeing with him converging on the figures of Violet and her sisters--four men who might have been of any nationality but surely were not Glandelinians. When the sun struck the face of one he might have been an American or English, or any other nationality. In another light he might have been Japanese or Chinese or Korean--and he with three others were racing toward Violet and her sisters with long knives held high in their right hands.

Tim couldn't reach the others in time and he would have fired but he would have hit the girls. And the American had to increase his speed to heart-bursting proportions to reach his objective in time though he was frightened out of his wits for fear of what might happen to the holy little Princesses. He marvelled at the fact too that general Hunley who must have heard the killers' shouts did not turn or change his attitude to see what was happening and Violet and her sisters couldn't even to save themselves dare draw a knife or pistol of their own to shoot Glandelinians at this spot for then all the others would add to them with bullets for killing or shooting down any one in the general's presence. Out of course Violet and her sisters had always been protected either by friends or by antics of nature itself and more so by their possession of guardian angels. And then knowing there were surely some one to look after them, they depended on it and took it for granted though they prayed hard inwardly for help. They had never had reason to be afraid in any peril. If aid did not come they would take chances to shoot their would-be assassins down and if not escaping then to take the consequences unless some how or other the angels did interfere with the Glandelinian soldiery.

The brave Yank and the assassins, reached the steps at the same time. To have cut across toward the men who had foreign faces would have been to lose them so the Yank first ran straight forward. General Hunley, who was still apparently unconscious of anything untoward happening, swung around, and then hurried himself with the roar of a mad beast at the foremost attacker just as the man went into a tremendous leap, his knife aimed at the back of Angelina.

O Connel with a whispered curse caught the wrist of the knife hand. The impulse of his charge carried them out of reach of the Vivian girls.

O Connel turned his back viciously to the knife man and flipped him over his shoulder. Shoulder with a tremendous up he upheave just as the three others now made for him. He hurled the other into the midst and in falling as the hands had simultaneously came in contact with the marble top of the upper step. O Connel did not need to look at them again. Violet and her sisters vanished with a scream.

Silence even deeper than before hung over all. O Connel as though coming out of a daze looked at Hunley. Hunley had not even glanced his way. The strange ceremony had not even been interrupted and the officials were seated themselves at the table. O Connel on tip-toe cup his hand asked back down the steps and backed to his place. No one seemed to have looked at him. Then he felt a sudden tapping on his left shoulder and heard words proceeded by him in broken English in the tones of breath and in broken English:

"Youse want to see me? I am quietly. There are what ze call them plenty of ze dead soldiers to make that youse call enough in heem my American friend."

His next passed unnoticed, though he looked around for a friendly face--and saw Penrod. He prince looking at him over the shoulder, was edging his way quickly to the rear and ran out of the crowd. As he was in the midst of Glandelinian soldiery not a friend came forward for the 5-imposed American as O Connel faced the Glandelinian military tribunal composed of Scoodists.

He was tried for murder on the charge of killing four Vivian men commissioned to slay the Vivian girls for spying, and the charge but added the hopelessness of the farce all the more apparent and ironical. He was tried for the murder of four Glandelinian agents and with the charge of killing in cold blood two officials on a train and robbing one of them of a sum of money equal to six thousand dollars and of harboring and aiding the escape of the Vivian girl princesses when they had been arrested on that train and also with the charge of stealing the engine and making away with it. He was tried under the name of Timothy Groveton.

"But I am an American and my name is Henry O Connel," he kept telling them.

He could see the amused mockery in the eyes of the court marshals members as they listened to his words. The president told him in English:

"It makes no difference what your name is you killed six Glandelinian soldiers who had been on an important mission. Hunley knew the Vivian girls were coming to spy and hired these agents you slew at his Tribunal to kill them. And the two soldiers you killed on the train were found last night on a railway this morning on the route by which you were known to have entered the city of encampments. As you're a foreigner and not in uniform and supposed to have nothing to do with this war probably on either side, we have a right to charge and condemn you for murder."

"It ain't murder to save the lives of those little girls. You know very well that assassination too is a crime."

"Assassination is perfect in the time of war. Those little brats interfere with our military movements and endanger the lives of many of our soldiers. You being a foreigner without uniform have no right to interfere. You may claim that you being an American will save you providing we may fear you a American government. You're a claim if you try to make one is foolish. I can prove to your government you interfered with our military rights. I can prove to your government you interfered with our military rights without uniform and killed six of my own men to save persons who mean nothing to you. And we are right for we in you in uniform we would only hold you as a war prisoner. But you are charged with murder and no matter what our cause is or no matter whether we like or detest you we nevertheless keep order in our country and see to criminals you are one and will face the firing squad to morrow morning on the charge of murder."

The grim inevitability of the whole thing infuriated O Connel. He knew exactly what was going to happen. He had been marked for the slaughter. Finally came the sentence, pronounced with finality:

"To be shot to death by machine twenty-four hours hence."

And it was only then, while he waited in a Glandelinian prison tent the execution of sentence, that he was visited by one of the Glandelinians,--a man who looked as he looked (wonder if he was the serpent of Eden)

"If you said that 'Scoodist' with an oily smile 'You tell us exactly why you are within the Glandelinian camps, and why you helped to harbor those Vivian girls if it may be possible to secure clemency from his gracious Excellency General John Hunley.'"

O Connel shook his head.

"You talk as if you don't know American. He said.

"You're a fool said the Glandelinian of face."

"You have marked me for killing," said O Connel. "If you were set. If I told who is to kill I would tell you anything or I would give a promise of clemency from you. I'll take with me any secrets I may have."

"There is the truth is the boy about leader Timothy Groveton? He is really the brother of the Vivian girls? Is he an assumed name? He is Adeldefob? Where are they? Where is Violet, and her sisters, and who and where is that kid called little 'Bell'?"

"I know nothing of either about their whereabouts and if I did you'd waste your breath asking me," said O Connel his heart hammering with pleased excitement as these questions proved that his little allies were still alive--uncaptured. A rarely Prince Vivian must know that is happening to him, and would sooner or later to something about it. The Yank only hoped "That Violet and her sisters are women. Little girl wouldn't would not answer that question. I'm going to see him in this prison tent."

"Why did you kill those men and were going to slay those prisoners?"

O Connel couldn't answer.

"Did one of them suspect and hire you to do it?"

"Why waste your breath?" said O Connel.

The questioner went away after a last question.

"You will have one more chance to answer O Connel," he said.

O Connel grinned.

"The name," he said solemnly bowing low, and hissing as the Glendelinian officer had done, "is Timothy Crovaton--what you people called me anyway--have you forgotten?"

The Scoodler officer did not even have the grace to be concerned at his tongue's betrayal but a ray of his knowledge that an American citizen had been unjustly condemned to death.

"One warning," he repeated.

"Yes? All then, when will I get it?"

"Just before I am shot to death. If your answer is know no then you will die."

"If you tell I can delay the execution until Monday see an appeals lawyer."

"I don't trust you Scoodlers you are all treacherous. That is how you Glendelinians got that name. There, squeal or not I'll die. Nothing doing."

The Americans don't tell on those who befriended. Do you take me for a crazy double-crosser? To double cross the Vivian Glendelin is to double cross God."

"All right. But remember to me now. Better change your mind."

Then he was alone. He didn't pace the floor. He was surprised that the Glendelinian officer was gracious enough to give him a package of cigarettes and a box of matches. And he still believed some how that Prince Penrod could find a way to save him. That Violet and her sisters would. He himself had no chance to break away by himself unaided. There was nothing to do but wait developments.

For a night came he slept, and did not dream. Even if there had been no hope he still would have slept untroubled. One died no more harshly by dying untroubled. And he had heard too that those to do good to the Vivian Glendelin do good the same way unto God and good luck is always with them. And if he did die he would be rewarded in Heaven. Any way, for this American had always lived a pious life. As to killing the Glendelinians he did. Rightly? Violet and her sisters must be defended.

Near day-break they came for him, O Connel in uniform with rifles in hand. These rifles he realized were probably the ones which would lead to his death. They took him for a Glendelinian officer. The march began out of the prison tent, to the place of execution. The sun was rising blood-red through a brown sky huge falling to spill its brilliance over the country. O Connel marched without faltering. The expressions on the faces of his guards were as if they were made of wooden dummies as though they had no interest of what was happening--and O Connel's mind raced ahead to that must transpire unless Our Blessed Lord interfered.

He glided down at his breast where a yellow piece of cloth, not white had been pinned to his uniform, over the heart, to serve as an aiming point. He grinned tightly. They reached the grounds of execution. It was surrounded by Glendelinian soldiers save only on the side toward the deadly bullets would travel. O Connel looked around as the grim punishments went forward. If Prince Vivian were to attack here in force, many lives would be lost on both sides before he would be reached. Yet what weapons could be used to save him from execution? He looked for the faces of Violet and her sisters, and was relieved that he could not see them. Far down a company street he saw a long column of horse-riding to the scene--probably mounted high officials to witness his slaying. The firing squad would wait for them. O Connel became impatient to make an end. It wasn't easy to wait to be shot. They now lined up. He was turned to face them. Offered a blind fold which he refused. He knew he would be asked the question again in a low voice and he would refuse to answer. He was not mistaken. A man came forward for a second and he asked a question.

"Will you tell?"

O Connel shook his head, grinned, asked for a cigarette--was now refused.

The questioner stepped aside out of line of fire. The distant horses came on at a thundering gallop. Nobody looked toward them nor paid any attention. The officer in command of the firing squad drew his sabre held it high and commanded.

"Squad, load."

Polts at the shells were placed it into chambers.

"Take a ready."

The left feet of the soldiers shot forward taking the stand for off hand firing. Their brown tan hands gripped the stocks of their weapons tightly their right fingers being on the triggers already tensing.

"At the heart."

Calmly O Connel faced the Glendelinian squad as the rifles rose to their shoulders. It was too late now for any intervention. Every thing seemed a blur and away. Even if Penrod covered the covered the Glendelinian squad with a withering hail of lead thicker than a snow storm, enough bullets would still be loosed to destroy the American. Yet he faced the squad without flinching.

"Take aim."

Now the slightest tensing of the trigger finger would slay him. He braced himself up subconsciously to withstand the shock of eight bullets smashing into his body. But there came an interruption before the officer could give the command to fire. The long calvados or of horse men smashed right and left ahead of the rifles came to a stop and poured in a fire that wiped out every man before they could fire also shouting fiercely into the crowd of Glendelinian soldiers. One of the men carried a stand and a covary banner and on it was the signature of the dangerous well and greatly feared Gemini. All the men who were on the horses were a determined bunch even though they were dressed in gray. But there were a little girls with them which O Connel recognized--that of Violet and her sisters in the lead, and he would not have been sure of that had he not been with the prisoners for several days. For Prince Vivian and his sisters were garbed in the traditional garments of the Gemini. They were thoroughly disguised but he knew them nevertheless. As they drew their horses to a stop the sudden dreadful fire disconcerted the crowd of Glendelinian soldiers, the short machine guns they carried were plainly in evidence.

O Connel with a start recognized a dozen guns among the men more mete for the streets of Chicago as it is now, than within a few camps of Glendelinian within the Christian lines. He grinned inwardly at this evidence of Penrod's "foreign legion" and wondered where the Prince or his followers had got the guns.

Then Penrod like a spirit suddenly appeared.

"Hurry Yank," said the Prince. "You can't hold Glendelinians. Glendelinians very long. But at this horse and mount quickly. Make for my head quarters. Stop for nothing. We'll hold these soldiers as long as we can."

O Connel hesitated.

"And you'll be shot down," he said finally. "I won't go a step without you. I'll take the lead, and you're sisters too. They'll fire on us but we'll have a chance to get away if they don't think to blast us with hand grenades."

Penrod grinned a little, barked something to his men. O Connel was on one of the horses and Violet and her sisters surrounded him. The feel of the reins in his hands was intoxicating. He felt suddenly as though he had come back from the dead. He saw Glendelinians crowding in from the mob of soldiers which had come prepared to witness the execution. The Gemini rifles of theirs menacing the crowd of Glendelinians at a started as Penrod said:

"All set. O Connel took a desperate chance in order to demoralize further, the slow thinking paralyzed Glendelinians. He on his horse toward them turned directly into the column of Glendelinians. A soldier and some others were ridden down the rest scattered. The horses gained speed. The Gemini held their fire and the column galloped along the company street. Now the Glendelinians were firing but the Gemini answered and sixteen Glendelinians fell to the street riddled with bullets. Bullets came toward the rear of the escaping column, and all along the way rifles cracked down on them but to no avail. A bullet struck a tree close by and O Connel was passing biting a huge piece out of it. Blood spurted from O Connel's hand where a liver had all but gone through the palm. Penrod and Violet and her sisters seeing his brave laugh with him.

"Too bad to have to lose some men just for an old rooster like me."

O Connel said to Penrod, and also nodded the same to Violet and her sisters. Penrod glanced at his eye brow.

"Probably it is for sure but it can't be held. War is war and you got to expect it as fights can't come on without losses. I shall pay the families and do pay the families money enough so they'll be happy the rest of their lives. I keep my promise to all men when I asked them to help me against the firing squad and each one of them openly expressed to wish to die in order that you who have done so much for my sisters shall be safe. You are just as good as one of us."

As the group raced up the hill, the young Geronimo of the Chibabolin band said to them but with a trigger-his hand was with glendon linian d' Iren aimed at skill friend and foe alike. O Council said Penrod because a single bullet here would to await them and he was smiling. The father-aid a count the steps and then stand eyes were a little excited--and the little butt of the charge gun glancingly were lowered to get safely to the headquarter steps. O Council saluted the prince and though he had a beard an American General in chief. Then Penrod ushering his sister inside, strode to O Council in excellent English

"But for you, Excellency Maldefco to take a hand in the liberation of a Yankee spy!" the American grinned. "The glandelinians I even if they do not protect you thinking that you are will nevertheless never forgive you." Penrod smiled faintly.

"Yes Sir," said O'Connell instantly remembering his mission in the Glendalishian army "To be attached to your staff as an observer and protector of your sisters until Jack Evans theirown non dion can come back from duty and take care of them once more."

"It shall be done," he said, "though we fear thwarting on every side. However we shall be the honorable American of this. That his life will be saved, and now my Yankee friend hasten along, design to enter the headquarters of the firm, where my brave sisters waits to have words with the brave American Gentleman."

"My sisters have been greatly concerned. As the only representative of their country's government they have done much to stiffen the weak will and have made my best to take the stand and prevent the execution for that you had so bravely if not rashly saved their lives."

"you took more grave chances than we expected."

"My sisters are in a reception room at the end of the hall waiting," he said, as he turned to go through a high door. "When every thing is settled I would like to see you again."

"The negative at the home. Violet said by way of greeting. "I've seen them before but have never been able to become acquainted with them. Put me about you?"

"And that's all, I tell you a little Prince--will it make any difference?"

"... and the first of these is the fact that the

"I am here at the request of your Father the Emperor to see that you and your sisters are safe. He put the responsibility into my hands. I am in fact his body guard. If I fail to protect you, and God knows you deserve protection more than any one else, if I fail I am disgraced--a nobody, re-nounced by my own country--merely a soldier of fortune. As long as I succeed!"

"Because you are of the Divian Ancestral blood, your good father dreams of reestablishing the old Abibianian Empire into glandelinto and oust all other abibians into exile for their wicked rebellion. I hate to say so but, doubt violet, and her sisters were staring at him: their eyes were very

"Why should I fail? I am a Communist," the biggest step was to get here to reach this army. I saved your lives with the help of Jim Groves. I have a quarter of a million dollars some other and he is very poor. I have a million dollars of currency the enemy out of Alameda Island and bringing back the side of the ship. "O General, showed his shoulders. "who can say."

"I'd rather be in exile myself before I'd see you, full" she said.

"You seem to forget that Court Justice is out of the question within a Glandelinian Army," said O'Connell, "and if you - good Father - and all your host of friends and relatives were again leaving you alone in the world to suffer and so we couldn't bring consideration within a Glandelinia Army. O'Connell, even though it may surely bring forth Vengeance from God above."

They clamped down hands and for the moment ~~stuttered~~ at least the words a deep pause and then----- it was not mere ineluctance within that a sum that sent Henry O'Connell into the water with writhing limbs and chattering bladder that loomed so suddenly around at the w of Violet and I he sisters in the semi darkness about him in that dark room it was no light not to plunge headlong into a number of attacking persons, and O'Connell for all his Irish love of a fight, was not disposed thoughtlessly to jeopardize his career at auction.

Fall into the midst of the would be assassinations group, half seen by the light of an open window, gnomes leaped, yelling to the little girls to run and save themselves. "Call them no", for he was dimly aware that these goldies meant to murder them behind their backs and his first attention was fixed on a single tall gnomie form dim in the shadows who had been the first to come closest to the little goldies. So long now now as he looked vehemently at this figure in gray, gleaming with such uniform as he had, and only with a carve as the edge sliced skin.

888.1110 6.00 1 April 2010 with a sharp at the top of the head and felt his knee under the back cloth, skin and belly muscles. There was a strange sound as if something had set open, an agonized groan burst from his throat lips and blood rushed sickeningly over O Connell's hands while something like boiling thick steam rose from the opening. Then through a blur of clearing sight the American saw a broad bearded face falling away from him—not the face he had seen before. The next instant he had leaped clear of the dying man and was slashing at the shadowy forms about him, and instant of flocking steel, and then the figures were running fleetly from the room just as Violet and her sister and Penrod with him and several others appeared and came running forward with pistols and muskets ready for firing.

O Connell and the others of fighting lips, salt his hot blood lashed to fearful fury, tripped over a wall in the form and fell headlong.
He rose cursing but not loudly, and was aware of Penrod and the little girl as he ached, panting heavily. Penrod stood near with his own sword in hand.
Four men lay on the floor killed by the yank.

"Come my American friend" Penrod panted in English. "They have fled, but they will return with other soldiers." "So."

O Connell made no reply. He followed Penrod and Violet and her sisters who left the building and ran down a winding narrow Company street with the sure fleet of the familiarity. Once or twice held them until they emerged from behind a broad striped tent, where a tangle of company grates debouched upon a broad square in the encampment, vaguely lighted by some 11 camp fires about which groups of Glandelinian soldiery squabbled and brewed tea and other foods. Also a mass of unshaven bodies mingled with the odor of many horses. Here here noticed the man boy and seven girls standing in the shadow made by the angle of a large tent. The American looked at Penrod, who had seen away and though he had shamed his sword blood clogged the hilt and the scabbard mouth.

The keen blue eyes took in every detail of the Americans appearance but the yank did not flinch. In disguise had stood the test too many times for him to doubt its effectiveness. The guard on the same that above him in height leanly built, but with broad shoulders and corded sinews men of stature which gave him a strength out of all proportion to his weight. He was a hard raven mass of wiry muscles and steel string nerves combining the self trap co-ordination of a hunter to a fighter with a wild berserk fury result ing not only from an overflowing nervous energy but also from that he had seen the Glandelinians do to children. The pistols in his holsters and the saber at his hip (p) were as much a part of him as his hands.

He wore the Glandelinian boots and the uniform of a Glandelinian officer still like a real Glandelinian soldier to them. His keen feet were burned to bronze by the hot Glandelinian summer sun were almost as dark as those of a Mexican.

"You are surely a well reliable man" said Penrod. "I hope my sisters will not forget. I will know you wherever we meet again. Now it was best we separate and go far from this spot for men with bayonets will be seeking them and thou too for hiding them, but keep them secretly shadowed for protection. Don't live leave them out of your sight."

And like a shadow he and the little girls glided among the horses and was gone. O Connell stood silently for an instant one ear cocked back toward the alley the other absently taking in the sounds of the camp life. Somewhere thinn thin male voices sang to some harp. Somewhere there came the burst of profanity marked the progress of a quarrel. O Connell for a moment breathed deep with contentment, despite the grim hooded figure that stalked for ever at his shoulder and the recent rage that still seethed in his veins. For this was the real heart of the Glandelinian camp. Then too he realized that he still gripped something in his right hand or left rather and he lifted it discovering it was a length of orange red chain, one of the many links twisted and broken. He lifted it extended a curious form of beaten gold somewhat larger than a silver dollar but oval with a thin round. From that extended another section of chain with a long golden like key attached.

There was no ornament. He knew he had to on the chain from the neck of the Glandelinian soldier he had killed in that room but he had no idea as to its meaning. Slipping it into his uniform coat pocket he strode across the square walking with the swagger of a Glandelinian officer whose men that ran natural to him, saving the square he strode down a narrow company street. It was not long in the morning. A Glandelinian soldier, a thing of war by Countess and the military marchants in it were extolling the quality of their goods, food provisions and sweets and also the Green Countess. There was a single in the realization that he was Penrod O Connell was the first American ever to set foot in the forbidden Glandelinian domain. He was wondering what he had come at. He was wishing staking his life against the problem of capturing on him plan bayonetted and then he had to look at it.

In secret parts of the camp he had heard a tale of a general John Jackson Manley one of the main Glandelinian army chiefs who was trying to try to make some if master of old Calvevia a man had brought him something very important captured from the Christian general's general trying to oppose him at the battle. The spy had captured the treasure by a clever ruse. O Connell did not really feel the princesses all he was here for. He was here in this camp to get rid of that treasure plan, and if not able to secure it personally then to destroy it, and he did not chance his plans. O Connell turned from the street and entered a side room where a host of men were packed. A narrow stair went up from a small balcony to the main court. There he mounted and entered a room where a Glandelinian child slave girl who appeared to be one made ready to wait upon him. He deposited himself on a chair. The furnishing of the main hall which was for Glandelinian officers was a roomy study, and the child in a white dress and a black head.

"Would you wish to have wine and food?" she inquired, and as he had noticed he had heard that voice before he never the less seemed with the form of a Glandelinian knight. The child who is a useful tool to seem too court eyes to any Glandelinian woman however famed or rich she seemed to be a good come the next morning and drink but because he had heard so much from the child that news of many kinds to be on the mind through the many encampments. He served him and sinking down on cushions he had noticed him and drink. And too O Connell's appetite was not put on.

Many long days had taught him to eat when and where he could. The girl seemed to him like a curious child than a child slave even evincing so much interest over a wandering girl, but he knew that she was weighing him carefully behind her guileless stare, as child slaves weigh up a Glandelinian officer who came into this mess hall.

In that hot bed of a camp a plots and war ambitions he had to take many chances. He heard of child slaves would bet on you but you couldn't be too sure.

"You have a good sword," said she.

He involuntarily touched the hilt. It was a Glandelinian blade long and lean like a Mexican. Confidently she had but longer.

"I have cut many of my enemies out of the saddle," he boasted, with his mouth full of empty boasting. Yet it was no empty boast. He believed him and was impressed. He rested his chin on her small fists and gazed up at him.
Gazed at him as if his dark hawk like face had caught his fancy.

"General Manley needs swords like yours," she said, gazing him closely as if she knew of all of his name.

"The Glandelinian officers have many swords," he retorted, gup gulping the words.

"No more than he will need if General Vivian comes against him," she pop-paled.

"I have heard of this General," he replied.

And so he had. No one else had not heard of the da da and valued our superior who defied the wicked power of Glandelinia and had so often cut to pieces the biggest Glandelinian army sent against him. "In this camp," he said and Manley feared him.

That was a blind venture. Men did not speak of Manley's fear openly. The little girl laughed.

"Who does Manley fear? Not only Vivian. Once too he sent an army to defeat General Vivian, and those who lived were glad to flee. Yet if any man lived who could storm and defeat General Vivian's army there is no such man. Only to night the enemy in hunting his army with the camp."

O Connell was made of his adventures with the Princesses and their brother
As he had heard of the child's story, he discovered the broken end of the chain in the da da's pocket. He pulled it out and with a curious interest searched it for a while. He could not help but with a equal he was to be on if it was not put out. He put it in a bagging abandonment among the cushions. He smiled and picked up the chain.

"Will you show me about it?" he demanded.

"You are a da da," she said, her hands but half open seemed more pretended than real. She was a child.

However he had the advantage of position, and they could not crowd past him on the narrow stairs. Their vast number hindered them. His flesh crawled with the fear that others would come down the stairs and get him and the little girls from behind, but none came, while he could hear the little girls shouting down to him to lay off of the fools and come up the steps to a sky light by which they were sure he could escape. So he unawared them and retreated slowly playing his dripping blades with horrible Irish berserk fury. A steady stream of taunts and curses flowed from the lips of the Glandelinians, and he omitting cursing also taunted them in return but even in his fury he spoke in a Glandelinian and not one of the American soldiers realized that the "mad man" who opposed them so bravely was anything but an Angolanian spy.

He was bleeding from a dozen flesh cuts, when he reached the head of the stairs which ended in an open sky trap which Violet and her sisters had tried to get open. Simultaneously the human wolves below him clambered up to draw him down. Seeing their attempt to force open the trap one of the Glandelinians hurled his subra at the victim. It did but fortunately only the handle struck two of them and hurled them off the roof. Violet did not injure any one. A man gripped the American knee another was hewing madly at his head. The others howled below them unable to get at their prey but shouted encouragement to the others. O Connell stooped beneath the sweep of a subra and his own split the skull of the wielder. His gentle outlass, he dove through the breast of the breast breast of the cursing soldier. He clung to his knees, and kicking the clinging body away from him, he saw the little girls had succeeded in getting up through the trap with Penrod and he himself creased up through the opening.

"Catch him!" shouted one of the Glandelinians. "He's getting away. Curses on those little brutes. They helped him by forcing open the trap."

"He can't get away and neither can the others!" Another man shouted.

"How?"

"There's no way to get down from the roof out there."

"Good."

In the meantime with frantic energy helped by some of the little girls and Penrod the American gripped the heavy iron door and slammed it down (from the bottom up) falling across it in semi collapse. The splintering of wood beneath them warned them, and rolled off just as a steel point crunched up through a wooden part of the door and quivered quivered in the air just missing Violet by an inch. He found and shot the bolt and then lay prostrate, panting for breath while Violet and her sisters were frantically looking over the edge of the roof. How long the heavy iron bound wooden door would resist the attacks from below he did not know. He feared only for the little girls and their brothers not for himself. They were on a flat topped roof, the highest part of the building. Rising and seeing the frantic look of the little girls he stumbled over to the nearest parapet paupet with them, and looked down but only onto the roofs of tents. There as no other house within sight of them and they saw no way to get down. They were sixty feet above the ground. They were trapped.

They were on a much higher level than the walls of any of the highest of the Glandelinian tents. They could only dimly make out in the fog the far distant parts of the encampments, and far off he saw they saw the pale silver glimmer of the river which trickled past the enormous Glandelinian encampment.

And suddenly the wind, whistling down from the south, whet brought a burst of crackling rifle reports in the distance but no volley that it seemed as if every body in the world were firing them off at once. "Hots. Shots!"

He stared southward and so did the little girls after him but Penrod didn't pay no attention. "Hots. Shots!" When Violet asked "Do you hear that Penrod?" "No," he answered. "The firing doesn't get us off of here does it?" Yet where they looked they saw great clouds of smoke rolling upward while the innumerable reverberations continued steadily without a pause no new added by a salvo of cannons. Somewhere in the Company Streets below sounded a frantic clatter of flying roofs that halted before a head-quarters gate while bugles blared in perfect concert. There was silence then in which O Connell heard the splintering blows on the trap door, and the heavy breathing of the men who struck them. Then suddenly they ceased as if the attackers had dropped dead utter silence attended a shrilling voice in distinct though distant and muffled wails. But otherwise the distant sound of heavy firing continued. Then a wild clamor burst forth in the company streets below, bugles blaring, drums rolling, officers shouted commands and great droves of soldiers could be seen getting ready instantly for the advance to the scene of firing. No more blows fell on the trap. Instead there were noises below, the rattle of arms the tramp of men and a voice that held a note of hysterical shout giving orders. O Connell and the little girls

heard the clatter of many rattling hooves, and saw a enormous bodies of Glandelinian cavalry moving through the streets. In the immense dark clouds of smoke the American and the children saw saw orange jets of flame and heard the unmistakable report of regions of fire arms now in that directions and the dull booming roll of cannons and the sharp "sh-rap, sh-rap" of bursting shrapnell. In that distance rifles were cracking all around so it seemed and crouching at the parapet and looking more closely with the field glasses they still fortunately had with them they saw the reason.

A good section of the large Glandelinian encampment was being attacked by Angolanian soldiers, and the soldiers were firing from every rock and tree. Great numbers of them were squirming along the half dry river bed, among the weeping willows and other bush, sniping at the men on the earth works and earth works who gave back their rifle just as severely.

Those on the roof were not sure whether it was a raid or a general attack upon the Glandelinians, though the blaze in the distance told of the fate of some part of the encampment in that direction. The Christians seldom made day time raids, unless led by Walter Starring and Penrod. By the field glasses they could see that the Glandelinians far off were manning some long position separately, and O Connell believed he could make out the shape and bit square battled general as Bicknell among a cluster of other general who wore hats of many colors. And as he gazed at the turmoil of soldiers in the Company Streets streets below the bell of a row that every available soldier in the encampment was preparing to go forth to battle. This was no mere raid; a certain section of the main Christian army no doubt had upped the battle on the Mc-Wilther than gun. Run itself.

O Connell's audacity rose like happy line in his veins, and falling violet and her sisters what he was going to do and advising them to follow him and Penrod to cover them, he tore aside the splintered door, and motioned them back for a moment he gazed down the stairs. The bodies of those he killed still lay on the steps, stiff and unseeing. Outside of that no living human met his gaze as he stole down the stairs cautiously followed by the pale children, the Irishman holding his subra in his hand. He gained the broad corridor, and still he saw no one. He hurried down the stairs, where upon he had slain the first Glandelinian soldier who had assailed him, and reached a broad chamber with a single door plain and with a tapestry.

Penrod whose ears could detect a cat walking heard something behind that door and shouted:

"Look out there is something behind that door!"

There was a sudden crash of a mallet, a spurt of flame spurt at the American. The ball whined past him and he suddenly covered the space with a long leap, crumpled and falling biting fire behind a wall of tapestry and dragged it into the open. It was the general who had first hid him behind the alcove.

"Accursed spy," the man fought like a mad dog. "I guessed you would come skulking here with your racial christian dog kids-- the devil's curse on the cause that had made my hand unsteady!"

His dagger riddled through O Connell's garments drawing blood. Under his silk uniform coat the Glandelinian general's muscles were like fat wires. Not emptying his superior light, the American with one curse of his own hurled himself head at the other, driving the general's head against the stone wall with a stunning crack. As the general relaxed with a groan, O Connell left hand wrenched from his grasp and lashed upward, and the keen dagger he had taken from the officer encountered flesh and bone. The American lifted the still splintering corpse and thrust it behind the tapestry hiding it as best as he could. A bunch of keys at the dead man's wrist caught his attention and they were in his hand as they approached the carefully hidden door followed by Violet and her sisters who had reached the fight in breathless suspense.

The heavy door opened bound in a blackened copper could have resisted any onslaught even a little. A moment of unblinking with the men five keys while Violet and her sisters put themselves on guard to ward off any on came, and O Connell found the right on. He passed through a narrow corridor dimly lighted by some obscure means. The walls were of marble, the floor of mosaic. It ended at what seemed to be a blank wooden wall until O Connell saw a thin crack in the wood. Through crack he saw the door had been left partly open. O Connell heard no sound except the soft foot falls of him by the little followers, and was inclined to believe that the officer had killed had remained behind the treasure place. He gave the general credit for wit and courage. O Connell pulled open the door wide black of marble revolving on a pivot-- and he and the little girls who were in front halted short a low cry escaping their lips. They had come full upon a maze of which they had not expected to see and the sight stunned them.

It illumined a large shining pyramid of gold upon a row of diamonds in the center of the floor, a flat form that was a great round disk of pure jade. And on that jade gleamed tokens of wealth stolen by the slaveholders from rich people of towns recently raided, the amount of which was beyond the dreams of such slaves. The foundation of the high pile consisted of blocks of virgin virgin gold and upon them lay rising four pinnacles of most blazing splendor, many fountains of beaten hammered silver, a crown of golden enamel, many rows of pure jade, pendants of incredible perfection, folded folded ivory, innumerable diamonds that dazzled the night, blue rubies like clotted blood smeared like drops of green fire, shining sulphuraceous stones refused to accept the wonder of what they saw, and even Peridot and violet and heraldic amethyst, used as they had been to wealth and splendor.

perhaps had not come some enormous number of sailors permitted that notion though they of course were a little crowded, and they passed the water right out in the street. It was and the chief alien office came into the chamber. The officer a uniformed man, and he explained that he would not be returning with the men, and he promised that he would go home. He said one man came but it was not the one he had expected. It was the man who had come and he said that he was not the American and engaged a cooking like a great many other boys he said, in his perpetual work.

"He went on out to help drive back the Christian attack," answered the soldier touching his shoulder in so vile a manner. "He said he would and he to prove himself."

"May sir, ask of me anything but that. Hamley will be furious."

On the point of the boys knife spring out of the officers milk and tumbled forward toward the floor. The other men had halted crouching and gla

It didn't take long before the Vivian Girls and Penrod and the Americans had filled their pockets with the wealth and with them vanished in a final splendor the stolen treasures found here, no more make it appear as if it was thrown down into the bottom unless hole the American then gripped the big heavy rain barrel. It with a grinding boom something gave a way, the jade ring splintered, turned, tilted and disappeared, while from far below came a million splashes and the sound of water splashing in the darkness, then silence and where a black hole had gaped there now hovered a circular slab of the same substance as the rest of the floor.

Q. I was told that the soldiers were ordered to shoot at the Americans. Is that correct?

A. Yes. One of the soldiers lifted a rifle and took deliberate aim at the American but he ran out of range before any one could hit him. Then there came a voice:

"I am Maldeboob," exclaimed the boy, with a grimy laugh. "Put up your nose and hand; the blonde linap on my nose will soon be mine... then I and my sister are fled from the nose on last night, they little guessed my hideous snatched my coming... are my best companion."

"I was, all right. I can change my disguise and be somewhere very quick. I learned such methods in your country. My sisters have went to find me."

"Find him O come O Connel mentally echoed, shouting his outcry with the swiftness of a gliding Indian warrior. The American was something of a fatalist. He had come out of this desperate adventure with his life at least, and the rest was in the hands of God.

the smiling little girl came back into the barracks and locked the door. He then reached for the money money box. He took the gold sized box of money from it and put the box in a safe hiding place in the wall. He wanted to use the money but to bribe the Gemini away so that they would not search for Violet and her sister. He found in his chest a bag of money. They'll kill him. photos, sketches and letters and candles and lampshades were coming from every part of this section of the camp now. The Gemini were bellowing and crying out "surrender or no quarter". Gonzales told that they had smothered the doors of the houses and broken windows. A row of tents were already aflame and a big tree caught from them and burned like a huge torch the flames reaching high into the sky. A row of pistol shots crashed through the night.

From the first barracks having taken that they wished, they fired five times and went to a second to battle in the door. A number of pistols and rifles flamed in the barracks windows and six of the Gemini headed as they clutched at wounded parts of their bodies of limbs.

"See the hand grenade and the torch here," the leader shouted. Inside they had swift vengeance. The Gladelinians within died fighting. A first box was filled and filled and filled with money belonging to the Christians were recovered. Rich hangings were torn from the windows and walls and a torch tossed among them. Smoke billowed up flames ran around the room. The flames Gemini went on. Idiots after slight resistance were flung from the tents and a smoking heap of the barracks was left. The camp fire was death to remain and make resistance. Provisions and tables were left behind. The barracks were packed and the tents and the trees made the movement on light as day. The Gemini went on looking at their houses and setting rows of tents on fire making piles of what they took. The leader headed his comrades.

And finally they swept around the sector and to the barracks where Violet and her sister were held prisoners. Hoping to bluff and bribe them off Lazaga was waiting for them alone. Poor Violet and her sister as he thought and suddenly hoped he was hidden safely away. Alone and white faced, Lazaga waited in the kitchen doorway.

"Ho Colonel! The leaders Gladelinians asked, "live us back the Vivian Girl princesses. and you have them."

They appeared led on the benches that righteously took seat beside them. Thinking to pacify them and bribe them Colonel Lazaga handed forward with several bottles.

"We don't want wine we want the Vivian Girl princesses," one roared. "If he thinks he can kid us his blood must be thin."

"That is a thing easily decided," another said, getting to his feet and waving his arms.

"Mercy Night ride us," Lazaga cried. "The Vivian Girl is now not here. You can look around for yourselves. You can have this pouch of gold if you will only go away. I just brought it from my sleeping place."

"He didn't come here for gold or wine," said another. "Vine and good to gold to keep the little girls prisoners and us go away. Get those little girls."

"The other cavalry are here but a few hours ago. Night ride us. There as they are gone."

"I'm sure you are lying," the leader said. "Perhaps you may remember where they are kept were we to turn your backs."

"If you are Christian does then Mercy Night ride us."

"Where is the Vivian Girl then?"

"I have not for them," he said.

"Grab him two of you."

Two grasped him held him and compelled him to sit and stretch on a bench while another reached off Lazaga's boots and socks. Still another rushed to the fireplace and returned with a flaming bit of wood.

"One more chance. We are not bluffing, we mean to do it if you do not tell. Where are Violet and her sister hidden?"

"I tell you, I do not know."

"Count his toes," the leader said. "I'll make him tell as I know he is lying. I can see it in his face. Make him tell or remember where he or his men have hidden these prisoners of the girl."

"It was true the Gemini were not fooling. Lazaga screamed loudly as the flame almost enveloped his foot. The Gemini charged at the door to end and locked the door. They were now left alone to the Gemini. There in the room around them. They had a light to enjoy and this was a sin either.

"Bolt him," the leader shouted. "I'll make him tell as I know he is lying. I can see it in his face. Make him tell or remember where he or his men have hidden these prisoners of the girl."

But the machine other Gladelinians who did know that he went to the place and he had to get out of the place and her sister out of the hiding place and he was to get out from there and out of the Gemini. One of the prisoners had turned to and fired a pistol out of the holster of one of the Gladelinians and she opened fire, and a ball crashed through the skull of one of the Gladelinians. The other who hid her sister's whistled, astounded and coming up in a small space of the room partly hidden behind a pile of wooden boxes stood Jennie Vivian smoking, and yet unfortunately an empty canyon in her hand, she shot had hit a captain.

"Jennie for God's sake," the leader cried. "Something will turn up and save us. Run save yourself."

"Let my sister go," Jennie ordered. Her face was white but she stood bravely beside the pile of boxes.

"He is a mad virgin young one," the leader said. "Try to delay time so the Gemini get's here before we get off."

One dashed forward. The girl screamed and suddenly as quick as a flash of lightning so quick the Gladelinian did not see the motion a long blade went into his heart and he dropped. Another man was at her and he grasped her arm and swung her clear of the floor but she was like a screaming phantom and he saw her let go the knife to her wrist and her sharp teeth simultaneously sank into his arm. He held her against his chest, trying to carry her back across the room but though she was a little girl she seemed to have the strength that he did not expect and she caved a kick in the abdomen that knocked the wind out of him. He saw she was a wild cat and he was bleeding badly in the places where she cut and bit him and he let go. He again ran behind the boxes. The reason why the Gladelinians wouldn't fire at her was because the very high explosion in the boxes and though they would have killed her they would have killed themselves at the same time.

"All little neckles she devil," the leader roared. "All fire" he led one of them trying to scare her into giving up.

"Yes go ahead shoot the boxes," she cried. "You couldn't dare. The explosion could kill you all a mile away, and tauntingly she held up a small goblet of wine she had found in their and drank it saying

"I drink to you girls with the gallant wine you have left here for me and my sisters. To morrow we'll all be laughing at you. We'll be making you speak and let us wipe our dainty feet upon your bodies--for you instead of us will be our prisoners."

Jennie dared to say this though she realized to what her fear for the safety of her sister's had brought her. She knew she should have remained in hiding after securing the pistol but she wouldn't abandon her sisters under any condition. If it was not for the boxes it would have been useless, and unless she could secure something better she would be in more desperate danger herself.

But she must aid her sister's under any cost. The Gladelinians had surrounded the pile of boxes, but she screamed at them like a little mad girl, kicking at them and no deeperately threatening to turn over the boxes at no matter what happens that they recoiled in panic for fear she would.

"Enough with monkeying with that little fool," cried the lieutenant. "We'll leave her in here and lock her in. Find the arms of her sister's and let us be gone. Let her know what it is to be without them. We won't take her now if she wishes us to. We'll separate her from them for life."

"No you won't go," she cried. "You'll stay here and release them or I'll turn the boxes. Stay here or I'll turn them over" and she started pushing one of the boxes forward.

"Don't don't you little brat. You'll kill us all," cried the lieutenant.

"Please my sister's," she cried and being them back to me. I have the advantage."

She saw had and the fire in her eyes seemed to show that she meant to turn one of the boxes over all right.

The Gladelinians who had her sister's out side brought them in. Then Jennie Jennie said "live us your pistols or I'll turn the boxes over."

"Now you are joking," cried one of the Gladelinians. "You would dare keep your throat since your sister's are in here. We'll go and lock you in."

Since they were released her sister's caught into the game. If they threatened the same the Gladelinians would be cowed.

They all went to the boxes and threatened to turn them over. Frightened out of their wits by the almost suicidal daring of the little girl's and fearing they would rather destroy themselves and the soldiers too rather than remain in the main prisoners at their hands the Gladelinians complied with their demands and then were about to go out.

The young also did "find" the bay, and associated with rocks and clumps of bush. Off to the side was a bit of very tall grass. Then, from the background of the chidown came the faintest of a song, a soft, slightly cheery song he heard.

Down with the Mexican Brats. Down with the Viva! brats. "The rider made an elusive target. A number of bullets bucked at the bull's head. The horns swayed up and down. Blades were out and the lot was tossed to the ground, and the victim of the war again placed in the center of the ground and the Gemini made ready to finish his business. The horns swayed again and his sudden stride caused the Yank to miss his shot. Then the Minuteman, upon seeing the moonlight flashed from the blade the Gemini held, and also flashed from that of the Gladiolus, and then the lute flashed no more so that Gemini realized that the Gemini realized no more so that life and death that blade found an end. Gemini to his heart, another glance had fully caused to find his subject from him a snap to have a single glimpse of another subject, a firing at him like the tongue of a serpent before life departed from him. Then before the others could fire five shells and pistols the gray horse came down by the heath the blades again, and a number of shells cracked and bullets bucked.
One of the bulls with a Gladiolus snatched a hat from his head. He turned and rode back fearfully, his neck held high above his head.

"Now, with the little, vivian brown, from with the little, vivian brown. The "Back Christian dogs." The clungeliner cried. "Allow me to go to the little brat class."

And the Yank saw that he was holding the nozzle of his pistol against the ring's hand.

"This is the end for you scum" the American child.

"Then the little boy

"How do you know she does. A. Why do you not try to make an effort to get me your scout? Why do you not shoot our pistol and send a bullet tearing through my heart? You' self said,"

"To tell you from whence you came all of you" The clondellian caved. "Allow me to go my way."

"I won't go, I have plain commands" shouted the American. Do you prefer to see that I can you through to keep you for the soldier, y to hang Unhand that little girl."

The Glades lincoln clutching the straw liner and screaming and biting. Little Gid started his horse forward to withdraw into the darkness at the edge of the grove. The American having received a horse used it for a shield.

"I warn you, you Christians dogs. The Gladiolus called desperately. "Get him O'Connell. Get him," Jennie shouted. "Do not fear for poor Catherine. She may not believe her and he won't dare keep his throat at throat."

have done. The Gladiolus dropped the pistol and his hands slipped to his "holsters" he had no chance to tighten his grip. The Yank was upon him, the blade of his own dagger at his enemy, and the Gladiolus gave his last scream on earth. He fell off his horse to that same cith, to twitch a few times and then lay still, and the Yank put blade in scabbard, grasped the horse still rearing. Cut the reins who had re-grasped the reins and all rode swiftly to the Barracks.

"You mister is saved" said the yank to the others.

"May the Sings be pursued."

"But we'll revenge this attack upon us. Boys increase the fire. Set every tent you can ignite. Send men to loot the store."

Then the Tank had taken possession of the big gray horse and was riding in back of Catherine. Around the bend of the barracks he was followed by the other soldiers in the darkness there the men and the little girl dismounted and left the horse, and entered the kitchen to pass through it and come to the big room.

"For what you have done for us we must thank you O Connel" started Violet, but the American interrupted with:

"Say nothing little princesses. It is a rare privilege to be able to serve little girls like you."

"Our men fully expected us to be captured. But let us set fire to this barracks get the two men out and blow up the explosives. We'll show the so Glendale is just something."

That I had just been accomplished, the fires started in the munition room and the two men taken out, when there came thundering hoofs and wild cries and in from the camp high away swept Sergeant Juan Casanueva and his troopers and other grandelliquian cavaliers, who were with him.

Indeed these glimclidlines were ad mad as ho nsts. Into the night the calvacade had ridcen along the long dusty high way to turn into a side road after a time where the going was rougher and slower and make a for the scene of this tragedy. Then seeing no one they discovered they had been hood wind'd for the lieutenant had suddenly shouted and pointed; and all turned to look (the gook). Turning a great bright red glow tinged the sky for an extensive direction. And it was not in the south east either but in the north west for they had been going south eastward. It grew in volume and a great bill of cloud proper over spread the sky white and black..

"The camp is afire," some body shouted. "Just be that Prince Penrod is striking us with a raid again."

Back to the scene moment they rode this time not carrying their mounts. While after mile they rode uncovered, some dropping as behind as the pace began tell telling of their who sees. For the last hill they swept and it was for fortune they got far this on after that to for really in this to get story this hill was blown to pieces by a terrific eruption of or explosion. They were driven into terror and confusion and what of it was they were to see the dreadful flames and the billows of black and gray smoke rolling up in rolling jets against the north ~~the~~ north sky. Then it became a race with unaided feet, until doing the way, a sergeant appeared that he had a herd of being led away by some trick. In the burning barracks they dashed, a me to speed from their saddles, the sergeant shouting a demand for a marring to this the at angle, galloping across the company streets and joining the others as rapidly as possible. In the midst of their howls the su ser grant caught the words

"So they have done this," Cassara cried. "He happened to glance down a conveyance street."

"Then as they awoke, that Yank and his squad - on an 'ch Vivian girls. Capt. 'ave them shoot' them down like dogs." The shrieked. "I never there - as not so much about it; however to be done, the Gemini now more - name - our and mounted on swift horses - sneaked and suddenly red - through the glendelline in a lumb - way - my man - shining; or shooting to the night and left - they scattered the glendelline cavalry and even perished. At a good safe distance they stopped their horses knowing that the Alaudellien soldiers were too much to help fight the flames. At the telephone headquarters he saw a single man, the only one as they went out desperately to stop the progress of the flood. A little later he was at the headquarters - not a soldier - only but crossed as one.

"I am afraid of these little children," the man said.

"I am afraid of these little girls," the man said.

"Oh, yeah, you run like a cowardly covenor, you hid with the others in the dark, you did nothing to protect Colonel Tazaga, or help him retain the Vivian Girls as prisoners."

"Others are also," the man said.

"There's nothing to do with you. Get wine for the men and for these brave troops."

"The same adventure the American film shot on the trail after a most impo- and plan in a charming Christian home life. I had hospital after having seen it after a further little conflict at Violet and he mine's were safe from capture. The souvenirs of that cruel war and his he-ism in helping Violet and her sister and their father Pen-he had collected 'wo bullet holes and a slight case of und as severe cases of "Beautiful" toothaches, and he was certainly in ro condition what ver to go "acing" off to the enemy lines to again guard Violet and he- since who were determined once more to live in that the enemy intentions were to be concerning move- movements at "Indiana Honda. The doctor Doctor told him so and so did it the little Princesses and his friends and many others and ever more humane prisoners too threw up their hands in horror, but that did not change his mind. The cure was too strong. He felt that if he didn't go he would be out up by the saving determination to help the Princesses find out the plans, while for a chance that he and the other boy scout friends could stay behind with the Christian line and do what necessary military work there and brides all boy and girl counts now needed Tim's leadership badly. Violet herself had come across an official manuscript in which some spy had brought them concerning enemy's intentions to move to a Honda Honda strong body of troops to try and cut a rap in the extensive Christian lines there. The spy however who brought it to Violet did not know its value or the trouble it was going to cause to the Yankee, and even when Violet, and even her sister told him he laughed at them and said the little girl in a getting over cautious. Better stay within the Christian line and let me do that work for you. They had plenty of boys and girls outside the wall of their hill and thought they did not need the Americans either but even so they had him lined up for a unit in the event of success.

Most of the information that spies do give plays for no one cause or other. It always could be a great deal. They have to because of the enemy being so clever to read and make good use of it. It is difficult to keep deep secrets which the enemy would be able to make out and even more difficult to terminate.

half way through the volume, Violet and he insisted on reading paragraph about a nigger at one another's information. Violet said, "Minda, it was his purpose they believed to cut through the character line in that location like a knife cuts through cake or bread. Then on further education they under- stood that Hanley was up to something about breaking away from Big Girl Knoll and making a nice low and effective retreat and up the Mic-Victoria r- niss."

I If this happened the conflict would cost the loss of millions of lives again. Their desire or appetite for a frustration of this unusual thing was whetted by that story. They made a note of it for later reference and indeed it was a good thing they did. Otherwise they would never have corrected it with another, later ~~attitude~~ item.

 Yank (not Frank) saw the light."

The Agent knew that Violet and her sisters and their followers in their brave and painstaking way had covered nearly two years or over in the work of trying to see the sicked Magdalena overthrown. As said before

As said before the American suddenly saw the light. He put up straight in bad g dipp g dipping that at the red paces in both hands, shivering with excitement. He was wholly unconscious of his weakened condition wholly forgetful of the peril of these adventures. He saw only one thing. The African did a delicate brave little job in going out on dangerous adventures and why should he no

Hindia found it mean that if his plans were successful a grave disaster would occur to the whole Christian christian community. He went to see to it that "I told him he should never be so careful in their own purpose even if he had to die for it. He said later he ran in a telegram publishing writing a coded note to Timothy Grevson in another part of the Christian line. He used a code book that one of the Vivian girls had given him. Timothy Grevson and the other boy and girls counts had been with him in some other adventure as before this, and they had promised when they separated that when anything unusual happened up, they would let the one nearest to the scene know. As Luck would have it Timothy Grevson was at that time in his own headquarters. When he heard of it Timothy Grevson had no qualms about setting the whole thing down badly. No one else could ever know that the American note besides the code was so simple."

It completely goes condensed that the only message including the address only took four words, in part that the American tried him to get a number of good horses, ready and to assemble a good company of soldiers, and Jim could be glad to do anything since the American had shown no good character so far in his career. Polated by the excitement of going on a new adventure with the Division and the American, Jim flew across the encampment and started forth for the American and gone to see the Princesses. Two hours later he was in the outer part of the encampment negotiating a dark passage or a small boat across the river. Two minutes after that he was in the last part of the Christian lines. A hot bitter wind was sweeping down from the south east where a greater forest lay than there was now raging and threatening the forests of the middle south and west of Cuba. And ever coming now this way toward him a dark, cruel and feroce and at nearly full moon covered all the south and as same as a soldier's long at numbers forged against the barriers of the valley riding for a train to look them to some distant part of the army where they belonged. Jim asked the station agent when the train going toward the army where the princesses were would come.

"I cannot tell the old maybe late. Father is saying Red near behind. Maybe you will have to walk, but better stay here where you are safe."

That was all he could get out of him. If the "craze" had ever been in the situation this boy was going to be in soon you'll understand what he was up against. He was wrecked with excitement. The strange unearthly color of the sky bothered him. "Cool down," he said to himself. "The wind has been blowing like hell for the last few days. The "craze" was never in a house or in the vicinity. The station was so full of waiting soldiers that "Jim" couldn't find a place to sit in. It was then that a tall man in the uniform of a Christian officer approached him in the dark. It was so dark that Jim couldn't see his face, but by the light from the station for a moment he could see that "Jim" was a "craze" about. He asked "Jim" if he wanted to go to a tent on a long bar rack. He told "Jim" that he had just received a letter from a country by the name of "Legat" that in a few days was starting a new "craze" in the "craze" of the "craze" and that the "craze" would not be there for a long time. He looked at "Jim" closely.

"What is the matter boy, are you sick."

"I'm all right," Jim said, "but I'm in the truck." Jim let Jim lead him up on the truck and red clusters of lights which appeared to be a part of the city when it was all lighted up when the two were a hundred yards away from the station Jim could see the man only by the green light of a match.

Then he suddenly held out his long arm at arm's length and more than doubled his hand clapped out and came in at the boy's eye. Confusion should have been a result for that but he was not. Weak and hot and a bit tired, he took him on himself to collect his wits, and that instant was enough for the man, his right hands snapped out at the boy's chest pockets and something thin and flat as a paper came out with a wending of cloth. Then his left fist smashed the boy in the mouth, and he staggered back trying to keep his balance tripping over the tile as the whole thing took place in a split second. Then he was running fast as he could, a vague flitting shadow in the dark night. Jim dropped to his knees jerking out both his revolvers and emptying them as fast as he could pull the triggers and peevishly saying a little ways, but he finally knew he had not hit the second one. It was evident he had succeeded in escaping and that there was little use for him to follow after him. He went to the dark and alone if might be extremely dangerous to do so. Tim knew also that he would meet him again in some other place. Crouching in the dark, he felt of his pockets to see that they were all secure. He saw only a light. Then faster. Then practically his code book. The man had gotten it. That showed he was not an ordinary thief. He was a spy. The wind was hot on Jim's face. In a few minutes he heard a crouching or running foot and saw the sweep of lights coming toward him.

Christian soldiers were examining down from the stacks called out by the thirty shots Tim had fired. Tim notified the office what had happened and asking him to organize a pursuit heard another sound clashing with the voices and the pounding boots. The train was roaring through the yards down the track on which Tim stood. Telling the office where he was going, and to meet him there if he caught the spy the boy ran toward it. In office with a flashlight howled at him telling him which coach to take. Tim obeyed and kept on. The big engine clattered past him. Then a long car. The train slowed for the station and Tim swung aboard. In a compartment Tim reloaded his guns and shoved them into his boot pockets so that no sneaking spy could grasp them or know where they were. He drew up his coat collar, and slumped down in the seat. If any of the Confederates of this spy saw him through the windows they didn't dare come in. They knew that it was useless to search, and besides this railway was touchy about any one getting on or not in uniform. This train was full of persons in uniform and no one without one could ever get on.

Tim sent a porter out after the luggage before the train pulled out. At dawn he was watching his companion negotiate the traffic through the great company street of the Christian army where the violet and her sisters were.

THE HARBOR CAMP TRYING TO HELP VIOLAT AND HER SISTERS AND WHAT COMES OF IT.

THE BROTHER TAKING EXPERIENCE AND FATHFUL EXPEDITION INTO THE FORELINES LAKED BY GILLY AND COUNTESS TREACHERY.

My space is limited here. I the writer can only cover the most high spots or points (whether they're sharp or not.) Accordingly, must pick up the thread of narrative some unknown time after Tim's arrival in the part of the Christian camp he was seeking. The American Henry O Connel was in his own tent. Other nearby tents might have been the best, but they were too much in evidence, and even within the very Christian lines one can never tell who watches as you have enemies within the Christian lines too. I forgot to mention in writing that the American was about forty or more but he looked like a youngster. His hair was black but slightly gray around his temples temples giving the only clue to his age. He was a large smiling except when within the enemy lines, always the Continental gentleman and getting more and more in his character like the Abbeignians---and he was faster on the draw and faster with the sabre or knife than any other man ever seen either among the Christians or the Glandelinians. Penrod was the only exception.

He was upset by the theft of Tim's code book, because it coincided with the theft of Tim's cable gram from Violet and her sisters from his own tent, and a map and geography of his own country which he always kept. It was evident that it was really no foreign thief, that it was a Glandelinian spy who had guessed their mission mission and was either determined to stop them or get to the Glandelinian camp and warn of their attempt instead. It was quite possible that the man who had looted the Americans' tent and the one who rifled Tim's pockets were the one and the same. Violet and her sisters had reported that they too had been robbed, and Penrod also, and it too was believed to be done by that same man. At least Tim favored that idea. But how any one within the tightly closed and watched Christian encampments could have gotten wind of the thing was beyond Tim....

But they learned too as just as soon as they were within a portion of the fore lines that their expedition was suddenly common knowledge and though they were not recognized by any one all the Glandelinian generals were on the alert. The fact amazed Violet and her sisters and them not a little, and it amazed the American even still more. He suspected also treacherous conduct. Of course news some how or other even without telegraphic or telephonic communications travels fast within the Glandelinian camps. When at the time the United States and the Glandelinians were at the height of their hostility within the United States or other nations.

There is suspicion that there is some-thing like underground telegraph and telephone within territory occupied by the Glandelinians which carries its tidings all almost like radio communication as even to Glandelinia though radio is not yet known the Glandelinians seem to do it better than even radio. Many an army of all the Glandelinian armies and those of his father and two brothers and Glandys are the worst in that respect.

At the same time when they entered the Christian Glandelinian camp the American was surprised to receive a card from one of the almost totally naked little girl slaves. There was nothing on the oblong piece of parchment but large numbers that was all. Just 1000. Looking it over carefully the American showed it first to Violet and her sisters and asked their advice about it.

But the number came "VIOLET" Violet giggled.

Then the American nodded to bring the caller up. There was nothing else to do and the American and also Tim wondered why Violet giggled. So did her sisters. But the reason was, she was suspicious though she couldn't tell. This mysterious number was certainly the one on a mission of importance and she determined to watch his face closely when he came. In a few seconds "1,000" was standing in the hallway, tapping on the door of the tent with the handle of his cane. Her added he was a man to be afraid. This man with a smooth smiling face but his face was more honest and unsuspecting than Violet had supposed. It seemed strange a man would assume the identification of a number. He was middle aged, but he looked far much older than he was. He was dressed like a Glandelinian officer of high rank, and only his eyes were blue and in killing gave him away. And even his sign. A sign only a Christian spy well known by Violet and her sisters would identify and no Glandelinian could make a sound and. 2.2.2.2.2222222

"Come in and at Violet's invitation sat down but I did not speak until Violet had poured out a glass of each cold which she had bought at a canteen for herself and others, for him holding this before him he lifted it.

"To the success of your expedition," he said smiling. "I know you before you come here."

Everybody slipped their glasses down on the table and stared at him. "Don't be alarmed," said number "1,000" sipping his drink. "I'm not a Glandelinian soldier, and neither am I a Glandelinian spy. I'm not after what you're after, at least I am in a way but as you said. If I am to say that you are sure I know your mission left it suffice to say that everybody within this Glandelinian camp knows. If they discover you through your disguises God help you."

If a very one in the Glandelinian army knew---who, no one believed they should have called the whole thing off. They should have quit the whole thing hands down. It would have been his end. But thought at first Violet and her sister believed the same was off, you know how even we Americans are. We are too determined for that. We're invincible and let nothing stand in our way. Studying him further and noticing the children to say nothing as yet, the American leaned forward.

"You're like British. But British intelligence. That's right?"

"Right," said number "1,000." "But I'm not of England."

"Then what business of yours is our expedition?"

He laughed, evidently pleased with his role.

"Don't be alarmed O Connell," he pulled a pile of identification papers out of his pocket and spread them out like a hand of cards before his eyes. Violet and her sister also examined them to be sure.

"All right," said the American. "I guessed it."

"My business with you and the Princesses is in particular is prompted by a desire to be of help. And also---well one must do something must have a little something in return for service. Especially from you the American."

"You mean," said the Yankee, "that you want me to be like you?"

"I beg your pardon O Connell. I want persons of my kind on British intelligence," he said. "I don't accept bribes."

"Gunny for you."

"Quite all right to the point old chap. Quite. The matter I had in mind was of a rather secret nature but your reputation with the Abbeonians has always been of the highest."

"Always," the American smiled.

"For that reason I'm giving you help because I want help. I understand each other."

"Yes at least I hope so," said the American.

"Well," he continued, "we want information from the other side of the Glandelinian encampment. Of course not very much. Just enough to keep an informed of the movements of the Glandelinian troops above Ophelia. It is a rather simple task but unfortunately the last ten men we sent up there have failed to return."

You have a good blind that's all," continued "1,000." "I would like to send an intelligence officer with you. He will guide you across the country and he will help you if you should happen to cross the path of any guards up there. He would have complete authority to grant you anything the Abbeonians Government have to offer. He would do his own work on the side, and you need never bother about it."

"I suppose you wish me to do this with the purpose that I'll leave the Vivian girls behind within the Glandelinian camps," said the American soot of sarcasm. "Nothing doing."

"I'm not asking you to do it now. You must accomplish your mission with them first and when they're safely back in the Christian Christian lines then you can set to work. I'd not be a fool to ask you to give up your mission now with them for all the world."

"All right," the Yankee said. "Send him over to this tent to night with credentials. We are leaving rather early for the Glandelinian General's headquarters in the morning. All our men are in line and we have about eight hundred Gemini members and fifty fighting men who are to meet us at dark outside in the main square of the company, get Number men. It's agreed. But you got to land us all too."

"I will," he said. He left then, and it was the last they ever saw of him.

(A little later he was murdered by Glandelinian spies).

At three o'clock Jim came in and the pink and Violet and her sister told him what had happened. But he didn't seem to be listening to them. His blue eyes were restless and he kept staring out into the night below the window as though he wished they would hurry up and finish what they had to say.

so that he could get his work in.

"I was up to the barracks number 10 this afternoon," Jim mumbled. "I saw Violet had finished though she wondered why he was for the first time not interested in what she had told him. But something in the way he said it told them that probably he had found some clue. The barracks number one is really no barracks at all but a large court yard filled with old side benches and the like."

"I found that," thought would be an old man," continued Jim. "He was either a student studying to get a higher clerk or a soldier no doubt." Jim always liked to do the dramatic thing and so he left his remarks hanging in mid air while he poured and downed a drink to wash the road dust out of his throat.

"His supposed to be man was wise," continued Jim. "And for a reason he turned around to me and told me that the plans, and you thought would be found in General Manley's headquarters."

"It's a trap," Violet stated.

"No, I don't know why but I don't. His whole Glandelinian encampment knows what we are up to and the old fellow was just fishing for a good sized tip, which I gave him, and child slaves told me the same thing."

"You're a rascal," the American snapped. "That's the only name we can give dirty Glandelinians could get us."

"Keep calm," replied Jim unaffiliated. "I've been in the service ever since I was a little boy. I know a straight person among even Glandelinians when I see him and this old boy was one. He was supposed to be somewhat of a something like a clock and they can't afford to lie. One fib and their heads go off."

"One slip and our necks disappear from our bodies too," Violet said. "You Glandelinian traitor!"

"Admitted," replied Jim. "But for the sake of the country I'll do with the chance. After all our heads are pretty scarce."

"They are that sure enough. All right as long as you say so, I'll go over to that part of the Glandelinian camp with you, and, yes and say. That part of the Glandelinian encampment is closely watched for us. Am I right?"

"Violet nodded knowingly. "That's the point. But we'll have to scale the wall of General Manley's headquarters and get in some how. But if we see you Jim I'd stay here. It's liable to be-----"

"Where you little girls go, I'll go. I'll be as wary as you are."

At five o'clock they left the hidden tent and went on to his home back down toward that part of the camp. Ordinary other conditions the American could have refused to go on a secret expedition. But to get a chance to find out what was in his hands for the sake of the little girls was like nothing for blazing magnets of red diamonds, and the desire to help them also drew into him incredible complications. They robbed the task of their fear of an thing. The words of the location, and still whatever misgivings they might have felt. They were ready to do anything anything to gain the possession of the information as strongly as a treasure hunter goes for red diamonds. Ask anything. The headquarters of the Glandelinian chief was Gray and for abiding through the dusk. The grimy gray walls were of masonry and rough and fifteen feet high and the gates were buried shut nailed by the orders of the authorities so no spies could get within even if they did overpower the guards. The American had easily disposed of the guards and stopped before the gates. Scared child slaves tried to catch the eyes of these adventurers with the purpose of trying to warn them not to take chances to do that but they would not come close to them could not approach those high dull black gates before which the adventures rested. Though the others saw nothing the American thought he caught a furtive movement in the shadows across the Company streets, but he was not sure but yet he passed a warning to his comrades. Besides also his nerves were jumpy.

And if this were a trap they would have to fight it out desperately with lead and in that case that part of the now sleeping Glandelinian camp would be too hot for them. But the American was amazed at the certainty of knowledge which was suddenly creeping through him. He seemed to know that this was the place that request should start. And then Jim was pulling at his sleeve and the whole were hidden in a big jar of the wall pressing back against the gray stone, waiting breathlessly. But how very no one came after them. The sounds on the company street were the same. As Violet the American helped the little girls up first and then Jim followed. Jim and then dug his own fingers into the crevices and started up. At the top, no one, not even the American had lingered for any person taken a plan silhouette even against a black sky. The American threw himself over, like a pole vaulter he seemed to fall a hundred feet. But from his feet and against the store of the court. Kneeling he had been fifteen at the most. The fall of the stone was unknown to the court guard. The place of the fall was supposed to be well guarded by many Gladiolus men. Sentences but it was supposed to be deserted save for moving shadows. Perhaps they were caused by the waving of trees in the wind but as it was well known that Gladiolus guards at thirteen yards of a man's head in a man's hand, a hidden made the shadows pour with a dull thudding but not feet. A apparently death waited there across the court yard...

They could feel it. They walked forward on out feet, the American taking off his boots as they would have sounded like cornet shots across the store and brought challenges. A head of them something which was neither wind nor shadow moved and instinctively Violet and her sisters drew their most trusty weapons their long short knives. The Russian girl him self had sprinted ahead. His movement was quick, soft footfalls hurried away. Tim recklessly dived off in pursuit. The American was behind him striding off in a section followed by Violet, and her sisters who had not seen Tim go off.

Tim was so intent on his quarry that he did not notice. If the man was only a simple Gladiolus man, then perhaps by force Tim could persuade him to give out the information he and his followers had craved. If it were another perhaps the spy who had robbed him in the hall and tracks--then he had a secret weapon to settle. The big butt of a forty five was solid against his palm.

The American and Violet, and her sisters were lost to sight in the maze of buildings. Time large felt like hot coals in his chest. The man he followed suddenly turned and stood calmly waiting for him. This made Tim more cautious and wary for he could not see his face more than an out line of his body, but he sensed a smile on his lips. Tim broke slackened his pace followed the gun and came much nearer but cautiously.

"What is the matter with you?" Squawked the man. "You going crazy kid?" Tim stopped. The muzzle of his gun traveled down. He felt that this man had become body-less. Then suddenly he remembered the voice. It was that of the spy who had robbed him of his book on the wall road tracks. Tim with a muttered something jumped aside. But the man did not shoot, for instead he whistled and an arrowed a blank wall.

"Stop you thief!" he shouted so loud that even the American and Violet and her sisters where they were heard him plainly. But the fellow kept on. Tim threw the gun up high and sent it snapping shot after him. The report rolled through the court yard like mighty thunder, and the flash of powder had blinded the boy for an instant... then he could see again he sprinted forward. Here the blank wall had been the man was a strange up close of light. Then it was gone. The court yard bounds by solid stone was empty save for him. He gasped. A person approaching the wall he felt of the stone. There were no holes which might betray a hidden door. Nothing but blank stone. The spy thief had apparently been swallowed up (if not down).

Then he heard the American calling for him and Violet, and her sisters too in a manner as if something wrong had happened. Thinking they were in danger Tim went back with both pistols ready. It was a long run and he was surprised he had had as much fun as he found the eight. They were standing around a strange bundle of something, looking down at it.

"We were a little too late." The American said simply.

"Late? Late for what?"

Violet pointed to the bundle and her sisters nodded.

Tim stopped and looked at the bundle. It was a man--a dead man. He was dressed as a Gladiolus official whose uniform was decorated with sun and blood and whose hands were stretched out in front of him clutching at unyielding stone. From his back protruded something like a long knife.

"Too late the American repeated. "If we had been here a little sooner..."

"Maybe he'd been in his place" shuddered Violet.

"Wait" said Tim. "I know it all now. This was a trap. But they expected still that only you would come. Eight would be too many for them. They thought to put you out of the way so that they could either deal with me alone or seize the little princesses here--and too still they knew that you are not just now in top notch physical condition since you were wounded. That man I chased was waiting for you."

"Some enemy is treacherous then" said the American.

Tim nodded and then knelt down beside the corpse. Cautiously he rolled the body over on its back. The uniform was wet and sticky. They discovered that the man was in the garb of the collar of a priest. They believed that he was a real priest for if he was not then why would some one assassinate him like that. Then Tim saw something shiny in the priest's right hand. In an instant Tim had covered it.

"It is something that shapes like a Chinese Buddha" Tim said. "Wonder where he got that idol. I wish he wouldn't worship it when he is dressed like a priest like a Catholic priest."

Violet nodded herself and took the thing away from Tim and her sisters. It even it was small beautifully carved from ivory as stained brown by apparently countless of... every one were shaking with exhaustion and excitement. Juice who took it last accidentally dropped it to the stone pavement. There was a dull pop. They stared down at it.

"Ah, why Heavens the thing sounded hollow." said Tim.

Juice scooped it up once more and felt of the base. He shoved his finger-nails into every conceivable crevice into the creases which outlined the fingers and the toes into the eyes, nose and mouth. But the image was still smiling, still fat, still intact. In her anxiety Juice crushed it between her thumb and index fingers.

Ably the bottom dropped out of it--and across the flagged yard rolled something white. It seemed to be a small rolled up with a paper. "Hiding into one of the nearest buildings they went immediately to a small secret room. The strange maddah in Juice's pocket felt to her as though it weighed a thousand pounds--every pound white hot. Then they entered the room. They were so busy with their own speculations that it took them six or seven minutes if nothing longer to realize that another man besides their American friend was there. At first they were so startled that they instantly drew pistols but he got up off the bed and sat down his glasses. He was thin, short, white cheeked. He apparently was young and from his clothes and expression one would have judged him to be a real real a real usual tourist. Violet and her sisters had scarcely taken in his build and expression when they saw something else. A thin line of something something red across the right side of his throat. Had the American seen that he would have been suspicious.

"Oh hello there" he said pretending to ignore the rivian. "Is this the fact that they had with down their guns. You are Henry O. Cornelius are you not?"

"Yes" the American nodded. "Who in the world are you?"

"The man number 1,000 sent."

"If you are how did you come to be in this place without our first seeing you?"

"I'll prove my identity." He reached into his pocket, coat pocket and brought out a packet of papers, from which he extracted a note.

The note read as follows:

"This is Frank Milton. He will help you."

The American shoved out his hand and he took it. His eyes were level and coolly appraising, for all his young smile. The American glanced over his other papers and then introduced him to Violet and her sisters and Tim. They to his surprise received him sort of coolly as if they did not trust him. It was Tim who suddenly noticed some blood on the floor in the room and almost at his very feet.

"Here is the name of Heaven did that come from?" he demanded. "Look every body" he added. "There's blood on the floor."

The visitors and others glanced at it and the man shrugged. Then he pointed at the hands of the Yunk which were stained red. He grinned.

"I might do well to ask you--Fudge--if I should be 'also'."

"Somebody killed a priest within these confines" said the American. "He found the body."

"A dead spy" replied Frank Milton. He went over to the window threw it wide open and stepped back pointing to the cobble stone alley. They were only feet from the window and the American swung through and dropped beside the wall. The man had landed on his face and his sight was not at all pleasant. His skin was yellow instead of white, the eyes black. The man wore the gray overcoat of a Gladiolus official and that he wore that for such hot weather the American couldn't make out. He also carried a small sabbath. Tim who looked from the window had a few feelings. Frank Milton leaning from the window shrugged again when the Yunk looked up.

"He was here hiding when I came" he explained. "He tackled me and tried

[illegible]

"That would be telling" said Min. Hoff +ly.

"Perhaps 'Maid Jim' and I were with the American man and more so with the little girl. We have to get out of here to fight. There is a time for delay. Somebody else is on his trail with the purpose to 'garvie' and fasten on a false charge. They killed the man disguised as a priest and a real priest and saved him. They killed the woman because of their cash. We found it. He--" He stopped staring at the back of the small idol. The American stepped in up devoutly in front of his eyes. Then he sighed and looked up at the ceiling as though he read.

and in hopes we were waiting for them outside of the Gate nearest the headquarters would be the West Gate. The North Gate was of course the fastest and the best point of departure, but they felt that they would stand a better chance of getting away unless we if they used the west gate. The number of men among disguised Geminis was great. But the very number, excited their own secrecy fearfully to those who watched them they seemed to be all big secret. After patrol moving north toward the other later lines. The 3rd the American was to visit the Gladiolus company. The soldiers of Gladiolus design. The ones were in uniform with a leather pillbox tucked in between them. The step across the pillar is the secret of a gladiolus cavity name ability to slide and fight standing up. He broke his toes the back the belt and the possibility of falling off in a fight. They were out toward the northern limits of these experiments a long line of soldiers waiting human and up and apparently sleeping men. The soldiers fall to the side of the line of them could say that were in a very inconspicuous position. They were all like bound soldiers and their weapons were everything from carbines to spring fields and machine gun rifles. The American had nothing twice or faster than a rifle and the Division did not mind only had their revolvers and cavalry sabres and carbines, but with four hundred men and all Geminis in disguise, the soldiers also had their fully armed and equipped attack.

"Don't approach them," said Jennie. "That's an old ruse. They wait to get you near them and then while you are approaching them, they'll turn on you and pick you pockets."

affairs to bring out the scale and the proper perspective. However, if you might look out somehow she didn't tell any one at all where she had the map, and besides they had enough to worry about. But Violet did tell her relatives and also to constantly watch the two sentries. For she believed they were going to be trouble makers, put forth three hours a day that morning nothing else happened, and then they reached a pass about ten o'clock.

He wanted to know where he could pick them up if he lived to tell the tale and Jim informed him that they could probably push on right through the night.

"The shock his had and Violet he herself said;
"If any one wants to lay a ambush for us, this is the place for it. They'd have to make an open order change on the plain. This is the last place we go through and we don't want the man up there showing all of us up as good as dead. If the enemy does start an avalanche upon us we'll have the rest of it fixed it."
"You mean for Heaven sake you would rather be a snake in the dark?" asked Wilson.

"Why not? Only sound will tell them that we're coming and the loud pipes surely won't make any difference. They'll think twice--who ever they are---before they'll go through and tumble along a five foot ledge. It will all be over they fire and that's that--so effective."

"Why you speak as though you really thought you would be suddenly ambushed." "I'm positively sure we will be," some of the soldiers who had been with us were not dealing square with us and had deserted us. "I jerked his thumb at a grizzled sergeant." "Among other things I don't think he is a disguised German for he is strictly against us. I've heard something and if I can prove it he'll be under arrest. That could be very bad an attack in the pass. But at night--well you see" continued "I'm sure they'll think of their own hides too. And another thing. Men have been hanging a round our camp fires who do not belong to us. They thought I did not see them but I did. And though I didn't mention it I know who stole the idol from the American. And that one too has deserted. There's a plan worked up somewhere to wipe out the little girls for, know we've known and discovered despite our disguises."

Milton sighed, threw a foot into his stirrup and went up. The pony snorted and side stepped quickly. Milton a perfect Glandelinian off ice now in disguise raised his hand to them in salute drove home the spur and became a dawning sword of dust across the plains. The rest camped the night waiting for them on light they knew would come. They ate a regular easy supper. The moon came up twice as big as it should have been and also a strange color to it. At first it looked like a strangely colored fire over the horizons and then it was with them making the plain fill itself with shadows. The pass itself looked like a g unsight ahead of them and at the first glimmer they started to move off. When they had gained the entrance to the pass, Tim went ahead on the scout.

Milton had not told him wrong. He kept Violet and her sisters close to him. Less than a hundred yards from the mouth of the bed of a river started to drop away like a falling bomb. At half a mile the cut was merely a deep black hole. The path also went up because the way and the rivers courses parted at the L. They started moving the horses through, and the grunted protests must have reached far inland, and the hoofs of the ponies and steeds struck fire from the flinty debris which cluttered the dangerous and narrow trail. Above them despite the strange almost unearthly color of the moon it filled half the gorge with light. They were in the lighted half...

A quarter of a mile before they got to the "L" the American worked his way up beside him and they Vivian girls. "I don't like this a bit" he said. "Hidden enemies could sit over there and snipe us off. I wish we had thought about this before." "Too late now. Who ever it is that is messing into our business would hardly pass up such a chance as this. The ven treachery of foot somewhere. Even if he is just one secretly disguised Glandelinian officer he wouldn't find it hard to muster a company of loose soldiers. They would do it for the destruction of Violet and her sisters alone. But that is why I won't go go behind and let them too be behind. I do not fear shooting for I know they can't hit any one of us here no more than we could hit them if we answered the fire. What I fear is that the enemy would start an avalanche upon us. I want you to remain here so that if the avalanche comes we won't be hit. We could escape before it comes down."

Tim and the Vivian Girls followed by the U Yank spurred ahead of the expedition. Some of the other soldiers dropped far behind it, urging the d raggles. That move saved the lives of those more dead in this story. The first bullet came just as Tim and the little girls with the Yank rounded the "L". It smacked stone above Tim's head and went whinning on down the trail (not tall) into the thick of the horses. Instead of drawing Tim dug in his heels and Violet and her sisters and the American did the same. Their ponies leaped ahead. At their right they could see the dark abyss. They did not know what really lay ahead, no one even knew the exact plan, but before long they understood. Stone crumbled high up on the wall above them. It fell first sounded like distant thunder. It first came as a vague sighing sound doubling, and tripling into crescendo until by noise it threatened to blast them out of their already precarious saddles. The enemy had started an avalanche above them. Knowing where it would pass Tim and the little girls and the American rode hard forward to get out of its path. They were successful. Geodes of thousands of tons of rock and sand and other material crashed and roared down the hillside. Horses neighed loudly and men screamed as the torrent started to overwhelm them. Bedlam broke loose behind Violet and her sisters and their two friends. Being sure they were out of the path of the avalanche the nine drew in and flung themselves down behind the first horse. There was no hiding they could do. They did not know where the Milton knew of the happening or not and the anxiety of the danger made them all a little sick.

But each of them gripped their forty five repeating cavalry rifles and watched for other enemy rifle flames. Looking back temporarily the American himself saw a horse teetering near the edge. A soldier had hold of his halter tugging desperately at it, while the shower of rocks became thicker and thicker. No one time nobody could see anything because of the thickness of the dense dust clouds. Then he saw the horse start to fall his hind quarters going first. He scrambled wildly to get in range in his footing while the soldier who was fighting to free himself of the weight. The horse rocked back, then darkness and the sound of hammering rocks swallowed them and their screams. A number of guns flaring yellow white ahead brought the Yank back to the danger. Violet and her sisters themselves shot straight into the blaze. Four men pitched out from cover and fell turning over and over through a thousand feet. A forty five rifle slug takes them that way.

The avalanche quieted to a fitful rumble but the distant rifle fire increased more steadily. The moon also was high now and they could see that the trail, wonder of wonders was still intact. Most of the debris had bounced off an overhang but not high enough to miss men and animals. They did not care so badly about the horses, for they had become more than a bother than anything else and had served their purpose as a blind, and after the dirty treacherous tricks the hidden Glandelinians had pulled pulled no one could feel badly about them either.

"They're all gone" The Yank cried. Violet, and her sisters and Tim knew it before he told them but the utterance of the knowledge gave them a far worse shock than the witnessing of it had.

"Get on and ride" said Tim. "These Glandelinian devils are all around us."

They could have been clearly seen in the moonlight but they were going fast a long that precipitous ledge and they were a difficult target if not targets to hit. The thunder of hoofs drowned the sound of shots behind them. Once Violet caught the splinter of a bullet against a rock above her. They were shooting at them then. Some one stood on the trail before them. Without heeding the space Jennie jerked out her forty five revolver and held it ready. She saw a rifle whip up to the level of her eyes but as quick as lightning she fired between her ponies ears. A shadow tumbled through space, glittering when the moon struck the rifle. Heading down the trail they plunged with death whispering in their ears and with death tugging at them from below. The trail leveled out under them and led away to a plateau. They were far out on the plain before they stopped. The American sat with his head on his chest, breathing harder than his horse.

Tim and Violet and her sisters came up and Tim threw himself off his mount. "It's pretty tough," he said. "The Yank nodded. "Do you suppose they'll hit us again." Violet asked. "Tim knew she merely wanted to be reassured, but in himself felt all gone inside. "Sure they will. They did that to get rid of our equipment and our armed forces. Now they will be able to take us without much of a fight. All we can do is to push on hard and get to the Christian lines if possible before they can overtake us."

"But what about Frank Milton?" asked Joice. "I guess he will get along? We can't do anything for him now. Let's ride." Tim mounted and they rode hard again. When dawn came they were near their destination, and when the light was good enough the American took a pair of field glasses and went with them to a high point of land to study the plateau they had just quitted. Everything was yellow with a strange colored haze. The hills were craggy and harsh even in the distance and the wind moaned through the cliff in which they lay. Never before had they seen such desolate utterly wasted country. Far to the north they could see a cloud of gray dust which soon changed into a racing cavalry troop. But the troop could not see their fugitive as the Yank and his friends could. They studied the men in the lead, and soon discovered by the uniform he wore that it was Frank Milton. His eyes were set and his mouth was tight. He was riding for his life from the looks of things. Several times he turned and fired shots but did not hit no one. In a few moments he swung down into a gulch and along the hard rock bottom, losing his trail when the cavalry came to the place they first halted and the men looked about them.

Then they started on again but not in a straight line. One went down a side trail and the other galloped on a d. They missed the gulch. Then the American and his friends saddled up once more and they rode cautiously out to the end of the gully and found Milton. He looked about done in.

"Well did they find out who you was?" asked Tim.

"No, I never got near the enemy camps," confessed Milton almost sheepishly. "I ran across a body of caverns of the enemy and, nearly an all-around night, I managed to cut with a number-one and got a fresh horse or rather vice they would have got me. You can't fool those Glandelinian devils. They were going to skin me alive for helping in the escape of the little Princesses but by God's help I got away."

Somehow that remark about skinning him alive grated on Violet. He carried a self-inflicted tattooed mark of chastity on his left shoulder-plate and for the first time it occurred to her that to get that chest—a man would have to rip off her hide.

I the Writer of the author as you may call me am sorry that I cannot set down in description the exact formation of the land surrounding general Manley's own private headquarters headquarters, but if I did that I am afraid that a good topographical study of the ground would reveal the exact location which Violet and her sisters wish to be kept secret for their purpose. But I can tell you how it looked (not hooked the goods) They found it with ridiculous ease, setting at the central portion of the great encampments encampments of the vast Glandelinian army.

Why general Manley had wanted to have his headquarters in such a location, I myself dare not tell. I am not well enough acquainted with him despite the right of him to know his history that wall and for a fact, don't want to be acquainted with that devil in human form. I love him as well as I love a bed bug that keeps me awake at nights. You know what I'd do to that bed bug. But I believe nevertheless that he must have had something extremely valuable to his wicked cause within the Glandelinian camp and wished it hidden in a secret spot. So much in fact, he feared that the chattering mess if it were to make a general attack in that territory would succeed in getting those valuable. In fact, Violet and her sisters were after something particularly know that.

For a Christian general to capture important plans from the enemy was like possessing a king's scepter. Accordingly Manley had hoped that his headquarters surrounded by a wall here also would never be invaded or molested by Christians. He had no doubt caused the military valuables to be buried in the most hidden parts of his headquarters grounds. And a man as great a general (very small in my eyes) as Manley could be sure that his wishes about the safety of his plans would be carried out this way (if the (Not if the Vivian girls can help it he won't. Tim and his followers had expected a great big brick building to be surrounded by these walls, but instead they found it was only a small wooden building big enough to accommodate only himself. Where did he hold his councils? The under part of the house however was of stone not brick and the men who built it had been very certain that their work would endure as long as wood kept well painted would endure if not for centuries. But it was not what it appeared to be. Calverinians sometimes have a habit of building what appears to be a small structure when in fact the whole thing had been formed and really built underground. Most of it lay far below. This place had once been a big treasure building, and myself doubt if it would have been noticed from on high in a balloon—for it was the color of the green landscape, grass color.

The sight of the place made the little party at first feel a little afraid, but nevertheless once over the wall they raced pell-mell for the low open door the American pulling at the flash light which hung from his belt. Tim called to them to wait, but they called to him to follow but Frank Milton was some what afraid to come and did not just then. The thought of securing those valuable plans and frustrating Manley's purpose was too much for them. Ahead of them there might be an ambush. Ahead there might be age old traps. They were not especially dare devils but they didn't seem to care about the danger just then, for they plunged through the opening, and the American shot on the light. They had expected to see a room (not the boom) perhaps a sort of crypt, but all they saw was a long black tunnel apparently perhaps a sort of crypt, but all they saw was a long black tunnel apparently stretching into the bowels of the earth. They at first felt a little of raid et proceeding it looked so dark and foreboding but dimly glowing urged them on ahead. Their feet carried them down but they felt as though they floated in mid air.

The place was very odorous with age, and as they went down the passage they could hear the ceaseless drip, drip, of water ahead of them. The walls became damp, covered with a green slime. They traveled very fast. There were two tunnels there, and at the fork they hesitated long enough to realize Frank Milton had not followed them, but they supposed that he would be along as soon as he had hid den the horses. Taking the same ahead tunnel and not going to the second one, they found that it ended into a lake of water underground, and they had to go back, and try the second tunnel and found that they were once more going down but a little steeper and yet it became now steps on the descent and the descent was easier, though steep. After going a long distance downward they abruptly found themselves on the threshold of an immensely large room. The flashlight the American carried flashed over the walls and then came to rest on the partition far the away from them. Chills raced up and down their backs as they saw that sight. The thing was too utterly real, too terrible too gruesome. It was a demon idly freshly formed. It placed there no doubt by the Glandelinians before then, squatting on massive stone benches apparently watching them out of glittering red fiery eyes. He looked as if though he were about to speak. For his jaw was loose as though it could be moved before him lay a large platform of stone with grooves running diagonally down its sides. They knew what that was.

Violet and her sisters had seen these places when either carrying a round or having been for a time prisoners in child slave houses. It was an altar of some kind where child slaves are put to death for turning against the Glandelinian law of obedience. Refusing to do bed things and the grooves were made for the hot running blood of the little human murdered victims. At last they to the their eyes away from the terrible idol that looked more to them like some immense war god. A passage way led to the idols left and they boldly took it continually traveling downward. How far this lay below the surface they had no way of knowing or finding out. It would be a quiet civil engineer to determine its twisting depth.

The darkness seemed to thicken, yet silence reigned. The clanking of their riding boots on hellion stone seemed a desecration of the place. Then a rather large room opened before them. Its ceiling was high far beyond the range of range of the flashlight. The floor was level and black in color in the center of the stony floor was a sort of round something made of stone. They hoped then it concealed what they were after. It was a sort of crypt had been decorated with crossed swords and shields and spears, with trembling hands they tore at the head blocks. They came away with surprising ease. They threw them aside dislodging also the slate unconscious that they tipped their fingers nails from their fingers. But they did not have far to go. A sort of box had lain there at one time but now it was gone. The plans no doubt had been there, but was not now. Sure for a few bands of copper and a golden ring the vault was empty. At first they thought the plans they were after might lie beneath the crypt but the floor was obviously undisturbed. It was solid rock. They searched along the walls, looking for a niche but there was none. They stopped at the center of the room staring at the vault, completely baffled, for certainly this was going to be a job apparently for a spirit alone.

They thought they had better find Milton and have him help, suiting the action to thought they sprang up the ramp ramp two and the room of the big ugly demon idol. It is difficult to write about what they found there. Ten years after the thought of it makes them all feel sick and weary. They must have stood there for some minutes unable to take their eyes from the awful ghastly speech spectacle.

Seven little girls lay there. On that dreadful altar their bodies had been opened and their throats had been cut and the blood ran down the grooves to the floor and collected there in black puddles. The intestinal organs were hanging over the idol. They had no idea how it happened. Perhaps the Glandelinians had been there waiting for them and not finding them and yet knowing their purpose had killed these seven to show what would happen to the Vivian girls if they were captured. Perhaps wall there was no use speculating on it. These children were dead on this block and all the deduction in the world could not bring them back to life. I guess they went a little crazy then, especially the American for he don't remember what he saw. He only knew that he himself dragged the little gutted bodies from that terrible bed and that he found the plans. They were concealed in the altar by slight movement on the top caused the entire surface to raise up as though on springs. The American laid the children on the floor, Violet and her sisters were too horrified to touch them, and crossed their arms over what had been their chests. Then he alone went back to the altar and took out the plans and handed it to Violet. Then the plans did not represent anything for their purpose now. They had meant the death of these seven little girls. There were marble stones also loose in the hole where the plans had been. The American scooped up a double handful and threw them from him. They scattered out like seed. Some of them were sticky with the blood where it had leaked through the cracks. Every thing must have gone blank at that point, for the American remembered nothing more until he got outside. Milton was standing by the horses. Bracing himself against the stone doorway he stared at him. The sight of his familiar face jerked him out of a period of a thousand years old and brought him back to the 19th Century. He stared the Yank and asked:

"What's happened."

"Seven little girls are dead." The Yank said as calmly as possible.

"The vivian is dead. My god!" said Milton turning pale. "Impossible. How can they be dead. Resurrection angels wouldn't let him come to them."

"One of them, seven little child slave girls. It's a warning to us." The American repeated. "And I found the plans. Violet has it. Do you want to see them?"

His eyes lit up and he looked relieved. He walked quickly toward the American and down the tunnel. The Yank pointed the way for him with his flash light and he walked slowly after him. He took the same bend the Yank had, but the Yank turned him off to the tunnel on the right which led to the big demon idol room. The American threw his flash light on the Yank and he gasped, at the sight of the bodies.

The Princesses and the girls were hiding behind the altar. "The American said almost without intention he was so horrified yet. For a moment Milton did not seem to notice Violet and her sisters but only the gutted bodies. Some how for a moment the lack of interest in Violet and her sisters enraged both the Yank and Tim. It was like a blow somehow and the Yank might have guessed that Milton was used to such things but he was almost past the point of reason. But he was not looking at the bodies and seemed to be talking to himself. He looked up at the American and then at the others and in that instant the Yank was jerked out of his lethargy by the sudden knowledge that Milton had seen something they had not.

"We were trapped." He groaned. His face was no longer boyish. It was hard and old, end of vicissitudes.

"Get out of it," the American shouted. "We're two Christian men alone in this confounded country protecting seven little girls and their boy friend. We'll never get out alive unless we stick together for God's sake men don't look at me or us that way."

"We're trapped," he shouted back pointing.

"He's right," said a voice. "We have got you and the girls where we want them. Captured our plans eh. The girls will be like those laying there."

The Yank stepped backward while he could feel the hair raise on the back of his neck. But the trick was not destined to work. He determined that even the devil couldn't capture the little girls while he was alive and most likely men defy even the devil. His flash light sagged and in sagging caught and held a blue glimmer of steel in Milton's hand. The Yank shot his fingers to the automatic in his boot top but he was not quick enough. Flame lunched out from the waist line of one of the glandelinians. The slug caught the American in the left side just under the heart. But he was conscious of no pain. Only a terrifying numbness. His fingers found the automatic but he didn't straighten. The flashlight rolled along the floor, forgotten but it did its work well. It rested its icy beam square on the twisted faces of the Glandelinians who had come so quietly in the room and blinded them. Violet and her sisters were too dumbfounded to do anything just then but stand paralyzed with horror and even Milton forgot to act. The American however did not know that the Glandelinians were blinded only in the face and voice of the Glandelinian officer. The American knew he had found the killer and recognized the man who had robbed him by the same voice. Firing with a quick and fast deliberate speed the American blotted out his face. Then before the Glandelinians could think to act so surprised was they at the fall of their leader the American fired like a murderous criminal. Left gun, right gun, left gun, right gun.

A Glandelinian dropped every time before they could fire in return. A fire in return. Another sagged dead at the first shot. Lying he too sprawled across the grooves pouring his own life's blood into them. Above him the demon idols' eyes were thin and little. Left gun and right gun. The Glandelinians fell fast to the last man. This American had been a dead shooting cowboy in his day and this proved it. Then his magazines were empty and the click of his empty chambers was his signal to crumble. But even after he fell flat on his face he managed to inch forward and Milton helped him. After that every thing was blue but blue. The Atlantean with the help of him banished them the hole in the Yank's side, though he did not remember the member. He did so. Milton carried him to his pony and then they got him hastily away before the Glandelinians would come. Yet one scene will always be with him and he will awake at night to find that it hovers above his face. The scene of that underground room, drowned in powder smoke with the demon idols' red eyes glaring through the curdling haze. And that Tim knew now or knew instinctively then he knew for certain now. That Glandelinian captain and his followers were the murderers of those seven little slave girls. He too was the spy and thief. In some way he had caught word of the American activities in getting the services of the Gemini and he had evidently followed him back to his own tent and then he lifted the place finding and taking the code message. Knowing that he had to have a key—he found out who Tim was and what he was doing to help Violet and her sisters—probably in the Americans' correspondence and then came down to that spot in the railroad rail road tracks to wait for Tim's arrival. Then the lad came the spy had no difficulty in picking the boy out. This Glandelinian had disguised himself as a Gemini officer and had attacked the boy solely for the purpose of getting the code key which he knew Tim must carry. Why he did not take that belonging to the American he did not know. Maybe the Yank kept his in a safe place than Tim did.

But Tim's reason for knowing it was that Glandelinian officer came from the fact that the Gemini like officer stuck him with a fist. The Gemini never use their fists. That spy was also the strange person in the old books of Manley surrounded by the wall. He wanted the Yank to go to the temple because he thought that the Yank would go alone and that he could be killed there.

The spy then had killed some spy lest the Yank and then tried to frustrate the finding of the plans. And he made his get away from him through a passage which he could not find. When they got to another place Milton was waiting for them. He had found one of these Glandelinian agents of that spy the Yank, and had been fiercely attacked and in defending himself had killed the agent and had thrown the body out of the window after dressing it in an Angelinian uniform and slightly coloring the face. Of course Milton had taken the spy's papers. The sea-mon Milton's throat had been made by the bullet of the agent as he had tried to shoot Milton during the attack.

He too had stolen the old Buddha Buddha discovered that the map had been released from it and knew the force that he had to kill him and the little girls to prevent them from getting the secretly hidden plans and he did not want to fight fairly. Hence the ambush by which he did Violet and her sisters of their escape. But unfortunately for Milton he had run across a patrol of Glandelinian cavalry and had had to ride for his life.

Though it was not mentioned at the conclusion of this chapter he had killed the Glandelinian first who had shot the Yank just before the American fired on the rest. With the greatest difficulty they managed to get to the Christian lines with the plans. They arrived within the main sector of the Christian lines with the aide of a cavalry troop and the American did not know how Violet and her sisters kept him alive during the trip, but they did. Now he was compelled to remain in a hospital until he could get well, and they would now be without him for quite a while to their regret.

VIOLET AND HER SISTERS ARE PITTED AGAINST THE MIGHTY POWER OF THE HORRORS OF THE BATTLE OF NINDA RHONDA.

"I sent for you my dearest sisters" Penrod said with worry in his tone "Because there is a dreadful battle raging at Ninda Rhonda, and believe that the whole Christian line is menaced. See this report I received about the battle yesterday."

Violet who came first started to cross the dim shadowy library of their own and their brother's headquarters. Penrod their princely brother was leaning forward in his chair by the table in front of his beautiful boyish face drawn.

"What do you mean by that brother dear?" asked Violet while her sisters looked startled as they glanced at one another.

"I mean a snare from a desperate Glandelinian attack along and extent of forty miles. I think that last night while you were having your adventures with our American friend in which he got wounded but killed thirty Glandelinians and their aptian single-headed Glandelinian armies under general John Clancy hurried violent attacks upon general Viviananna's army and positions. I have a statement to make to Father's generals--also facts to back it so that he can keep a perfect watch upon all movements of Manley at Big Old Knool."

Penrod's voice became more solemn, and more grim than ever.

"This attack which also brought disastrous results as you see here her sisters could devastate the whole Christian line from Big Old Knool to here if it went out, and Father could have to move from Big Old Knool or be disastrously disasterously attacked also."

Violet glanced at the news Penrod had showed her and as they read it her sisters with her it sent a shiver through them, and also to hear their calm brother make such a calm statement and yet see the results with ten here by general Jack Evans himself. Glandelinian armies under their one time well acquainted deadened Indian enemy Clancy attacking the Christian armies at Ninda Rhonda on the White Mountain, the Glandelinian fury of Lebanon.

They shuddered at the gruesome thought. It was midnight--the night of March the 10th and a hot glaring night too. Violet and her sisters had while asleep in bed had been aroused by their guards and were directed to urgent summons to their headquarters. They had come by fast horses their own black ones.

"I don't understand" Violet began.

"Well, read all of that carefully" said Penrod almost impatiently.

They read it all carefully and this is what Evans reported:

"Dear Prince Penrod,

Warn your sisters of this coming danger.

Late yesterday afternoon suddenly without warning, there was a tremendous attack made by Clancy's Glandelinians under general Mi Chale and Tim Cacy and Casey Hund and like a cloud of men rushing forward to produce an awful storm the Glandelinians swept upon the Christian lines and poured successfully over the no kept in an instant that portion of the Christian line is enveloped by the Glandelinians and either cut to pieces or thrown back. An awful number of reports to lie dead and blown out of human semblance by the enemy shell fire preceding the attack. Panic stricken divisions of the troops recoiled from their works in panic retreat but were annihilated by a sudden inflaming fire of enemy rifles and cannon.

The main sector of the Christian front managed to stem and artillery covering the movement started a slow retreat fighting all the way. General Evans Freeman despite his wounds controlled the retreat of this Christian Christian division. Elsewhere the enemy attack seemed to have calmed every thing before it. For miles the whole battle front blazed and countless deafening explosions ended the day.

Men and officers rushed back and forth trying to rally their panic stricken divisions and victims only to be shot down by the firing of the foe. Even worse than the successful attack is the terrifying poisonous smoke which came from exploding shells when it strikes soldiers by hundreds drop dead in their tracks. It is a picture of hell that beggars even Dante's description. Smoke from great fires darkens the sky, but flashes and tongues of flame reveal awful sights that might better be left unseen. Heat and head heaps and wind rows of bodies of both sides lie on the positions. Those out of line of attack fall no better in the rain of roaring exploding shell fire and high explosives called gung-gang shells. Here are eighteen divisions near Port Camp beside that under general Roddona and they are wiped out with their generals killed or wounded. Every where along that sector of the line White Mountain and toward Ninda Rhonda a fiery battle death and destruction reigns over a startled Christian army. No one can understand why this foolish foreigner this Irishman thus his own help toward Glandelinia in this disgraceful of wars. He even they say got other Irish officers to help him train his Glandelinian army, and helped him out down the Christian but series at Ninda Rhonda. Even general Manley himself cannot understand why Clancy was such a devoted ally. Even the Glandelinian government thought it strange. The whole world is baffled even England. He has assembled even to night and moved forward for further attacks the best equipped army ever known under him. It numbered numbered nearly eighty million men and moved forward in this vast juggernaut that was to roll toward Ninda Rhonda, and drive the Christian armies before him.

He could withstand his might. He had however hoped for an offspring from this disaster by this fact. The main Glandelinian army was supposed to be watching every movement of your Father's at Big Old Knool. Imperovian wished to be sure this army would be kept occupied so it couldn't come to the help of Clancy. As your Father at first believed and hoped for the second attack Glandelinian army at first opposing General Viviananna was ineffective. He seized Ninda Rhonda and had reason to feel that his plans had been very successful. But even he as he had contemplated himself a courier dashed up to his head quarters. The first main Glandelinian army supposedly near Big Old Knool, supposedly engaged with your Father's had sent great reinforcements not to Clancy but moved in strong numbers to a point squarely across General Viviananna's line of communications thirty miles to the west.

Viviananna had burst into a into a savage rage and sank in despair. He knew he was beaten, that some one had betrayed him so secretly that not one Christian spy even knew this Glandelinian army had been released until it had cut general Viviananna's Viviananna's single artery of life.

These Glandelinian attacks were well advanced--Glandelinian style of attacks of merciless fury, and the entire Glandelinian army determined to destroy him. His food and munitions cannot last a day without provisioning from the west--and the west was blocked. He saw disaster rushing to meet him and he wrote to me that unless help came there was nothing to do but run for his life. Then attacked so fiercely they even abandoned their artillery, and every step of the way Glandelinian cavalry is harrying their flanks and rear killing those who could not keep up. A great many had perished before the fleeing troops even reached the point where the main Glandelinian army stood across their path on the west banks of the Aronburgs Run. There as the Christian Christian troops try to cross the stream the final slaughter is taking place.

Only a small fraction of this once great tidal wave of Christian soldiers ever survived this awful action. I have sent as many divisions to their support as before and instead of remedying matters is only making the battle a battle and the situation worse. Better late than never. It is too late. An attack may come there anytime."

your friend general Jack Evans."

Guardian of the dearest little girls on earth.
And their beloved brother."

"Do you understand now?"

Prince Penrod, the youngest brother of the Vivian Olds spoke more earnestly. "I do but I don't like it" said Violet and her lovely eyes grew hard. "I'll explain quickly enough then. You know sisters dear that some three days ago a unusual dangerous Glandelinian spy was discovered and captured out near Orbit Creek?"

"Yes I know that," said Violet, and only she did. Her sisters didn't and were supposed to hear of it.

"A dangerous Glandelinian spy, an agent of that Professional called the Professor. He has been the cause of this disaster to general Viviananna. He knew the strength of general Viviananna's army, and had secretly directed General Clancy toward the point of latest attack and Clancy hit like a thicket comet. I'm afraid if more successful the enemy headlong attack will go around our part of the army under general Hinderling and cause us trouble."

"Exc exactly?" "Per-did not," he said. "It's not near enough yet to affect us in any way I hope just yet--and the attack is moving onward too swiftly for it to be so soon drawn to us. To night the battle is some fifty miles away at about the closest. That's pretty close close enough to place us all in dire peril. peril. Only about twice the distance of Up Ophelia from here."

"But seen the spy?" Jamie asked of Penrou.

"No but he-a he-a he-a captured. They ma- bring him before my father."

They were no, standing by what is commonly called "French windows". To one side of the dark and silent grove of trees, a big patch of purple velvet, star strewn sky was visible. The stars were clear because of a strong westerly wind blowing.

wind blowing.

"Outward Ninda Ronda" said Penrod indicating by a map on a wall "Midway between Ophelia and Chamberlain is the new battle line, with the Christian line moving in a retreat toward the south---"

Violet, and her sisters eyed the map sleepily. They could hardly be sure that they identified it. Certainly the situation looked harmless enough, the battle was only a local disturbance--just one of the many battles going along any certain sector of a vast chaotic army like this one. But far away there were more separate blazing glares in the sky as if blazing suns were brightening the horizon, and one glare was very bright and very close.

They sat down again.

"Some of our generals here are not interested of course. Ten rod said. "They believe there is no danger and that Jack Evans can take care of slavery in time. But sisters dear, that general slavery has the ability of a general Stone Wall Jackson or Stone wall Jackson. He studies the movements of generals in the American civil war and follows their tactics against us. His movements cannot be seen because clouds of smoke from the many fires hang too thickly....# Fifteen miles away. He saw it with his field glasses. But it could be possible an attack is to be made upon Hinde-nine too."

Pen words were tumbling over one another with a swift vehemence. "G lavelinians coming forward in great strength to attack General Hun Hinde mines a ny here, to try and crush him too. Probably there could be that danger," said Ogilvie.

"Yes, and last night continued ~~settled~~ Penrod "there was small news brought to my generals by a swift courier - naturally you little girls probably didn't notice that. A number of Christian officers out scouting were all found dead, little burn and black patches on them as though they had been struck by a fire bomb or by lightning, and yet as a matter of fact there has been no thunder storm as yet whid you little girls I know like to see and whid you are interested in. I never seen anybody so intensely interested in lightning storms as you are. In these offices were out in an open road and the house wasn't struck by no shells. And General Hindering thinks that something unusual happened and that this is a sign that a vast Glendelianian army is about to make a fierce firestorm attack upon him at any time. When the attack will begin he does not know but if it does he'll be involved in a part of this battle of India Rhonda as we're also near there on this, I.C.V.I. - the San Ramon road belongs these Glendelianian soldiers and God knows only what they can be able to do under that general John Agency he seems more intelligent than any of our generals are. Evans says he's a dangerous man and surely your little girls know him well since you've experience with him at the battle of Lebanon."

This news turned Violet, and her sisters cold. They are brave little girls these saintly little princesses, with hair more golden than pure gold and yet afraid of a mandelamin soldier. But this Clancy a man who knew all historical movements studied the actions of all generals of the past and follows them almost scared them, especially to hear their brave brother Penrod saying things like these. The very shadowy little white fairy here suddenly to their startled imagination lurked with menace and they almost drew their pistols as if to shoot at the very light. These dawn opened French windows----that shadow over there by the piano----the glare in the south eastern sky the strange color of the moon,----perpetrate themselves and their courage they felt a cold awe at starting from every doorway they shook themselves desperately and prayed hard to free their minds of those crazy thoughts.....2.2.2.2.2.2.2.2

Pen rod and violet, and her sisters helped to their feet. "Good heavens that's Jane our cook," Violet exclaimed. The Prince and his sisters found Jane in the kitchen. The young cook lay sprawled on the floor dead, but killed, how? Not stabbed or shot. There was no wound upon her, no sign of violence. Neither was there a sign she had been strangled or strangled either. They looked over her with careful study.

of the leg." Stark turned over in his voice. The white stocking of her leg was ripped, and bluenkened and charred. The flesh of her arm had a little burn and spot--like one who had been struck by lightning. Pen rode mind swept back--the farmer and his family--they had been found dead this way to the night before. The strange woman came from the Glades--himans no doubt. Some of them must be here now. They had been binding down over the dead girl. Pen rode sprang up to his feet.

"Those confounded Glandelinian soldiers! They must have been here sisters, just a minute ago."

And sudd only they thought of their rifle guards. None of the guards had followed them in their rush here. It was a hot night heat caused by the forest fires. The kitchen door and windows were open, the serene star-light brooded outside. Benard started toward the door, then turned.

"Get away from her before it is too late and they'll capture you. Hurry for God's sake. Take a squadron of soldiers as an escort." He waved the flag of the confronting. The room was nothing like the room with its open windows seemed or really was empty. But what was it? Violet and her sisters stood stricken, gazing down at the guard forgetful of everything in the face of this terrible unexpected tragedy. Violet was the first and didn't come to until John shook her.

"Got to do something, get quick as possible Violet. Let's hurry. Stran Stran's death here--to us also."

The living must fight, not stand helplessly mourning the dead. Violet suddenly snapped out of their trance her pale face colored, their eyes her dark blue eyes blazing with both fear and fury. There was a rustling in the room. Violet still confused stood with clenched fist. They wondered where the rustling sound came from. No it was outside the French window. Violet ran to the window, leaped upon the window box and with a bound bounded outside on the ground. He sisters were directly behind her pistols in hand. They saw nothing out here. In the starlight with the dark shadowed grooves of trees close at hand they stood peering weapons at the ready. Nothing here!

Then Violet and her sisters saw the accursed Glandelinians, and also two men watching their movements. They were dressed like the dangerous Georgian Kurds something like the Ku Klux Klan but more hideously. A shiver chill and running like through their veins, the little girl stood stiffened, gripping each other with their hands—the men of them standing wordlessly, almost paralyzed with disbelief. Under the trees things like to see first as a moving. Then men. The pattern of starlight showed them like up right gray ghosts. Many of them were apparently over six feet tall and were armed like brigands.

"Why—why look Violet muttered. "They see the two men."

Close at hand there was a castle. In the starlight in the open lawn not ten feet away from one of the men one of the Glendelinians seemed to have seen him. He advanced forward toward him calling to his comrades to follow. Violet and her sisters were behind a ledge and were not seen. One of the men flung a good sized rock, but it went wide of its mark. Two Glendelinians struck against him. He managed to knock by a blow of a stick the rifle from one of the men but the other enveloped him with powerful strong arms. This soldier had a wicked leering face. Instant impressions. The man struck with his fist into the green sash. He was a very powerful man and his fist sank deep as it cracked like an egg shell. He felt on his face and wrist and put away his force on the sticky blood. The Glendelinian screamed—an eerie cry mingled with a curse. It's gripping hands loosened and the man was able to jerk his fist from the crushed in face and staggered back free of it. The wounded man sank to the ground writhing and dying. But Violet and her sisters saw that others were here. A ring of them now surging forward closing in on the two men. The man came an awful stretch in the air from something which was none so unbecoming. At a little distance on the ground they saw the other man rolling with a brown gray cluster of the soldiers upon him a mass of tangled fighting bodies and cursing filled the air. That man was a smaller one but he was lithe as a cat. He was fighting like a cat now. The ring of soldiers soldiers around the other man was closing in. Violet and her sisters could see them cluster and it seemed in the dim starlight that they were ghosts. They saw waving weapons like rifles—rifles undoubtedly though one glimmered like a sabre, but none of them were being used though her commands came from the one who held the sabre.

Thoughts were instant things. The impression came to Violet and her sisters in that second while they stood there panting glaring at the mass of attackers that these Glendelinians wanted to attack on. Captive capture him alive. They themselves couldn't interfere to help them as they were too many, and to shoot at them would endanger the men. Then a rifle shot cracked. The soldiers around the bigger man were standing inactive now shouting to him to surrender. But the smaller man on the ground was still fighting.

The tall man suddenly shouted:

"Stop it! Ah Ralph. Don't fight it is useless. They'll kill—"

With a swelling surge the gray clad men came at him with curses because he yelled. They tried to knock him down with their musket butts but his flailing fists cracked them in a tumult of noise. He waded through the broken bleeding bodies, flung them off but others came and tried not to bayonet him. Feeble soldiers. The death of one had had no effect upon the others at all even though the starlight grooved with their blood and ling screams of blasphemy. Then it seemed to Violet that from the hand of one of the Glendelinians a sort of metal something was squinting fumes into the man's face. The small even reached them and it was heavy sickly sweet so that they edged away quickly out of it holding their breath. The man caught the object ripped it away from the soldier's hand and crashed it through the face of the soldier which had been holding it. But Violet and her sisters observed that the man had breathed the drug fumes so they knew by his stumbling action that his arms and legs must be getting heavy. However he was still fighting—but abruptly it seemed like a dream. They saw the inert body of the small man being carried away under the trees by a staggering group of men. Then from behind suddenly Violet and her sisters were set upon. They were not attacked in the same way but something was squinted into their faces the same heavy sickly sweet smell. As though in a night move the little girl tried to suddenly run despite their finding senses. Then every thing depended to blackness, and felt themselves falling while the strange roaring in their heads grew into a great torrent of sound enveloping all the world. Then it too faded as their senses slid away into a black and soundless abyss of unconsciousness.

Violet was the last to recover her senses and found herself lying on the floor for some time something that appeared to be a big room. Two of her sisters were sitting on either side of her bandaging over her.

"Oh you're all right now. Thank God for that," said Jennie.

"Yes I believe I'm all right," she replied. "I guess so. With a little more rest I'll be strong enough to struggle to sit up." "Oh, where are the others?"

They were in a Glendelinian barracks building in a large but dark all like room. None of them had been injured, they had only been drugged, and now it was wearing off. They were alone in the room, and how the Glendelinians did not as parents them as is usual the case was a mystery. Only a few pieces of old time fashioned furniture perhaps a century or more old were here. There was a metal door slide but it was locked.

Jennie had already investigated that in one wall opposite the big door was an oval bulls eye porthole. Brilliant starlight was streaming in. It was the only light in the room.

"Where are the Glendelinian camp," Jennie said. "The Glendelinians brought us here kidnapped us from the Christian camps. The camp of the future is imminent. Come sisters I'll show you." Jennie gestured toward the small window.

Dizzily Violet gained herself with her sisters. She was horribly weak, and sick, her head still heavy and whirling.

"I and my sisters were knocked out like you," Violet said. "Jennie said to us construct events. But how I came to find I do not know but how it seems hours ago and that we slept into another night. Nobody has been here. But as we are in a Glendelinian encampment all night. Those soldiers must have discovered where we have been hiding and snatched upon us from behind."

The sight from the window was amazing. The sky in the east and south east was as aglow as if the world in that direction had become molten and was boiling molten matter into space. The stars were in the sky but looked red. The glare itself in the straight southeast shone with an amazing bright yellow almost golden brilliance against an firmament like dead black cloud like black infinity of space without stars. The glare was away where in that direction in the north east too but they could not see any smoke rolling up and just the glare and my wasn't it hot.

"I figure we must be coming near to the end of the world," Violet said. "I wonder if that is coming forward menacing this part of the country. It looks like it is as we can see it better from here than elsewhere. I figure that's the main fire over the sea," she pointed.

The main part. Of course it was. Violet had her eyes now, and she was puzzled.

But how were Violet expostulated. "How did we get so far away from the Christian chetian lines so soon just while we have been unconscious. For this camp is strange to us as if it belongs to another Glendelinian army. Where in the world are we? Where is the Christian camp?"

"How I know," Jennie scowled. "But you can guess. Say are not my sisters pretty hungry and thirsty?"

Thinking of it they were, so thirsty. That was not the worst of it, and they were very strangely weak.

"My guess is that the strange dream we took in threw us into catatony," Jennie said. "Expanded animation out of which we just recovered in to night."

"To night," Violet gasped.

"Sure to night. I think we have been unconscious for over twenty four hours. Maybe longer."

It was true. They had been within the Glendelinian camp for over twenty four hours since captured. They were only about two miles away from the Christian lines and what was left of the Christian lines was a wreck. For this was in the possess possession of the enemy who had attacked it from all quarters and a good portion of the Glendelinian army was chasing after the retreating Christian armies, and trying their best to catch it. Already the pursuing Glendelinian army was catching up to the pursued and Maxwell in two wide floods.

Violet and her sisters had been by the window perhaps five minutes or more when there was a noise behind them. They swung tense alert to see the door way sliding in the dim aperture a gray shaped thing stood peering.

peering with an out stretched arm holding the partly open door slide it gazed in at the seven little prisoners, and they stared back at the Glendelinian soldier. Violet saw it suddenly not as a soldier but as a ghost.

Violet saw it not as a soldier but more like some ghost a travesty of a man in that gloom. Something like a gray shadow but still it seemed human. The words came stern and loud from the soldier it was harsh and cruel but the words were grave threat in the sound.

"You little snakes die to night within another half an hour by shot execution."

Then the Glendelinian soldier, Violet and her sisters could not hardly think of it as a man in such a gloom came swiftly into the room. With his right hand he fumbled at his belt.

Violet said tensely:

"Don't you dare try to kill us. Our Father won't give you a miss any gun shot to if you do."

The Glendelinian soldier paid no attention, the hand only coming from the belt and drawing forth a small bottle of something, and Violet was lax.

"Good! How are sisters?" she said. "I guess it is something he wants us to drink in order to poison ourselves. Don't take it."

They refused it. At the door the others of the Glendelinians were standing. They held weapons in their hands—small revolvers, but they were all smiling.

the next of a monkey's of a g. In.. and the one in the room made a gesture of drinking.

"Don't make a move. If we anger them they can kill us in a second."

The man however did not look as cruel as he was. He was tall and stout and handsomely uniformed and his chest hung with metal ornaments, a profusion of medals, to dignify his high office.

He sat like a King in the chair. The general was regarding the little girls steadily. To Violet the silence became insupportable. She burst out impulsively almost angrily.

"Can't you speak? What do you want of us whom your men unjustly kidnapped from the Christian lines?"

In the high hergish voice burst out like a bomb. It made the general in the chair turn white with anger and the guards beside Violet and her sisters leaped forward presenting bayonets to them and ordering them to keep their mouths shut until spoken to first. Violet gave one of the guards such a cold look and slapped him so hard that his weapon came up level at her head, and then as for a tender moment she did not move the guards relaxed with curses.

Justice expelled a long breath.

Then the ruler spoke to his own men. One of them leaped lightly to the platform.

And now Violet and her sisters saw a rack up there a row of what seemed to be large test tubes. There were ten with wires connecting with them. The light shone on them as the guard carefully lifted them and hung them like a circle around the little girls at one time. The connecting wires leaped and fastened them, and the light shone more clearly on the tubes now.

A wire was placed around them with connections for their legs. A looped electrode was at the end of each. And the guards were about to fasten them to the foreheads and arms of the prisoners. Violet and her sisters could help it they winced. They muttered cries of protest. But they were seized and held and they stood billigrent gazing wild eyed at their tortments.

Their senses whirled. Were they really to face death this time in the form of electrocution? They felt the electrode touch their foreheads and their whole instinct was to cast it off. To fight, to go down fighting. But that would end in worse death and there were too many men to battle. They prayed harder than ever standing stiff and tense, Violet watching in terror the wire fastened now around Jennie's head. The little girl was panting, her face pale, her fists clenched. They thought of how painful would be broken hearted when they thought he would hear of their death. For his sake and their fathers they begged God to come to their assistance!

VIOLET AND HER SISTERS ARE ELECTROUTED.

The electrode was cold on their foreheads. They snapped together with a click. The guard stood away while the general in the chair had a hand on a switch level or lower and quickly he pulled it. Violet and her sisters together felt a searing of the senses and every muscle in their bodies was taut braced against the shock. On elsewhere in the electric chair the condemned criminal doubtless felt like that as he waits for the shock of dying. But Violet and her sisters felt only a wave of dizziness. The vision of the dark and the general receded before them, but they were not dead, even hurried. Violet saw Violet standing still wild eyed—and then on her face when she found she was still alive an expression of wonder and great relief and no doubt she seemed to utter a prayer of thanksgiving. A minute passed while neither of the little girls dared to move. They were aware of the hum of the current, vague as though it were not audible to her ears but sounding in her head in their heads.

Every thing was vague, and abruptly they were conscious that only their thoughts were wandering. Dilled. They fought to think clearly. But it seemed as if this current were sapping their minds, draining it so that they were blunted, passive, quiescent, almost stripped of their ability to think. The Glendelinians were astonished that the current which was four thousand volts didn't do the job. Seeing it did no good the general had moved the switch again. The current was off now, but the guards examined the connections and found that on the little girls they were not properly connected. Ah that explains it. Every thing was done to the perfection now and the current again turned on.

This time results were "beautiful." For sure the connections were all right the wires were good and every thing electrical perfect as if they came from the factory but it was the same as before. They were not suffering electrocution. The Glendelinians wondered why and got scared. The general shut off the current and said:

"Confound it! I have it now."

"What's wrong?" asked a Colonel.

"You can't kill them little brats. Electricity won't kill angels and they're angel possessions! I heard about it. You were fools to capture them. That'll mean bad luck for us all."

The general spoke haltingly with his queer Irish accent.

Violet gasped but said nothing.

"You mean," continued the colonel, "that these little guttersnips are protected by angels?"

"Yes they are. I've gleaned the knowledge from some one. I'm afraid to touch them. Get them back for the angels. Take off those confounded wires. I turned on ten thousand volts and they're not injured."

Violet and Jennie passed a hand across her forehead as the band was gone. For a moment there seemed to be a surge of movement within her head. There fell a great silence. Violet and her sisters now accepted the fact they were angel possessed. The instinct of life even when we are good beyond believing and of personal personal safety in strong in every human. Their thoughts swept into questions of how they might escape out of this. Though angel possessed they could not escape always miraculously though they often did. If they could get control of that small one a plane they seen out side if only—

"But angel possessed or not you cannot escape," the general said. "I read your thoughts. Foolish little Christian dog."

"What do you want of us you kidnappers?" Violet burst out. "Are Glancy. We don't remember ever mentioning you, a foreigner taking side with the Glendelinian cause a wicked renegade Catholic as you are."

"I'm not Glancy, don't know the man. As you are spies I wanted to condemn you to death by electrocution without trial as enough evidence is against you little brats. I have it now that you are angel possessed, but that is no sign you can escape. I know all the intricacies of their army. I'll help Manley get through from Big Old Knoll and you fathers won't be able to stop me. I'll hold you until the war is over put you among child slaves and see if the angels can save you from that."

His voice droned on. He talked slowly, carefully, as though his purpose was not so much to inform as to pitiable plunders, as to threaten them with death another way besides the former. Violet and her sisters knew what was to occur but for not only from the note they had gleaned from Evans but from what they had learned in the paper they had captured in the idol room. It was positive that general Glancy was about to crush the whole Christian army army confronting him. Unless something was done they knew how easy Glancy would win his attempt. Every thing was ready. All sections of general Glancy's army was already heading for the drive. The battle which had raged for days already was rapidly growing in fury, and now it was reported to be raging very hotly. Unseen by Christian spies batteries of Glendelinian cannon was being placed where they were never expected to be placed.

Amazing news for the battle beyond description. A amazing horror of the battle beyond description. All Christian divisions that could have been spared by General Evans and Henry were fighting the Glendelinian advance now.

And other unusual things were going on and most of the Christian territory was already overrun by Glendelinian soldiers victorious in the extreme. The pileons defeat at Mount Lebanon in Jerusalem was nothing in comparison to the disaster happening to the Christian armies now. The whole of the Christian army of General Viviananna seemed doomed, plus with the almost total success of the past battle of Lebanon Glancy's army was spreading forward now into last growth of victory and movement despite the accustomed heat of the times produced by the Eastern Calverinian forest fires which had brought it about that there had been no winter that year.

A brave Christian general attacked by no many Glendelinians ready now to overwhelm it. And the dreadful forest fires as fierces as infernal fires of hell—though past months fierces as they had been then just enough to keep winter weather away and keep the whole world sky smoky, and spilling the frigidity of even Abyssinikilian and Northern Argentinian State winters were spreading eastward now. Even caused by the forest fires infernal gases were expanding under pressure in caverns far underground, and at any moment they might ignite and burst forth.

Calverinia seemed doomed indeed. Violet and her sisters stood amazed. The enemy under Glancy must be stopped. They must escape, get out of this predicament. That small one plane they had seen—if only they could seize it for they knew how to operate it and it had a cockpit big enough to hold more than seven of the men. It was an observation plane, wild useless plane, but they were better than none, and in them Violet and her sisters also presently seemed to see a nationality. A course of action, desperate desperate desperate but at least possible of success. Violet asked Violet in a low whisper but in English in case she was overheard:

"What's the plan you said you noticed that could rescue us if we not any with the airplane."

"It is quite new here. you would call it an English mile. It is better we could seize that!"

"The airplane though is closer than that!"

"No. I saw them moving it to some other spot for fear I suppose we'd get it if we managed to escape. If we can get away it is best we take the airplane."

"But with shots the enemy could puncture the bag," said Cathrine. "I vote we escape in the airplane and nothing else. How can you know they'll have the advantage if we take the ship because of that old bug? If they puncture it it'll mean our death. The airplane is too small to hit at a distance. The bag is an easy mark on the airship. Then to keep the general guessing Violet said curtly; "And you idea is to help that rascally Glancy devastate our Father's army!" "How do you know that?" the general said sternly. "Have the crazy angels told you. Well if so then of course. You couldn't stop information that is already being done so I'll gladly tell you. You must lose in the end so that Glandelinia can dominate the world and free it of all Christian races."

Unusual reasoning so unusual that Violet and her sisters in spite of the peril couldn't help giggling and Violet said;

"You might as well capture the moon."

His face twisted into a monstrous smile.

"So you think little brat it can't be done eh. Glancy has the armies and has the weapons. We'll win in the end."

Again Violet and her sisters realized that their thoughts were open to this antagonist. Up to now the Glandelinian general had been so interested in his own plans that his mind had not yet become aware of the thoughts of the little girls. But Violet and her sisters were afraid that would come. But the Glandelinians here couldn't speak any English and any how Violet and her sisters could do no more than give each other a significant glance. This confounded wire on my forehead," once said abruptly "It keeps my mind all confused. If you soldiers are any kind of gentlemen I wish you would take it off seeing you cannot elude me any how my sisters."

Jennie and her sisters took the hint.

"You've got enough of the fact that elude me and we don't take have you not." Violet asked.

"The Glandelinian general nodded.

"Yes I think so. Might as well we move it for if we take you elsewhere elsewhere you cannot restrain that thing! But there is more than one way of execution and we'll see soon whether the angels can prevent that or not."

The general signalled to the guards, and they reluctantly moved the wires.

"Thanks" Jennie smiled.

"You have nothing to thank me for" the general retorted. "I've moved them at my own free will not to please you."

But the little girls did not pay any attention to that remark. They thought now to be a chance of escape---if she and her sisters could manage it. Violet saw Jennie's eyeing her, puzzled realizing that she had some plan.

But they knew that the Glandelinian general spoke English being an Irishman and Jennie could do no more than give Violet a significant glance.

"You want to know how the general Glancy will devastate your armies at any minute if not doing it now. All his cannons would not do it very quickly---you have perhaps seen all our weapons operate. Not with weapons or charges but with clever tricks he'll defeat you. He knows all history your generals don't."

Violet and her sisters were hardly listening. If only she and her sisters could be alone here with this crazy Irishman. If they could seize him he in the grasp of the seven of them would be helpless big as he was. He did not seem to have any real trusty weapons which they could take from him but they could at least try their phylloxera powers. If only they could seize him.

Jennie gestured at the big group of men who stood close at hand curiously watching the scene. She was thinking of some plausible reason for the general to dismiss them. So she said;

"I hate the smell of your men's bodies. They must never take baths they smell so salty and sour. And they stand so close."

"O Yes it's your plan to put something over on me and make an escape" said the general. "Since the possession angels protect you so strangely I won't make any further attempts to kill you but you're not going to get free. We will leave here presently."

He stopped. He turned his head as though listening. He had heard something which Violet and her sisters in their own excitement had not yet heard. And the guards were aware of it. They stood stirred uneasily, and one of them murmured with excitement. The sound obviously.

The sound obviously was swiftly intensifying. Violet heard it first now a sort of distant commotion and also a noise of very intense fury of firing of mostly rifles mingled with cries screams as if ghosts were in the air. There was also a loud rustling and scratching sounds, and the hiss of flames.

A fierce counter-attack upon the Glandelinian encampments. A tumult of frenzied strife and the attackers were setting the camps on fire. It grew rapidly in volume. Approaching somehow or other Violet and her sisters had an instinct that their brother Penrod must have heard of their capture and was making another desperate raid to recapture them. The Glandelinian general stood on his feet scowling. His face was so contented with rage. He shouted at the guards.

"Grab the little brats."

"What's the idea?" demanded Violet.

"We got to get you out of here so the Christian dogs cannot rescue you" and a guard seized the little girl by the shoulder. Violet screamed.

"You hurt me."

"I don't care the man shouted. "There's an attack upon us and you're responsible for no doubt they have come to your rescue. These accursed Christian dogs coming here, we'll have to break through them."

The wild commotion was much closer now. It came from the left of the camp and then too was heard on the same side of the house and also within where the door was opened into corridors.

The general gestured.

"We can go the other way with the prisoners. There is a door there and we---"

He suddenly stopped staring down the length of the room. Violet and her sisters hopefully followed his gaze. From the open door they could see the full stretch of the corridor. At the distant door through which they had entered a great number of men were bursting through wearing purple uniforms some carrying torches. They immediately spread forward over the room floor demanding the general to surrender and hand over the little girls to them. That way of exit was cut off.

"Can't stay here and be captured" the general snapped. "Those Christian dogs will fill this big room in a minute."

He reached down, and with his left arm he scooped up the Vivian Girl girl closest to him. He struggled and screamed and tried to bite him and kicked but he avoided all that. For a moment it produced an unnatural terror in the little girl to be captured by an Irishman whom she always heard whether good or bad you could never lick. Or put anything over on her screamed again;

"Put me down, put me down you Irish dog. Put me down."

"But up or I'll choke you to death." the Irishman said grimly, swiftly. "If the camp is captured I'll get away to Menloes with you on my Airship."

"Come on quick general" one of the colonels cried. "We'll be trapped here and the little brats rescued. Those cursed Irish Christian dogs."

The Glandelinian soldier had already instantly spread over the room floor and were rushing forward threatening the Glandelinians with their bayonets. Through the doors to the left abruptly came sprawling figures in screaming yelling combat---the Glandelinian soldiers with the Christians attacking them. Violet and her sisters had only a glimpse of their rescuers the silent room becoming suddenly a chaos of battle horror over which the general was shouting;

"Come follow me with your prisoners. We'll outwit the Christian dogs."

With the struggling little girls under their arms the general and his men sped from the gruesome turmoil of the cave through a wide doorway and plunged in to the dimness of an ascending tunnel.

They ran and ran desperately, while there seemed a vigorous pursuit of Christian soldiers behind them. But ahead lay only a dim silence of upward slope. Shots sounded behind them and one of the Glandelinians who held Violet yelled and dropping her fell on top of her with a mortal agony. Blindly the other Glandelinians with their arms fixed back and heard yells of pain in return. Another then grasped Violet who had freed herself from under the dying man and ran on but only to fall himself shot through the heart. But that did not mean the little girls would be free.

The Glandelinian general bent down.

"Won't tell you a second time to stop your struggling." he said in such a tone of voice that she knew he really meant it and desired in his heart to kill her now to escape more easily. I am so strong a man I can kill you with a squeeze of my arm around your neck. You know that?"

"Yes I know it."

"And if I let you loose you cannot escape from my fellow men. They'll kill you more willingly than I would."

That silenced her captive. She had no fear of Glandelinians but an Irishman wicked or good would defy the devil and hell and mean it so dangerous is he. The general turned to one of the men.

"Want you to direct us to your Airship. Hurry."

"All right sir."

"The end of the tunnel." Some one called. "The persuaders are far behind."

The general stopped and in a moment the colonel was beside him....

However it was found out that not one of the men could operate this. "You girl have the knowledge you can operate this?" the sergeant panted. "Yes I can operate it but I won't," said Violet stubbornly. "If you want to go off operate it you - self." "Go it I say or I'll shoot you. Close the port's Frank. You girl raise us. No you life o' yours." "I won't operate it," said Violet determinedly. "They both aimed their pistols at her heart." "Operate this machine," say. "Shoot if you dare. I way I won't even touch the controls and you can't make me. I'll do no service for any Glandelinian who kicks little girls around you cowardly brutes."

One Glandelinian pulled her from the chair and roughly hurled her toward the controls.

"Operate this airship." In answer Violet only kicked him on the chins of the leg so that he howled. "I'll break the controls," she screamed, and would have done it but two of them hurled her from the works. She tried madly to reach the controls but they kept her back. One of the men had to try it themselves at any risk of doing it wrong. They had the idea when they had it high enough and dangerous situation then she would do it especially to save herself if not them. They ought to have known her by now. In the meantime the port's had been closed by Frank. Through the visor panes Frank and his companions saw that the dawn was coming, a slow twilight merging into grey smoky day light. Two other great explosions in the distance crashed. A distant scene was a litter of horrors now. The Christian victorious were surging forward everywhere--a tangle as it seemed with the Gray men who were retreating. But the dreadful turmoil was soundless shut away from within the little space cabin of the airship. Seconds of apprehension. What if the wilful delay of Violet would cause disaster. They seemed an eternity to the two breathless Glandelinians. "Owens and Frank, could they succeed in operating the ships themselves? At the window port a gruesome red shape with large heart shaped hats were crowd crowding now thumping fitfully again against the heavy bulleypane panels with dull rifle bullets but couldn't break their way in. Violet signalled to some of them to shoot at the bag but they didn't seem to understand. The man at the controls however succeeded in getting the motor to hum, the bow lifted and they were rising. The glare and turmoil flew away. Overhead was daylight and a spread of smoke clouds. The two men breathed again.

"We did it in spite of the little brat, Ralph. Safe from the Christian dogs." Safe! In the control room behind them they heard a thump. Frank whirled. One Clark stood with hands out stretched before him gaping with horror. Violet turned and cried out with glee. The red shaped things Clark had seen them only at a distance caught brief glimpses, but one was here in the control room now. A powerful Angelinian soldier was shut up with them now in this control room and he was a man twice their length. A powerful antagonist. A menace menace that must be killed now or they would be killed. He had drawn his long infantry sheath knife. Through a second of stricken fixity Clark stared, bathed in sweat his blood seeming to run like ice through his veins, a constriction in his chest as though fingers of fear and panic were squeezing his wildly leaping heart.

The dangerous Angelinian soldier had come into the control room. The Angelinian with arm outstretched went for them with a roar of rage.

They drew their pistols and shot at the same time. He managed to strike at one of them before he fell shot through the head and heart.

In the conflict they had neglected the controls and the ship was lurching.

"Steady us," Clark gasped. "Never mind this we're falling. Steady us."

Owens swung back to her task. The ship righted. The surface of the landscapes lighted now by flat gray day light lay spread beneath them. Men below could be seen aiming at the bag but were unable to hit it. Gigantic battle ground. A whole long line of works were all covered now by the surging combatants, through which the Glandelinians now reversing things were again surging, seeking out the retreating Christian troops to devour them like some dreadful monster. The ship rose higher. Far to the right and left they saw eddies of fire mounting high into the air, with a rolling sea of smoke.

Frank for goodness sake look out."

Frank was startled as Owens frightened warning voice sounded. Frank swung, and saw that Violet was standing against the wall of the room having in the confusion left the chair. One of her hands held a gleaming revolver which evidently she had snatched from a munition and weapon rack overhead. Her eyes gleamed with a baleful fury. Her voice came sharp and clear.

"I'm no prisoner no longer. Give up or I'll shoot you. You're my prisoners."

Her waving pistol spat forth. But the flash went high sizzling against the metal wall ceiling. One had leaped and Frank was hardly a second behind him, but Violet always agile and as quick as a cat had leaped aside. The two men collided striking their heads together. The two men rubbed their heads and cursed but before they could regain their caution, Violet had hit one of them over the head with the pistol butt, and then as the other lunged at her gave him a bullet through the heart. He dropped with a chilling scream. Violet was horrified but also relieved. "He had at last by her own effort freed herself and also was in full possession of a great big airship. She thanked God for her deliverance and for the fact that she knew how to operate the levers and other controls. Violet she quickly tilted the other man's hands behind him and his feet too. Then relieving him of his cartridge belt and all weapons and the dead man too she put them on herself. Then she did not look again at the enemy after seeing to it the live ones arms and feet were so tightly fastened that only a miracle could enable him to free himself. Then she did anything she did it well. She can't remember when any one ever escaped her. The sisters yet."

Again the rising airship was out of control. Violet now sat at the levers. She steadied the ship and it rose normally again. She knew the direction to general Jack Evans army and headed for it. The lurid surface of the dreadful conflagrations of the camps and the battles was far down beneath her now, the heavy cloud masses of smoke close overhead, and sudde suddenly there came a rift in the distant part of the cloud, fierce dazzling glare struck through strong as a sunlight but infinitely hotter than a volcanic eruption. At all events she must keep the big bag from ever getting touched by the flames or there would be some explosion and disaster. When he headed it off from the conflagration she could see so down that the conflagration was shuddering all monstrous vegetation as if the country itself had gone into the sun itself.

All in a second it seemed upon the distant horizon titanic sheets of flame looking like inflammable gases ignited shot upward and forward from the burning stretches of tents tremendous, spreading fiery incandescence forming into a rolling tumbling sea of fire down there now. From there so far below it looked like a doomed world. Smoke rolled up in vast and more darker columns and a titanic chimney of heated air (not heat) was surging up like a tiny piece of paper in a furnace blast the ship was whirled upward, through the tumbling cloud masses and hurled into space.

With in General Evans lines Violet's sisters had been brought safe and secure but her sister Violet was missing. But while her sisters and even Penrod was worried exceedingly the captain of one of the giments saw something come wafting down from the sky and soon discovered it to be a huge Gray bagged airship. It was the airship which Violet had managed to navigate to General Evans lines. One knew that of course and knowing it was an enemy airship and believing it was scuttling on them going to drop bombs they would have fired at the bag and caused her death, but they saw it was not flying Glandelinian flags but their own country's. A great crowd of soldiers and boy and girls came gathered around, amazed, as the enormous airship soon came down entirely and rested in the fields outside of the Christian lines. Every body ran forward from all directions even Violet's sisters.

Their astonishment was intensified when from the door of the control room which opened a little girl emerged and which at once the whole group and even Violet's sisters and Penrod recognized. They were struck speechless especially her sisters and Penrod for they had told him she had still been a prisoner and here she comes with a huge airship. Penrod was so quick that he was the first by her side while the airship was surrounded by a crowd.

"Well for the Love of--" began Penrod hardly believing his eyes. "Who's with you Violet? How did you hear you were a prisoner?" "I was," she giggled. "I got one prisoner in there now. There was a dead man in there too but I so shoved him off while high in the air. He must have dropped into the river. They were my captives but I got the upper hand. Then I navigated the airship all the way to here."

Some of the soldiers went in and dragged the prisoner out. Most of those nearby had heard Violet's testimony of how she got the airship and thought indeed that she must be getting more unusual every day. She the last of her sisters to escape coming back to the Christian lines with a huge airship in her possession. Penrod said:

"My Gosh Violet what in the world will you do next. I don't want a whole camp of tents in the air if you are not a miracle then what are you?" She only giggled and said good naturedly: "Is it my fault. They bring me on the ship, and I overpower them killing one and then direct the ship over here. That is so astonishing about that?" Penrod couldn't say a word but grinned sheepishly. Often he had astonished his sisters. Now it was Violet's turn to astonish him.

"We thought you would never get away," said Joice. "I never thought, couldn't think that you could put it over on the enemy that way. The angels sure guided your destiny-----" Gay Mister what are you laughing about." She had turned abruptly to a man who was laughing very loud. "Ha, ha, I'm laughing because the joke is on the enemy," he said. "They capture you princesses and you get away finally or were rescued one by one and she still a prisoner. Then she comes back with a prisoner herself and such a monster-ship. Don't you see where the joke is. I've been in the United States in all my earlier travels and never there saw an airship yet so big. High over Glandelinian Generals there are that possessed that airship sure will miss it now."

"Come," said Penrod. "Let Jack Evans see you and your sisters. He was so worried that he was going to organize all the Gemini to search for you. He was going himself. Hurry."

Violet and her sisters were glad to do this bidding, his bidding but as they came in, with Jack Evans arising with surprise and relief on his face Penrod burst out with:

"Come to the window you excellency and see the March Day Present Violet my dear sister brought you. She says you can have it for your use and your officers."

Evans thinking that Violet might have escaped with a pack of good horses as she usually does want to the window and saw nothing but a great big airship out in the fields with a great crowd of soldiers and child scout surrounding it.

"Here did that big airship come from?" the general asked. "Doesn't it belong to the Glandelinians. How did it get here?"

"My sister Violet brought it," said Penrod with his grin.

Evans looked at Penrod as if he thought the boy was having one of his customary jokes but Jennie said:

"Yes she did. Evans dear, he also had a prisoner on it too. He told me she captured it high in the air too by surprising her two captors in the control room."

Evans was astonished beyond his own reasoning when he heard the full details and also by some of the soldiers the prisoner with bandaged head was brought before him. The prisoner reluctantly had to confess that it was true and called her a little wild cat, but Evans silence him mightily roughly. "Well wonders never cease," said Evans when the prisoner was gone.

"It don't seem to be anything wonderful," said Violet. "You sure Evans dear brought to remember how we once together captured a airship before this."

"Yes but you guided this one all alone by yourself. How did you do it?" "I made the prisoner help me at the point of the pistol. When I was some distance away from the foe lines I made him lower the airship, and then watching him closely made him even put on our own national flags so we wouldn't be fired on by mistake when we reached the Christian camps. He couldn't escape or put anything over on me either. He tried to after he placed the flags on. That is why his hand is in a sling now. I shot him in the arm."

"Don't you see Penrod dear," giggled Joice. "This time too the joke is on you. You did things to astonish us, and this time Violet astonished you." "But what is there to me capturing an airship," asked Violet who couldn't see that she had done anything big. "If I had gotten away from the enemy's lines with it myself it would seem unusual, but I was first a prisoner of those two men and then I got the upper hand as there were a gun on a wick above me. I got it before the men saw what I did."

But "But you did do something wonderful just the same," said Penrod. "You don't see it now. But let's forget it if you think it is nothing and go out away. Our friend Evans can do what he wishes with the airship. I want to do a slight bit of scouting and see what the effect is on the enemy since he lost the airship. And find out what is going on concerning the distant battle of Minda Rhonda."

Violet and her sisters and their brother Penrod reined up under the big pine tree some distance from the Christian lines but still within plain view of the airship and the crowd around it. They were scrutinizing the strange faded sign nailed to the trunk some time before they had passed this spot and there had been no sign there. Two long thin arrows were pointed in on it but pointing in opposite directions. Under the arrows were letters crudely made:

"The Big Jump Creek, Five miles."

"Los Angeles, 10 miles."

Penrod picked the big black hat from his golden head and watched it dustily against his coat.

"I wonder," he said with a grin to his sisters "if that creek would jump in the air at the sight of us. Some name." "Well what ever it has for a name I'd choose Big Jump Creek," Jennie said with a giggle. "It's so hot to day that we would appreciate the shower if the water is cool enough."

"Why?"

"On account it is within an easy sight of a portion of the enemy's lines and within safe distance of our own lines, and we need to discover what the result is about Violet's capture of that airship."

"It was nothing," said Violet again. "Why make off as if I did anything important. If you was in my place Jennie you would have done the same and I know it?" "No I wouldn't," said Jennie decidedly. "Not to my captors, I wouldn't. I'd show them something when they go kicking little girls around as you said."

"Augustinia St. Clair our prisoner kicked you."

"Yes and when the proper time comes for his trial he'll see me."

"Who's going to be his judge," asked Violet.

"I'll appoint Jennie," said Penrod.

"I'll accept."

Penrod now halted in moping his shiny round handsome face with a corner of his white handkerchief and then said again:

"Well it seems between me and my sisters we are all wonderful to the soldiers of our side. My big raids and all the successes you do when getting things on the enemy. Your information about plancy is being investigated by Evans and if he can halt him we'll be that much off for good. You Violet captured an airship and captured Augustinia St. Clair didn't I. With that other prisoner you have Violet back there."

Jane Melfort who was with them shook her head solemnly.

"Great risk you took Princess Violet in getting off with that airship. They may make an attack and try to reclaim it!"

"They'll get it in a week then," said Penrod. "And I'll do the wrecking. Heck the Glandelinians were responsible for their loss. They had no right to kick little girls any how or make them prisoners."

"I cannot now understand those Glandelinian generals," said Jane. "They make children prisoners not only for rapping but for other purposes."

"Any how," said Penrod. "Let's forget about the airship and enjoy ourselves for a spell. I crave some simple restoration to these confounded dust out of my throat. Maybe we can get back to some canteen and drink some of that red beer or Coca Cola."

"That liquid is too cold now with all this heat," said Violet. "We could return to that airship and get plenty of good milk there in ice refrigerator heat it to the right temperature and get some thing to eat too. I'm hungry."

"Yes the milk too is there ice cold," corrected Penrod. "That is something else you forgot. It would take a long time to heat it right."

"I still think there will be considerable excitement within the Glandelinian camps when they discover the loss of their gigantic airship," said Jane Melfort.

"Princess Violet I also still think you did something greater than you imagine. Our whole camp here is excited about it and the crowd still hangs about the airship. It would make a great thing for you Guardian Jack Evans if he can use it, put why didn't you keep it for your own use."

"We will," said Violet. "But he has a right to share it with us."

"Well this ain't no good place to linger in," declared Hattie with an uneasy look toward the east where a great column of Glandelinian cavalry seemed to appear.

"And too it looks as if it is going to rain. This heavy gully will be bank high, and if it does rain where these forest fires are we'll soon find out all over the country what smoke really looks like."

Penrod had swung off his horse (not horse) dropped the reins and stretched out on the cool sand.

"Then wake me up when the flood comes along. If we got to plunge into war games right off again, I aim to restore my tissues first. But why not all of you get some rest as you didn't sleep all night because Violet didn't come back. Jane can get some boy scouts to do guard duty for us."

Penrod pillows his head on a boulder, closed his eyes and was soon sleeping. He, like his sisters however, were too excited over the situation to sleep and couldn't keep their eyes off of the big airship. But soon Penrod's sleep was rudely interrupted. He sat up suddenly with a waking start, and fanned something off his face. Then he stared at the big black beetle he had knocked too the sand. Then he cast a suspicious eye at Daisy who was leaning against a tree contemplating the great airship so that he knew she didn't do it to play a joke on him.

"Maybe so one of my dearest little sisters parked this beautiful black beauty on my proboscis," Penrod said suspiciously with a grin. "Just to rouse me up, knowing that little girls in Abbisannia ain't afraid of bugs and things."

Why who knew she was the suspected one she urged her shoulders in truthful denial.

"I wouldn't have nothing to do with that kind of a bug." She declared. "Besides I o my sisters wouldn't do such a thing when some body is asleep. And besides that is a black tum ble bug."

"Tumble bug?" Pen rod picked up the insect and looked it over while it wriggled to get free. "Glad dear I'm plumb astonished at your seeming in ignorance of inverted bugology. This ain't a tumble bug. His proper name is pinacate beetle."

"I reckon you learned that when we once guided that bug hunting p of essor out of the danger zone when he was pursued by Glandelinians." said Jennie.

"I learned something else. This sort of a bug would be a valuable find to any bug hunter but say I'm going to try and get some sleep again. And if any of you little girls play another little trick on me you're going to get a hug and kiss under stand. You desee we more than that any how you a re--"

Crack. A rifle shot echoed latly from the boulders up on the ridge not far off. It seemed at a distance the whole camp was excited. A bullet thudded into the sand inches from Pen rods hand in the exact spot where the tumble bug had been doing his balancing act after getting away from Pen rods hand. The bug had vanished now, so had violet and her sisters, who had Jack knifed behind a number of trees. All that remained was a slug furrow in the sand. Pen rod was as quick as a cat. He had flipped over on his belly with lizard agility but dangerous pistols leveled across the boulder which a split second before had been his pillow.

"Goodness Gracious. Violet's voice was a whisper. "It is sure lucky that that bullet didn't hit any one of us and especially you Pen rod."

"Why especially me?" said Pen rod. "Am I any better?"

"Yes you are --"

Crack. A second shot ripped leaves from the pine trees. They shifted down on the flattened boy.

"Somebody must have mistook us for enemies for we're being fired on by our own men." said violet. "Look there he is now. Up among those rocks."

As she spoke, a rider burst into view, spurring hard, and hitting for a cross road road toward the gully which violet, and her sisters and Pen rod had just descended. He was waving a six shooter in one hand. The other gripped a big l lougher bug that dangled from his saddle horn. He wore a black sort of hat that the same as Pen rods. At a distance he seemed to be of similar build but tall er and slim er with bottle neck shoulders. The distance was nearly two hundred yards. Violet herself beside Pen rod in the same position as he was caught sighted across the boulder with her peering rifle and gave the trigger a squeeze. The rider yelled and stiffened. His left hand left the saddle horn gripping the injured member under his gun arm as he vanished over a rise. The leather bag fell.

Violet sprang to her feet, captured the reins and vaulted to the saddle. She ascended the ridge at a gallop. In a minute she came back with the big leather bag. She dropped it to the sand at the feet of Pen rod and her sisters. It gave forth to their surprise a strange metallic clink.

"Good gosh" said violet. "I thought that man was a spy. Maybe he's worse a foreigner and a thief. He stole money. Look at that name on the bag."

The bag was lettered with the name;

"St. Marys National Bank."

"Maybe we'll have to see what it is and bring it into the lines and get that thief captured" said Pen rod. "He wouldn't dare run into the foe lines even as bad as Glandelinians are thieves wouldn't be welcome either."

Pen rod clawed open the draw strings of the money bag and peered inside. Then he looked up at his sisters his face showing his astonishment and astonishment more than ever.

"There either must have been a hold up or this is some trick of a spy. If this was a hold up it was not at any bank."

"What is the matter?" asked Joice.

Pen rod dipped a hand into the bag and let a handful of the contents filter through his fingers.

"Just iron washes. That boom must have held up some army band washes to be."

"But what would he want of all that junk?" asked violet. "I thought--"

"Spang. A third shot came from the ridge, farther down. In the same instant a hole ripped through the crown of Pen rods black hat, the hat jumping then tilting down over his left eye. A voice roared down the ridge; "Up with your hands down the re."

"Not if I know it" roared Pen rod back. "I'll shoot it out to the last."

Get your guns ready sisters."

As they got ready for a stiff fight knowing the sound of it would bring soldiers immediately to their rescue Pen rod saw a rider pause or the ridge brandishing a cavalry carbine. Pen rod gasped it was Fred Nance. A half dozen others in purple uniform on sweat laden red horses topped the rise and started down and Pen rod and the little girls.

Pen rod needed tilted but shut off his view and he refused just then to change his position.

"Who all is it?" he asked of his sisters.

"The leader seems to be a long glange man with 'Pop' eyes and a long hon nose." said Catherine. With him is a general who looks like Fred Nance. They'll see their mistake in a minute though they all look plumb irritated about something."

"At a rough guess," said Pen rod "I'd say it was Fred Nance."

The leader reached them. He knocked Pen rods hat off with his gun barrel. "It is the very ones we're after boys. Black hat and all. Must have had these girls waiting for him here."

Violet and her sisters were astonished at this remark and from their best friend Fredrick Nance. One of the grim faced soldiers dismounted.

"Good work general. Let's load up the bug and head back."

"Head back for the re?" asked Pen rod. "If I ain't inquisitive."

"For the Christian lines of course. How do you think you're going back to your own Glandelinian camps?"umbled the general."

"Back to the Christian line as prisoners? Say this is plumb foolish." protested Pen rod.

"It sure then blazes is." The new comer or new speaker was a crooked nosed man with a strangely high pitched voice. Violet and her sisters pricked up their ears. They knew they had heard that voice somewhere before. "The little hyena is right." the crooked nosed man went on with a scowl. "They ain't no need to jail all the rest of them, pretty even as the little girls are. How about it comrades?"

There was to the surprise of violet and her sisters and Pen rod too and also to their horror a chorus of agreement.

"That big trees tree looks big enough" decided the man with the crooked nose. "Now who's got a good strategy?"

"Hold on a minute" spoke up Pen rod. "If you try that we'll even here fight for our lives and if we lose and are killed, my sisters and I will make you rue the day I'm Pen rod P. L. Pen rod, and these are my sisters the Vivian Princesses. Don't tell me general Nance that you have turned against us and am going to hang little girls who have been so good and friendly to you and to whom they did a lot--"

"Hang them I ought to" said Fredrick Nance severely. "Vivian girls indeed. Wait until they hear of that. You their brothers won't make me laugh. If you were I would not have hunted you for all over this country. You posing as Pen rod and his sisters robbed their headquarters of their best articles and set the place afire and stole that bug. We ought to be over anxious that no questions be asked or answered as we got the evidence against you. Eight duplicates, imposters claiming you Pen rod and his sisters. Ha. ha don't make me laugh."

One of the men flung a loop over Violet's shoulder. First, it was the man with the crooked nose and as he did so Pen rod kicked out with a booted toe sharp at the end. With a shrill yowl of pain, the man grabbed his newly damaged nose and stumbled against his horse. Another man on the ground went for his gun but Glandelinian soldiers roared. Pen rod was only a boy he was as strong as two men. He knocked the fellow sprawling. General Nance spurred between them.

"Keep your shirt on every body." he shouted. He swung his sabre commandingly. "If there is any shooting around here I'll do it. Maybe this is a mistake. If it is I regret it. We can't act to hasty, even if it did happen what I am told."

The soldiers subsided sullenly. The general turned toward Pen rod and the little girls.

"Now for the men's sake start talking some of you girls. If you are really the Vivian girls I'd know you voices no matter how you are disguised and you're not disguised. Are you really the Vivian girls?"

"Yes" said violet. "We even never rode but horse fac fast to day and you can see for yourself. And early this morning I came back to camp in the air ship."

"You can see she is right" said Joice. "And you notice our horses have not sweat sweat like you're. The ones you're after ran past here. We swapped lead with him. He dropped that bug and sort of hurried along."

The wide Pen rod had in his excitement knocked down scrambled to his feet and thrust a hand into the canvas bag. He scooped out a clinking heap of the iron washes.

"Well I'll be a" he began.

"We have been tricked" said the general. "We got word our fugitives had hid in this gully. But I recognized the voices of the girls and they're original all right and then so is their brother and a puzzled frown came on his face as from the satchel on the back he produced a folded slip of yellow 110. and handed it to the general who had unfolded it.

"Violet's map," he said. "With the names of the children signed on it."
"But what?" the general asked. "He had it with him when he was captured."
"Yes," said Violet.
"The road goes on."
He noticed that Violet and her sisters were standing the gentleman with the hat buckled (or so he thought) a snore. The face as well as the feeble voice was hauntingly familiar even to him. The group of men was silent for a long moment. One of the men finally spoke.

"Come mighty now being to hasty and would have hanged the best ones in the world," he said in a whispering manner. "Oosh hang those duplicates any way. They tickled us."

"Why he asked did that other man head for us he was with those kids?" the general asked.

"Up the cross road," Penrod told him.
"Nance told him he was, then he started. A dark screen of March rain was hiding the hills now and it began to thunder. The rain was an oppressive weight about the heat that portended a deadening shower over the land scape."

"I ain't no use now," said the general. "His trail will be gully washed in five minutes or so. Hope you and your sisters don't bear no harsh notions about us now. On account of what almost took place just now. We were hoodwinked you know, and you'll regret what you'll see when you return to your lines. You headquarters is no more. You've lost every thing. You've lost your best clothing and things. Mistakes will happen you know. The fugitives looking like you headed this way."

"And you being in possession of the bag made it more suspicious," said the man whom Penrod had knocked down. "My you have a valley for a boy and but I thought I did it makes me admire you so. I'll forgive it with all my heart."

"But it seems unusual," said Violet. "that even you men would have hanged a real child - son of the enemy - especially when they come to string up little girls for retelling buggy washers if they had done so."

"I ain't that," said General Nance. "Be cause the enemy won't show you no mercy with the will be show mercy to Glendelminian child spies. Can't be helped." He continued seeing their astonished looks. "Ask your Father if his his steen orders, and who ever robbed your headquarters this morning took away a lot of your most important papers. something all fired funny he was. We got the count y inside scoured for the fugitives but I doubt if we'll get them now."

Violet and her sisters shot another look at the crooked noddled man and wondered who he was. He looked to them like the fugitive one of them then had fired at though he did not show any banded or wounded arm or leg. "We might as well go along back to the christian line seeing every body is still so interested in the big ship," Violet brought to camp. "Penrod suggested. "Would be glad if you would. Better we make tracks out of here before that storm comes upon us."

"My sentiments exactly," declared Penrod, getting to his horse and swinging into the saddle, followed by Violet, and her sisters. Thirty nine men followed by the eight princely children took the back trail for the christian line. Getting sheets of rain dashed then accompanied by sharp thunder and blinding lightning cutting the trail to yellow rivulets of mud. Violet and her sisters and their brother rode side by side up to stir up.

Violet who rode a long side of Penrod spoke her vague thoughts concerning the now silent and sullen man with the crooked nose.

"No disguise that she was that night," saying Violet spoke in English slang; "I should meet up with that Jasper with the sprung oil factory when some where before."

"I," said voice I was thinking the same."
Penrod nodded. He and the little girls found the corner of the boys a fugitive studied the man. Finally Jennie uttered a planned ejaculation.

"I got it Penrod. Leeson I'm might had mistook, that man is the Jasper who is a foreigner, and who held us up when we was coming out of Angelina (Zathia more than a year back."

Joice checked her horse.
"By jingo you're right. It's him. Funny I forgot. But he felt sort of put out when he opened them apertures on us we had with us and which he stole and found they contained nothing but our school books and writing things."

Penrod spoke up along side the general.
"I wish the man with the crooked nose to be a pal - number of your men here all?"

"I could inquire specially in Abilominian."

"Been in the ranks only about two weeks. The general said. "Funny thing too for nobody seems to like him. He runs a waxy countenances where the big ship now stands."

Penrod whistled to his sisters to ride up and they did. Then he said to them in English slang -

"Look on he'll be a good one for a riding then. Hush hurry washers. He's a crooked nose but over head for the road up and on the road."
"What's all this about?" said Violet. "I'll think about it. I can't understand British slang."

"Nothing much," said Violet. "Only I'm beginning to think about my school books and things that you stole from us at Angelina. About over a year ago. We were you into - in those childish books."

The expression on the man's face as he mumbled and fell back rapidly in the column of horse men puzzled the general and also Penrod. By the time they reached the christian line near the big of ship which was still a wonder to the crowd the sky had cleared and the sun burst down with its usual dazzling brilliance, but the oppressive heat did not come from it. Near where the ship was stood a faint frowning cloud that gladdened the eyes of the children who were getting as thirsty as those lost out in a stateless desert.

"It's the canteen," said Violet. "And we all need a drink."

"Well let's light," said Penrod.
Penrod swung off at the hitch rail. They stood at the counter and ordered the drinks. While they were waiting for the drinks to be fixed the boy came the boy about Timothy D. Weston followed by Jean Sanger and many other girls. About the same time a light of station and yet a pale face in the boys eyes to and to the surprise of the others. They observed two thin purple metal cases with leather handles. The funny dressed man was eyes that dark at the sight of them and the cases and began to back clear of the crowd as the boy scout swung the two cases on the counter.

"That's a good now," Penrod wanted to know.

"You ever see any of these any where before?" asked Jim.
"I did," said Joice. "That was my school case. That was mine. I found them on a back shelf in the John's store. In his tent pointing to the crooked nosed man, who was backing toward the open of the crowd as Tim spoke. "Yes Prince Penrod yes these my cinema cases interested me plenty for they looked suspicious."

"The other bag belongs to me," said Jennie. "didn't he have five others?"

"Yes, but they're empty," said Tim.

"They're my school book cases which were stolen from us down at Angelina Angelina (Zathia) over a year ago," Violet exclaimed.

"Exactly," said Catherine, "seeing the man now with a cold look. "But they're not filled with books now, believe me."

"You're right," said Jim. "They're too blank heavy."

The man was at the other side of the counter now near Violet. He slipped out of his coat and a hand fleeced and his holsters. But out of the corner of her eye Violet had been watching him and so had her sisters. Violet's hand stayed with uppermost fingers to a sheet of sticky fly paper sheet at the end of the counter and started to play with the under part as a child would do who should leave it alone. Then suddenly she seized the wall populated (some full of flies till its black) glue like mass, which she leaped upward like a cat and plopped it squarely onto the man's hunched face. Her other hand knocked the man's sixty chamber army revolver to the ground just as it was cocked and thudded a leader slug into a tree. The man spluttered, and glared down peevishly at his face. At the same time an amazed shout from the men and child scouts at the counter caused the natural and surprised boy Prince and others to turn around. Tim had pried open one of the appliance cases. It was stuffed with all sorts of stones and other things that were dug out of the ground. The important papers and plans belonging to Violet and her sisters.

"Oh, gosh," Penrod blurted. "There's your papers sisters."

He plunged bravely at the man then and flipped the sticky fly paper from the lump suffering spy's face.

"I see the whole thing now you dirty double crooked Penrod yelled. You "you was in league with those others who were the duplicate of me and my sisters, and then after they pulled the job for you you up and double crossed you and followed. You gave the man who was with you the washers and hung onto the real goods yourself. You'll get yours. And I'll get us hung without trial oh then the general thought we were the real dupes in this disguise."

At Penrod's command a number of men backed the spy winding under the shadow of the bayonets and a tree, until he could be seen. And then he died away.

"Penrod," said the general, "I'm glad Penrod as the prisoner was being led away."

Violet and her sisters and the two boys ran forward and splitting back three boy scouts were pounding and tapping at a whispering pleading figure of a boy who after all was not dressed in uniform, and they were intent on leading him into a small wagon that stood at one side. A number of soldiers were running forward too.

"Please please for God's sake have mercy!" he begged, as he planted his heels against a tree and covered his head and face as best as he could.

"Here's what's the idea you boys?" Penrod yelled as he ran up followed half a step later by his sisters and Tim. One glance revealed that the victim of the assault was a little girl dressed as a boy and that her assailants were three bullying boy scouts but their faces didn't look like boyscouts of the Christian side despite their purple coats. Their response to Penrod's demand was instantaneous. With a vicious blow one of them knocked the disguised little girl to the ground and bent over her while the other two turned to face the boy Prince and the Princesses. To their surprise it was Gerald Starving Fredrick Lowden and the Dargar boy. His fist landed first as Lowden turned on him with a gut level curse. The fellow was no mean antagonist and for a few minutes Tim had his hands full.

Then Tim's heavy fist connected squarely just as Lowden was drawing a knife and the boy staggered back. Penrod himself however was not having much trouble. In fact his foe was having plenty to do to handle a boy scout or a Prince who was taller and heavier than he and good at the fist. He too had drawn a knife but never could use it out of the corner of his eye. Penrod could see that the girl was lying on her stomach. Her waist ripped off her back and her assailant kneeling beside her trying to draw something he saw on her back.

Then the air was full of flying fists and enraged curses. Tim's assailant staggering back fell headlong over the boy kneeling beside the prostrate girl. Then came forward a swarm of shouting skiddish soldiers, and as if that were a signal, the two scrambled to their feet, and all three ruffians made a "blee" or blee line for three horses standing close by. It was the work of only a few seconds for them to get in the saddles but a volley of shots greeted them and their horses sank down to the ground. The boys answered the fire and blew blind over a fence and disappeared into the woods close by.

The little girl meanwhile had rolled over and was sobbing as if her heart would break. Penrod and Tim knelt beside her and attempted to raise her.

"Thank God!" the little girl sobbed as she struggled to get her breath. "You were just in time."

"Did the three boys hurt you badly?" Violet herself asked. "What us to take you to a hospital tent."

"No Miss no hospital tent, that is not necessary." The little girl's voice was vehement with anxiety. "Only have me covered and get me away from here. Only do not let those those Glandelinian boyscouts get me again. They followed me all the way into the Christian lines."

"Don't worry!" said Joice. "Those Glandelinians won't even see you again." She turned to Penrod;

"Let's take her up to our headquarters where over we can choose one now since its burned until we decide how to care for her. She is injured. She is out on the arm."

Violet and her sisters began to realize that Tim and their brother were a great pain. They had learned from many of their secret investigations since they learned Penrod was their brother that along the full length of the Angelina and Calvernia State borders, throughout the stormy country of Calvernia and in many a farflung out post of civilization and in America and Canada, Penrod at least was well known always, though the enemy knew him well too, excepting of course "Maiddefeb" Penrod smaller than Joice or Violet was yet as mighty of muscle and hard of fist as a full man could be and Tim for a good cause no less hard boiled than his partner but recognized by Penrod as the planning genius of their nightous combination. To think that Starving Fredrick Lowden and his mightiest tricks to jab Penrod with a long knife and without paying any attention to the knife, Penrod got the best of him easily with his flat six teeth from Starving's mouth lay on the ground.

CHAPTER FIVE

T. J. EAGLE Y PLAYED FOR THE SAKE OF A LITTLE GIRL THAT HAS A MAP OF THE POSITIONS ON HER BACK.

Joice and Jennie the tallest of the Princesses helped the scared little girl to her feet and upon their own horse or Joice's. Then they and the two boys went to a big tent some few blocks away but close to the big airship. In the light of the big tent the little girl proved however to be a little Glandelinian and a German at least to Penrod but she could speak only Abbelemmian. Her hair was straw color and her face was quite good looking and she was gracious in manner. She looked a little afraid of Violet and her sisters for their eyes always for some unknown reason on the pretty as they were sparkled with a fire that no one could account for.

That she a little Glandelinian if she was one had been able to put up such a battle against her assailants was a surprise to the Princesses and the two boys, but they were due for more than a surprise when they saw her naked back which she displayed to them. It was covered with tattooing. There were trees lines running through this way and that, queer signs and her hand here and there figures and words and a position filled with men.

"You are surprised my friends but I will explain." She assured them. "You two boys friends have saved me from death, and I know who you are, and though you see and me I picked all my trouble for your Country's cause. They wanted to get me because Heaven knows I'm a little girl spy employed in the service of General Blain Nightfinger. I will therefore reward you with information that is more important than all the treasure you would be able to find and use. I know the enemy and know what is going on during this long battle at Linda Rhonda. Thank God you are not there and it is far away."

"Important plans so grant." The two boys and the little girl exclaimed as one.

"Yes, not this on my back but information concerning Manley's Order of Confedacy with General Glancy, you would not believe it. Princesses but scores of thousands are the souls of a force since I got that information. Dozens of thousands are the rumors concerning me that pass from mouth to mouth. I'm in grave danger but I'll reveal it to you any how."

With the mention of this the little girl had her listeners' attention indeed. "I'm really really a child slave who have escaped from the Glandelinians a month before." She told them as she lay back in a soft arm chair surrounded a room having been carefully dressed. At that time, and my companions were working in a sort of mine. We sought to escape and as we got some distance off being half naked as child slaves a long came four armed riders and twelve loaded wagons. When we saw those Glandelinians coming we were afraid and hid but they discovered us. It was Colonel and his companions and the two were loaded with stolen treasures and were jeweled and he had some child slaves with him and his gang. They had stolen a mighty treasure but that they dumped into a deep river. I didn't know why then but into a deep solid rock they forced us all to drill a great hole fifty feet deep. When the hole had been made then one of the soldiers minded the colonel that they must make a map of some sort of the Christian lines so that in case Christian spies do anything they would never find it. They had no paper nothing on which to write. Then it was that one of the others whispered to the colonel and the ten dergimed evilly. When we had made the hole I learned the meaning of that grimly companion child slaves and girl were killed, strangled horribly and thrown into the deep hole. Only I was left alive. I was forced with a heavy heaver to shovel enough dirt over their bodies until they were hid from view. When it was finished I was made to smooth over the grave. Then it was my turn. They seized me.

"A fine beautiful white parchment." The leader laughed as he slapped me stinging blows on my bare back. For three days those Glandelinians kept me tied down while he who had whispered to the colonel jabbed sharp needles into me. It was a hot needle too, and the pain was maddening, but when I moved they kicked they kicked me most brutally. At last it was finished and the colonel looked at me with a question in his wicked eye. I knew that he considered whether he should kill me immediately and cut off my skin. Or whether he I suppose should take off my skin alive as he had done to other child slaves. But the Good God spared me. He must have sent the Angelinians and in the fight they killed all but the Colonel and took possession of me. That is the last I ever saw of the wicked colonel but I have heard that he was hanged recently as a spy. Certainly it is he who returned to me claim me. These Glandelinians are very evil soldiers and have stained the ground with the blood of many of our child slaves. I have tried to forget that which I bear on my back. Glandelinian spies have sought me for it but until now I have escaped. General Manley himself has sought me before. To day his three Confederate boys caught me and if you had not come it would have been my death. For that I am grateful Prince and your companions. If you like, I will go back with you so that you may have that information so that you can save the Christian army at Linda Rhonda where so far a fearful battle is raging no longer.

Penrod lifted his eyes from the little girl's lips and looked at Tim. In the boy's bright Christian eyes he saw mirrored an excitement equal to his own. Information that could save the Christian army from defeat. The information. The lure of it had him but he couldn't go. His father needed him too badly. "You will take us to the place where we can obtain the information?" Tim asked struggling to suppress the excitement in his voice.

"That I will do but we must not quickly. General Manley though some reason knows all your intentions. He said to himself before I escaped from the forest this morning after spying. He will lose no time in trying to find out where we should start very soon but only Prince and your sisters can go." "I don't like that though," said Penrod. "They have been in too much peril already. I wish I could go but Father I'm afraid can't spare me though I'll ask him."

"We could go by way of El Paso to Road," Tim considered. "We could get along the first of things in the morning and you could do your 'At the ob'act."

"Okay," Penrod agreed enthusiastically. "We I'm ready to start as soon as Father says it's all right. But I must ask him first."

"We a good Prince very good." The little girl ended with a smile of satisfaction as he lit up his face. But in her eyes Penrod caught a fleeting glimpse of something that was more than satisfaction. Was it some sort of warning to him about his sisters? Penrod could not be sure but it clouded his enthusiastic plans with the first hint of uneasiness. Should he tell his sisters to go with him or not. It was hard to say and he dared not try to stop them.

However Penrod was permitted to go so that he would be a protective guide to his sisters. The two boys and two girls with their mascot had left El Paso Road on their westward horses at early afternoon. By mid afternoon they were in the heart of the Big Bend country of that portion of California a land of forested covered high hills low canyons and green green with grass and some chino grass like you see in Texas, Spanish dagger and the red brush. It was here that trouble started. The horses of whole shoals of them suddenly went so lame that they couldn't and would not go any further. Upon investigation they found that their horses had been disabled purposely. Some one had pulled the horse shoes loose so that after a short distance travel they would cast shoes. They did not wish to waste time to shoe the horses themselves though they could and therefore decided to continue on foot and take the horses with them. Reluctantly they made up the packs. At the first of the afternoon they proceeded on. The first at break of light of the distant forest fires were stealing out of the east when they plunged into a mill valley canyon, canyon and sank down gratefully beside a spring. But as they stepped they did not get a chance to drink. Abruptly a rifle in the hands of a hidden marksmen cracked sharply, the bullet whistling above their heads driving them away.

With the little girl in the lead whose name was Mary Maude they darted and twisted their way across the canyon, while laden baggage men of death shivered about their heels.

"Glandelinian snakes!" Mary said fearfully as she ran. "Come I know where the cave is a little cave."

"Where?" she asked. "They have touched us," Tim pointed as he dived after Violet and he reappeared into an opening in the rocky side of the mesa that was now as we like to call it a cave.

"Wherever they'll have plenty of chance to pick us up," Penrod said. "I wish I had dropped his heavy pack to the cave floor. How do you figure we are going to get out of here? They have the place now surrounded and haven't any too much water left."

The next day brought an awful heat, no cooling breeze waiting heat, and though the blazing sun lit up the forested canyon with blinding brilliance it was not the cause of the heat and yet also no where were the little girls or the two boys able to see a sign of the mysterious besiegers. The water in about gone. Penrod commented, as he shook his nearly empty canteen.

"And I'm oh so thirsty and hot too," said Violet. "Couldn't you try to get some water at the spring?"

"I'll try," said Penrod. "I have a hunch that fellow, whoever he is, is gone. Think I'll take a chance on slipping down to the spring. I don't want you girls to think like that. I don't care about myself."

Before he was a half a dozen feet from the mouth of the cave, Penrod knew how his guess had been wrong. From three points on the shaded opposite wall of the canyon little puffs of smoke went up as shots cracked out and bullets sought him. Penrod saw a head. He dropped the canteen, threw rifle to his shoulder and fired. The man was hit and fell down the canyon wall with a yell.

"I hope I can get the others," said Penrod. "But there came no answer a perfect fusillade of shots from the canyon wall and not a marksmen now showed himself. In fact that one had been a little careless. Penrod realized that to escape or to attempt to escape was suicide, so they piled loose rocks at the entrance of the cave and prepared to spend the day there. By turns they slept but before night fall they were exhausted from the heat and from the lack of water. Penrod and Jim had given the water they had left yet to the little girls. Evening came at last but there was no respite from the heat showing it was the hot waves from the forest fires and not from the sun. Yet as darkness fell, they decided to make a break for it if possible. They prayed hard and faithfully for success. With nothing but their revolvers and canteens they crawled from the cave as soon as night was fully settled down.

Not a sound came from the opposite wall. Slowly and carefully they worked their way down to the spring, with the little girls following them. Still not a single shot impeded their progress.

"Thank God water at last," Penrod gasped as they all crawled to the spring and then he ordered the little girls to drink first. But as Violet who was first there began to lower her mouth to the inviting surface she was yanked back quickly by Tim.

"No, no, no God's sake no, no," he hissed in her ear. "It's a poison trap. See there on the other bank."

On the other bank close to the water, lay the body of some animal probably a small burro, swollen to twice its size its blackened tongue protruding horribly from its mouth.

"Poison," Tim whispered.

Involutionarily they pushed back from the pool and stared in horror at its inviting water.

"Well I'm not going back into that trap," Penrod decided at last. "Let's go hunt up these poison skunks."

"There is another canyon beyond this one," Tim suggested. "I do not know, perhaps it too has a spring. We cannot drink the poison or fight Glandelinian soldiers who stay hidden."

"Time to light sisters," Penrod ended. "Every one of you take a hold of you yourselves. We may have an awful long hot walk ahead of us. Confound these skunks who poisoned the water if I caught them I'd make them drink it."

That walk was a night mare. The sight of the spring had served only to increase their thirst, and the hours stretched on endlessly without a sign of water and poor Violet and her sisters were almost weeping so tortured were they by thirst and the heat. Up ahead of them the two boys trudged along seemingly without fatigue. Tim and Penrod blamed their own folly for all these troubles. Though they did not show it the heat and thirst were getting the two boys more than it was the little girls. Jim stepped too was uncertain, and he walked miles without saying a word.

Then Jim had a down pour of rain broke loose with terrific fury. They had lost track of time and distance and life had been just a thread mill of steps and a torture of thirst. Vaguely Penrod had been aware that gray day light had been starting and as they trudged on, the rain had suddenly come making a perfect stream of water where there had been no water before. Then suddenly Jim came running back to them having gone a little ahead.

"Thank God help it comes. Look there ahead," she said.

The others looked but they saw nothing. Not until they all had a canteen full of rain water.

Violet and her sisters, the other little girls with them and Jim were forced to go where they heard a new noise filling the tunnel of the old mine--the scrape and shuffle of feet as children started to climb down the ladders and make their way through the workings. Without a word they filed by a procession of little tykes, gaunt and ragged, their eyes dull and unseeing, they suffled mechanically to their stations. Soon the place was filled with the noise of drills, of shovels scooping up coal and of little feet trudging with loaded shacks to the bottom of the shaft. Apparently there was no boss or overseers over these little automations, no slave driver to keep them at their tasks. Yet they worked steadily, almost feverishly.

"Looks like a lot of little make believe ghosts" Jim muttered but they sure can work. What kind of a hell is this we have fallen into?" "I don't know, Tim dear but I'm going to find out mighty quick for it is my duty to do so." Violet assured him as she strode over to one of the little workers who happened to be a ten year old boy.... Looking closely she saw that the child workers were all boys, none girls.. There were girls but they were not allowed to work with the boys.

It was not until she grabbed a shovel and started to work beside one of the little toilers that she could get an answer from them. Then the little boy she was helping looked at her without interest, and even seemed not at all friendly but told her to go away and work by herself. "There is no time to talk girl" he said sarcastically but in a weary lifeless monotone. "Eight new kids means only that the quota only goes up. You'll soon be working with the girls."

"The quota? You mean you have to produce a certain amount per person. Now do they know who isn't doing his or her share with no guards or overseers down here? Who are these Glandelinians anyway? Why do you kids let them get away with these things? We can escape if we desire but we're going to sacrifice ourselves for a time and see what is wrong here."

Violet had many other questions but the boy wouldn't answer a word, and as she gazed into the pale, apathetic face of the poor little slave driver beside her she realized why he won't answer. Not because she was a girl. These kids forfeited their lives if they told anything to new comers. Ragged and clean, wasted and sick these poor little children were broken in health and in spirit. If they ever had any resistance it was beaten and starved out of them. When the days quota of coal fell short they did not eat. Under the guns of the husky guards they were helpless and resistance was out of the question. Finally Violet told him who she was, that she was a princess, and showed him carefully that she carried secret weapons about her and that if he only told something she would do her best to cause their liberation.

He then took more confidence.

"It's dangerous for you to come down here then spying" the stammering kid who is working at the shovel, droned on in his monotone. "One came came down here to spy. He started a rebellion down here. All of us refused to come up the shaft. They sent down gas, and threatened to send down fire. Terrible gas that burned our eyes and made us choke. We had to come up. Next day we had to send up fifty percent more than usual. Some the day after that. The spy was caught and made to drink molten iron."

A mile of little lost souls of little boys and girls who had vanished from the face of the earth. Violet and her sisters were captured in this place of course but they could escape now if they had wished to. But they did not want to try it now when they could stay and find out conditions. They decided to stay as long as it took Penrod to bring rescue. Unless he succeeded the children would be imprisoned here to tell their lives away.

"I've seen here nearly two years" the wasted little fellow remarked listlessly. "Some of them have been here nearly five. They don't last much longer than that--even the best of them."

Five years of living hell for these children. That too would be their fate and Jim unless they managed their escape they said they could do very soon. Violet realized. Once escape was impossible and Penrod unable to bring help then once they became ensnared in this deadly routine all hope and strength would be ground out of them.

"Wait still we get out of here" Violet vowed hotly to herself. "Wait until my soldiers get their hands on these Glandelinians. I'll make them see the day for this treatment of these little kids." From what further the boy said Violet admitted the uselessness of resistance. He told them that whenever the poor little slaves came up out of the shaft for meals they were met and shepherded by husky men, guards armed with files, clubs, and sabres and no attempt to escape meant a blow over the head--in emergency a ball bullet.

For most of the little children the very thought of trying to make an escape was a thing of the past. Like poor blind little human moles they toiled underground most of the day, and then scurried to their bunk houses when they came up out of the shaft. So long had they been in semi-darkness that the light of day to them was blinding and blinded them, rendering them helpless. The long low house where Violet and her sisters soon saw proved to be a combination bunk house and mess hall. Around the walls the bunks were built. In the center was a long table on which the most nauseous meals you could imagine were served. The place was as Violet and her sisters saw was filthy and stagnant not at all ventilated and dimly lighted by weak lamps. It was a pent hole for the one hundred and thirty children now cooped up in it, but in another the boys were kept, and strange as Tim was able to tell the girls the next day the boys had a cleaner place and better meals than the girls. But it too was a pent hole and escaped from it seemed out of the question. Its sturdy walls and heavily barred windows made it a dreadful jail.

But Jim knew a way to escape if Violet and her sisters would be able to council with him.

On the next morning the Glandelinian leader brought out the new "slaves". "Had any success yet?" he asked interestedly as if he were no other than a regular mine owner interrogating his superintendant. "Come now, you mustn't take it that way" as he saw the bleak look on Tim's face and the hot rage doing in the eyes of the little girls. "I had to have expert advice you know and how else could I get it? I heard of you kids so I decided to get you. I'll make you a overseers instead of laborers if you come in handy." Then James Jones yawned to us some time ago about this mine was all a cock and bull story. "Well, Jimmie snapped."

"Jose is a good action" The sergeant chuckled satisfiedly. "But I trained him in that yarn. We'll have to use it again when we need new recruits."

"Not until we get our hands on him you won't" Catherine sneered. "I've got plenty to settle with you Glandelinians."

"No, now you must be too hard on us Glandelinian soldiers." The sergeant sneered mockingly. "And Jose is no Glandelinian. You do him wrong if you revenge on him. He had no choice the F. F. Dodge. You see he is quite wild about his little daughter. I held the brat here--and well Jose knew what would happen to the kid if he failed. I'd cut her guts out."

"You dirty devil." Tim Grovaton threw caution to the winds and with a trouser belt leaped for the mans throat, but before he could lay a finger on the sergeant two of his men were in action. Time flew by being only a boy too were helpless against their heavy market butts.

"Tools" the sergeant spat contemptuously. "I've giving you a chance to get out of here and not making you slaves. Make those kids find that main vein the dead owns spoke of and you eight mines can go. If you don't you'll stay here until you sweat and cough your little easy lives away. Get that. I want action. I'll give you two days to produce a result. If you have not made the brats locate the stuff for me by then my men will take a hand and speed you up."

"His men were like human wolves slaving and grinning at the prospect of being able to try out their tortures on these new supposed to be victims. If they had the chance they couldn't have done it. Violet and her sisters were now too dangerous. Two days of grace the sergeant had given them. Violet considered. Two days to effect a way out of this death trap--or to die in it. Should they make their escape or stay with the others until Penrod came. Finally they whispered to Tim.

"We're going to stay for the sake of these children until Penrod tries to rescue us. Don't fear for us. No for God's sake and try to find an avenue of escape when you do come and tell us."

For long hours while Violet and her sisters allowed to do the work of two men if possible with the rest of the girls Jim wandered through the dusty tunnels and drifts of the old mine. No where could he find coal in the work while quantities much less the vein in that these Glandelinians were now seeking. The mine seemed to be pretty well worked out, and nowhere could he find a possible avenue of escape. With special care he studied those places where a cave ins had put a stop to the work. In each case the accident seemed perfectly natural. The timbering was so sloppily erected that the whole redoubt held at all. In each of these caves ins tons of debris blocked the tunnels so that it would have taken months of work to clear them. Escape through one of these was out of the question. And he didn't know how many little bodies of slaves lay under that debris smothered to death. It was not until after dinner that he found the slightest encouragement. Then he was in a far distant part of the mine so far removed from the workers that he could not even hear the sound of their picks and drills.

All was still in this old tunnel the air dusty and dead and the dust of ages of the floor. Tim had followed it to the end and looked out face of rock and was about to turn back, disappointed when a slight indistinct noise came to him, but like a cat he waited. It sounded like the muffled tinkle of a pick against rock, and he could not believe it. Could it be a chance from the distant work? He strained his ears but no sound of the labor came to him. A faint, faintly came that muffled clink, and to his surprise it seemed to come from beneath him. On his hands and knees Tim went over the floor of that tunnel inch by inch, sneezing and coughing as the dust he raised threatened to smother him. After an hour of searching his pick tapped again just a part of the floor that gave a hollow echo.

Angerily he went to work on it, scooping away the dust, prying with his pick until close again that the wall he uncovered a slab nearly five feet square. When he wrenched it out of place he peered down into a black hole that smelled like a musty old tomb. Notches were chipped into the rock for steps and Tim soon found himself in another gallery of the old mine, a lower level extending far beyond the other tunnels the child slaves and Violet and her sisters were working. More clearly now he could hear the distant clink of a pick.

He felt extinguished his light, for he must not let that he seen and then Tim groped his way stealthily along the old tunnel. Gradually the sound of the pick became louder, and at last far down the tunnel he saw a man, naked to the waist picking away at the face of the rock. Tim saw the ore break off easily and fell heavily to the floor, even from that distance Tim knew it was high grade. Had he stumbled upon the main vein? And was there another way out of the mine down this tunnel? There was no opportunity now to investigate. He had to come back at night, when this half naked fellow was not at work. But how to get back into the mine after the slaves and he and Violet and her sisters were locked up for the night? Then Tim was the last to climb out of the shaft that night a pick handle was held securely by his belt beneath his shirt and trousers while the head stretched its length down one trouser leg. His shirt and trousers covered the wooden handle of a small shovel also, while against his belly he speeded the iron scoop. Now he could hide these so securely seemed miraculous.

How Violet and her sisters were made to night to stay in the back of the boy shack was also a mystery but he believed it was the work of the possession angels because they then could help him in his scheme. "It's our only and one chance to get out of this place! Violet agreed when she had heard of the new found tunnel. "If you can get the boys to help us sink a hole in the floor in the back of the bunk house we won't have more than twenty feet to go to reach the shaft."

Carefully Tim explained their plan to the fellow child slave prisoners after their jail had been locked up for the night. Here and there a hope burned momentarily in a little haggard face but for the most part these boys had forgotten how to hope. By night too they were too tired to build a pick or shovel.

In what they were convinced could be only another abusive bid for freedom. "All right! We'll handle this thing ourselves," Violet herself told them. "I'll put a reminder there is not a word to be said about what we are doing. This is only to liberate you, so we could escape other ways our selves and we've also done it for our cause. One word to any of these wickedly brutal men and I'll righteously have the life of the squealer remember that. Repeat a double cross and you're a traitor and deserve to die."

Even this threat was taken untheoretically. Fortunately for the plans, the Sergeant and his assistants seldom came into the bunkhouse and then never to the rear of the prison place. By careful picking the displaced dirt against the wall and under the bunks much of it could be hidden from view. Tim worked off the digging place and went at it first, and Violet and her sisters gradually took to him at it. Forth it was the great strength that did most of the work. For three nights they worked steadily sinking a hole nearly ten feet deep and then burrowing a tunnel across the intervening distance between it and the mine shaft. And still no sign of penetration or rescue. They wondered what happened. It was almost morning after the third night when Violet's pick broke through into the shaft. Carefully Tim stopped up the hole she had made.

That day was the worst of their captivity. Not until they were aware that not one of the Glendelinians could be in the mind or around the shaft did Tim and Violet and her sisters dare break through the thin barrier that still stood between them and the shaft. It was the work of only a few minutes to reach it. Tim had found that moment on they would have to move fast, they knew. In the morning the hole in the shaft could probably be discovered. That gave them only the night hours in which to make their escape.

"I'll be better if all you boys stay right here," Tim advised their fellows. "I'll have got the strength to tackle the long journey through the canyon and the Christian line as fast as get through we'll be back in plenty of time to face you."

Quickly, only a dozen of the men and armed with the pick and shovel he called, Tim and Violet and her sisters climbed through the aperture and into the shaft. Not until they were at the bottom did they light their lamps. Carefully Tim led the way to the hidden tunnel entrance, then down into the lower working. All was now silent in the lower tunnel but they made their way along it cautiously and quietly, never halting for a moment they paused at the spot where the half naked man had been at work, and Tim missed his raised his lamp to the rock surface.

"My word! Almost five gold!" He whispered in awe, as he fingered the rich rich stuff. "There are millions of dollars here." "Yeah, but my sisters, I'm more interested in getting out of this hole and so are my sisters," said Catherine. They never had had to travel so far, so they beyond this point the tunnel widened and opened into a rocky cavern complete with a full assortment of stalagmites and stalactites. A short distance beyond another opening indicated where the tunnel continued. Before any of them had a chance to cross the cavern however the light program was surprisingly interrupted. Suddenly some fellow leaped upon Tim back, and in another moment Violet was attacked by two others. The fight was fast and furious because her sisters joined in to help Violet and Tim, broken only by grunts, from the attackers, and a yelp of pain, as Tim's pick handle crashed down on a black haired skull. Violet unable to use her weapon, was roughly embraced by her assailant, precariously holding her balance as she and her rapist foe while defended by her sisters who attacked the two men teetered about the cavern. Tim, other opponent now held hold of the pick handle too, and it was a useless as a weapon. The fellow was lithe and muscular, and Tim had all he could do to keep the man's reaching fingers away from his throat.

Grabbing everything on a bit of strategy he suddenly released his grip on the handle and put all his strength in a boyish uppercut. It connected cleanly, and the battle was lifted off his feet before he fell to the floor in a heap and lay still. By this time Violet and her sisters were clinging on and beating him viciously had lost their balance. Backward over a stalagmite they plunged. A low groan escaped Violet's lips but her fingers had grasped her knife at last and she jabbed the man in the head with it until he was limp. But when she tried to stand up she could not; her ankle had been broken or sprained or that terrible vicious stalagmite.

"If all the luck!" said Tim quietly. "There's nothing for it but to go on alone," said Tim. "My sisters can go along with you. It's a since I can't go wandering around outside with this ankle."

"No! I'll stay here with you and so will the rest of my sisters," said Violet. "We can hide behind the stalagmites and we won't be seen. Tim can go and bring us help."

"What will you girls do for when you're naked?" Tim demanded. "The best we must do is to get back to the bungalow before those scoundrels come looking for us, and before these fellows command come also looking for them. Violet regarded the post-rat men with interest. "Glendelinians also," she pronounced. "Oma-ians maybe, though they look mighty like Mic-Hell-ians to me. If you can tell me what Glendelinians are doing coming around so close to the Christian lines?"

"That's just another command to add to our collection," Tim told her. "put if I can get out of here and get help we'll find the answer to all of them. A few more you and your sisters can get back to the bunk house!" "Don't worry about us Tim dear," said Catherine. "We'll take care of ourselves while you have the chance. You can't save any of us if you don't."

Silently they shook hands, then he embraced and kissed them good bye with a grip that meant more than words. Then Tim crossed the cavern and disappeared down the tunnel. And less it seemed climbing on and on into the ground. Then at last he felt a slight stirring of air. Tim came upon it as they must be close at hand, and indeed it was. Tim came upon it suddenly and immediately he sensed the familiarity of the place. There were the rocks he remembered and the Vivian Glendelin had placed there. There was the spot where he had headed shots with the Glendelinians across the canyon. Near below the cave was the place where Tim watched and still bent over the entrance and asked the first question when the animal had had a flight it snubbed off to the canyon without the slightest ill effects.

Tim grabbed his eyes instinctively. So some one had deliberately brought them there to the mouth of this cave so that he could take a man to look the way back to the mine, and he had deliberately led them to a dead animal to show a way to the mine. Until these circumstances had appeared to take them in that direction the poisoned animal had been an artistic touch for finished for the band it to discover any attempt at escape. And the dead animal the boy found still lay the same. He went across the stream to the animal and looked it over.

It was a very strange-looking automatic one that Penrod had brought over from America. It was a machine gun rifle. Then he sent for the on and took for the some boxes a codon boxes. There were three wooden boxes, one long and narrow, the other two flat and square. With straps and cords from the luggage he tied these boxes together and fastened them, piecewise on his back. Then he was ready, with a grim smile on his face. Tim Grevontina turned back the way he had come, as if he carried at one discharge would sweep across a segment out of existence.

"Bring them in." He commanded regally when quiet was restored. Immediately a half dozen men left the circle and sprang to do his bidding and he returned from the other side of the cavern with the bound forms of Violet and her sisters. He couldn't be helped for them, at least four had transfixed them but there was the look yet of the hope of rescue in their eyes. The appearance of the captives threw the leaders into a frenzy and he cursed them dreadfully and gave them slap after slap on the face as hard as he could strike them. Then he stopped short.

Tim knew that voice. There before him stood the man who had held him up on the railroad tracks some five days before he was freed. I wanted to be a Christian dog have studied in that snake to find out that was going on. I have seen my cause which the enemy world calls wicked suffer indignities at the hands of the Christian dogs, and many of my followers bear the marks of their greedy scheming. I have not complained, because my place was beside

At times he was afraid of light from a little fire that smouldered not near the entrance in the leader took a thick metal cup and advanced toward the little girls. In drinking he held the cup to violet's tortured lips and would have forced the contents down; the captive's throat had it not been for him, violet screamed horribly and strained every muscle and so did her sisters shriek dreadfully but her captors held her fast. She clenched her jaws and they strove to force her open her mouth.

To avoid the shots that would come from the guns the soldier scattered, and in the confusion Jim threw himself forward to where they were and cut them loose. Then gasping, Violet and Joyce and ordering the others to follow they were all beside the machine gun before the Glandelinians could rally. The Glandelinians were all staring fascinatedly at the machine gun sadly and angrily disappointed that Jim had interfered with the ghastly drama almost being enacted before them, and at his advice Violet and her sisters took advantage of their preoccupation to crawl warily into the cavern and keeping to the wall and using the stalagmites for cover and followed by Jim who dragged the machine gun with him made their way slowly toward the other tunnel.

The Glundelinian reader seemed to sense this and knew he must warn his superior readers so that the coming attack on the mine can be repulsed.

"How then to the defense of the mine," he screamed as he leaped to or from his perch and took the lead in a serpentine course toward the tunnel. This was a fine opportunity. He was so sick from what he had witnessed and which by the grace of God he had stopped in time that he had vomited and was shaky all over. Had they alone been not concerned he would have given a quarter and did not intend to. He would now give it to them. He threw himself flat on the ground behind a barrel like stalagmite with his machine gun in readiness and lay there motionless starting to be feet feed a belt of ammunition into the machine gun.

Glandelinians became fainter and more muffled ahead of him and the rest of the group. At last they reached the end of the tunnel and scrambled up the rock into the workings above. The mine was deserted, except for the sprawled bodies of a number of Glandelinians, and Tim and Violet and her sisters moved toward the shaft without interruption. They were still about twenty five feet away when a dull boom sounded in the shaft and a wall of air heavy with coal dust and the acrid smell of burned powder came rushing the to meet them.

One of the fleeing Glandelinians had blown up the tunnel leading from the mine shaft to the bunk house and the child slaves were now safely penned in their trap. That explosion ruined Time plans to get to the child slaves and liberate them but there was no need to. They heard dreadful noise up above as if a great conflict was raging for the possession of the mine grounds.

What Tim did not see up above was that the little girls didn't see was in a way good for them. Penrod their brother led an onslaught so furiously at the Glandelinian hosts near the mine and about the Canyon that not a smothering unusual occurred, and had not a Glandelinian stream of artillery should be let loose loose and destroy the attacking force. The Glandelinians would have paid dearly for making Violet and her sisters prisoners in the dreadful mine, but as the remainder of the panic-stricken troops fell back, they threw the rest of the attacking troops into wild confusion, who rolled in a retreating line a good way to the rear, without their officers being able to rally them, though they used all their skill and strength to effect it. Having broken the Christian line of attack to pieces, the Glandelinians counter-charged furiously, and thrashed the Christian line like a wheat sheaf.

Penrod could not understand how these Glandelinians being surprised by the attack could lay on his men so vigorously, but the Glandelinians whose "Hamd" was in would not give over rib-roasting the Christian line till the Glandelinian wave had tired out its passion and itself, and then the creeling reinforcements they crashed against the other broken sections of the Christian line and fell to it again without ceasing, till they had splintered them all to mere fragments. The Christian generals not withstand all this storm of battalions against their troops made desperate defenses with a fury as to seem to threaten heaven and earth.

The Glandelinians pressed the attack fully bent on the destruction of the whole Christian line in that conflict. Penrod seeing the Glandelinians come on so furiously, would gladly have withdrawn with the troops, not tiring to such exposed ground, but all he had time to do was to get his soldiers rallied as much as possible behind all manner of protection, and immediately both sides fired on one another with all the frightful fury of mortal enemies.

Tim and Violet and her sisters had been able to get out of the mine by this time and to the child slave bunk house and at that distance were witnesses of the furious combat. At the same time the Glandelinians rushed in such a furious attack and struck such a mighty blow, that had not most of the Christians now been in secure positions, they would have either been annihilated or driven back in a total rout. The Angelinian soldiery feeling the weight of that unmeasurable blow of the attack staggered nevertheless.

but were rallied and Penrod slipped fast his sword and met the charge again of the enemy for now Penrod was resolved to venture the fortune of the combat upon all one blow. The Glandelinians faced Penrod's counter-attacks now with a quiet bravery and withstood the terrible shock. While the conflict was raging so furiously and while the Christians were again rushing rushing upon the wary Glandelinians with a full resolution to cleave this Glandelinian army at the mine asunder, all the little spectators in the bunk house and other slave houses stood trembling with terror and a amazement, expecting the dreadful event of these prodigious battles, and Violet and her sisters were praying desperately, that Providence might deliver them, the child slaves and their brave brother out of the great danger that threatened them. Both sides with the fury of the conflict seemed to threaten heaven and earth, and the infernal regions, while the little spectators seemed wholly lost in fear and astonishment. Then after some lull the Glandelinians being reinforced discharged a most tremendous blow, and made an attack with such force and fury, that had not the attacking line been thinned out by the Christian fire of rifles and machine guns that single charge would have put an end to that dreadful combat and all of Penrod and the little girls adventures too. But fate that reserved Violet and her sisters and Penrod for greater things, so ordered it, that the enemy's left wing was so turned in such a manner by a sudden counter-attack, that though the Glandelinian attack had struck the Christian center it did no other hurt but just roll up that section for some distance. At least as yet powers, but it is in vain, to explain the many child then and around the Christian counter-attack, we would but admit it for what manner of speech can be lively enough to give but a slight description of the position of the unfortunates of that attack. The Christians exerting all their valor made a great charge, but the Glandelinians met it just as bravely and discharged such a tremendous blow upon the Christian attack that in spite of so good a charge and then defense, they reeled and fell back in confusion. Then the Glandelinians charged with such gallantry and resolution that they pierced pieced and broke and put to flight Penrod's great body of troops in an instant charging through and through not without a great slaughter of the mortal enemies.

In the meantime no food had been served in the big bunk house all day and the rest of the Glandelinians had come near the building, put fearing that the child slaves and the prisoners within would be rescued they finally, as many as they could on hearing the shots and strange noises of the battle had fled to the place and threw themselves within. These Glandelinians could easily understand the strange yells and the countless number of shots and knew that something unusual was afoot. With threats and cuffs the leader bullied the other men who were laborers for the Glandelinians into some semblance of activity. Under the lieutenants directions these over-averse men broke up the child slave bunks to provide themselves with clubs while the soldiers saw to it their guns were well loaded and bayonets at the ready while a machine gun was placed at the door.

By late afternoon after the noise and roar of battle had sounded all day the lieutenant saw the country side all in the territory of the mine shaft sudden began to speak forth an amazing stream of Angelinian soldiers. Leading the stream was a fantastically garbed Christian officer.

There were so many that only an angel could count them and they were armed with more weapons than soldiers usually carry. In a swarm they descended on the bunk house and other buildings, and those coming upon the bunk house rushed up to the big door and threw back the outside bars.

"Ready now" the lieutenant cautioned the big group of defenders. You with the clubs watch the slaves and prisoners so that they don't take advantage of the fight and try to make an escape or attack us from behind. The lieutenant with his machine gun took his place nearest the door. The moment it was pushed in his machine gun went into action and swept away every Christian soldier who were confronting the door and many of the others fell off beside. Two others however had managed to get in despite that and a mother soldier of the enemy started his bayonet into action. Howls of pain were his reward and at the sudden frightful slaughter the mob gave way, dragging back with it two who had also been knocked unconscious by clubbed rifles.

"Let's number one" the lieutenant encouraged the Glandelinian soldiery and overrears behind him. "Now those not in the fight stand back away from that door. They know what to expect and will not be so anxious to walk in for more but may hurl hand grenades. If they do they'll kill the brats and I won't warn them that kids are here either. If those Christian dogs win you kill every girl and boy for won't have them rescued."

As this was evidently a fact and he could not rally do it now Violet and her sisters for the sake of the slaves not themselves prayed inwardly that the Christians would not win at this section of the battle field.

Twice more the Glandelinians tried to carry the long bunk house by storm but the machine gun swept them away by hundreds every time piling that part of the ground up with slain soldiery. Outside the Christian leader was exhorting them to renewed efforts and explosions of grenades came in terrifyingly to the panicky children but so far only the defenseless defenders were mangled by the fragments though now a great hole was in the doorway the attackers saw that there were children in the building.

There was a pause in the attack then, and finally the Christian leader came forward with a white flag of truce. The Glandelinian leader went out to learn the cause of the truce.

"I demand you give up the Princesses and that boy scout, and the children over to us," said the Christian leader. "If you do I'll call off the fight. If you don't I'll have to ask it despite the children and burn you out. There's no way to defend the rear of the bunk house and you know it."

"If you win this fight we'll red the Glandelinian lieutenant. I'll make massacre all the children in this place. And also remember here on I give no quarter and ask for none. Understand?"

As it was on any day said the Christian leader. As soon as the two went back at the lieutenants order Violet and her sisters and the child slaves including Tim were forced to the open door under strong guard so that if the Glandelinians threw the hand bombs the children would be killed first. The Christian leader then threw two of them and, don't mean maybe.

They luried inside the building.

exploding among the overcoats and killing every one of them and wrecking the place miserably without injuring the children. The enemy must not have known that the grenadiers can throw.

Then the Christian leader resorted to fire. Helpless to defend the back of the house the imprisoned men had to listen to the preparations as kindling was piled against the wall, and the flames started to leap up to the roof. Gradually the heat made the rear of the building untenable, and the flames were spreading rapidly toward the front.

Nothing to do but make a rush for it. Lieutenant Red Dolliver grated as he eyed the oncoming flames. "Better than flying here. If we do the last one out before the door if possible so the brats cannot get out and let them burn." Grimly he watched the raging furnace. The heat in the building was already a terrible thing. It was only a matter of a few minutes now before they would have to charge out into that mob of howling Christian soldiery. To wait to chance further contact with that deadly machine gun at the door the Christian soldiery were content to circle the doorway at a safe distance. It would be only a matter of seconds before their victims must come out and they knew it.

Now that death was staring him in the face, Lieutenant Red wickered as he found that he could regard it dispassionately. He had to have to go out like this at the hands of a lot of "Christian" dogs who would give no quarter since he so recklessly suggested it. Colonel Jim would bring help sooner or later but by that time there would be left nothing but corpses of soldiers and burned bodies of children in the building to tell the story. The children from the heat were screaming and panicky and strove to get out but were beaten down by the soldiers. For the lieutenant the flesh on the back of his neck was baking, he could smell the cloth of his uniform coat scorching. The miserable crowd of soldiers huddled around him began to whine piteously. They would rather die fighting than burn like rats in a fire trap.

"O kay you fellow!" he said grimly. "When we dash out six of you can the door and kill those kids who strive to get out of flying them in. These Christian dogs will never rescue --- wait a minute. What kind of devilry is that?"

"That" was a commotion that had started at the mouth of the mine shaft.

Out of it popped a stream of Glandelinian soldiery six of them armed with something strange. Now the last of the fellows were out of the shaft, and those with the queer objects were squatting on the ground while one man behind was dragging something heavy and shiny out of the shaft. The lieutenants head threatened to pop out of his head.

"We're attacked in the rear by machine gunners!" screamed the Christian leader in his rage. "Don't let them discharge their pieces. One made them. One made them."

With his revolver spitting bullets a big fat officer led the charge in that direction, and half the mob of soldiery turned as one man to sweep those soldiers away from the shaft head. But the Christian leader was not the only one who had read that strange performance correctly. His sword swinging in a deadly circle around his head, and a wild rebel yell heard ringing his approach Lieutenant Red Dolliver charged out of the bunk house with his men covering the short distance of the shaft in a few minutes and flung himself down on the ground beside one of the machine gunners.

There was a blunder on the part of the Glandelinians within the bunk house for in their excitement they who were last out had forgotten to carry out their orders and therefore the child slaves and the others were able to save themselves from the flames and not only that were but were immediately in possession of the Christians who had remained there and therefore fled off to safety with the children.

"And what in the world are you doing here?" Lieutenant Red asked when you were in the mine below. "The machine gunner demanded as he began feeding a long belt of ammunition into the big machine gun he had just managed to rig up."

The gun went off at a terrific hammering and from six guns a fearful and awful hissing stream of bullet lead swept the fury mad hordes of Christian soldiery before it to almost the last man. Indeed that deadly fire of those six machine guns blasted nearly all the Christian attackers a way like a forest of leaves before the typhoon. In a few minutes nothing remained of the Christian soldiery but a field of lifeless bodies and a few racing figures rapidly disappearing down the canyon. "Look as if you and your followers were getting kids warm in the building," the gunner observed as he watched the flaming roof of the long bunkhouse go tumbling down in a big shower of sparks and amid great clouds of black smoke. "What do you think--have we cleaned up things satisfactorily?"

Lieutenant Red did not know the three or four things had been all cleaned up. He was keenly interested in how the other Christian soldiery had dealt with the children and gotten away with the children after all, and there were a few things he wanted to discuss with those who had failed to obey his orders to burn inside the door so the children could not escape the flames. But that was not to be for those last ones out had been killed by Violet and her sisters who drew secret weapons upon them, and then led the terrified children to safety. Near the burned structure two men lay crushed in a death grip. An Angelinian soldier was on top of a fat Glandelinian his rifle buried deep in the heart of the Glandelinian, but the fat man's heavy fingers were closed so tightly and violently around the Christian soldier's throat that the man's eyes bulged almost out and his tongue protruded, but both were dead.

"Poor fat devil!" a lieutenant pined him. "He was a good soldier at that and died fighting. We'll get even with those little little vivian brats for their escapade."

"Righting" read the sergeant.

The lieutenant's eyes glared.

"Put it there!" he demanded as he thrust out his big paw.

At other parts of the battle field of Mine Canyon Penrod realized that with such a number against him it was impossible to win the fighting and so when he learned that Violet and her sisters and the other children with Jim were rescued from the mine house, he gradually and carefully withdrew the attack by night fall, and all made a safe retreat under cover of the darkness. The soldiers who had rescued Violet and her sisters brought them by swift horse and wagon back to camp where the slight burns on the lips of two of them made by the hot cup were taken care and the rest given a sleeping drug by Evans so they could sleep off the horrors of their experience.

Penrod was pleased the news of that had almost happened from Tim when he got back to camp, but it had been not necessary as he had heard of it before hand, and therefore had given no quarter to the Glandelinians whom he had attacked. Along with his defeat in the battle nevertheless came into his possession from a Glandelinian officer he shot down himself a strange sort of paper with notes and words or it which he couldn't make out. He immediately showed it to the little pilot scout leader Angelina Ritchie who was a code reading expert.

"See?" Penrod said his keen blue eyes sparkling, his lips tripping into a forced smile for he was now anxious too to see his sisters and find out how they fared. "It's enough to bring us out of the red howl if we can find what it means."

"Yes if we can find what it means," she replied seemingly unenthusiastic. "It's a very strange tricky code. It's so long ago since we got codes that I have almost forgotten what they look like. Besides some of the code experts must think we find scout code readers can find a needle in a burning haystack. Codes made in foreign languages as that are hard to match."---

The young Prince smiled again. Taking a small package from his pocket he lifted the cover softly, fingered a sort of magnifying glass. Detectives use to trace things and so on.

"But they have made it easy very easy," he answered, holding the object in such a manner that Tim could examine it very closely. Then Angelina Ritchie narrowed her eyes, squinted, while Tim, leaning acquiescence asked walked away to take care of Violet and her sisters to see how they fared not thinking that General Jack Evans their guardian was watching the little girls closely.

CHAPTER IX

THE HANGING AND DEATH OF PRINCESS VIOLET, JENNIE VIVIAN DOLL.

In the meantime George Bull O-lenderance a Christian and a I...
Ishman and a forikener but now a renegade, and first class example of wicked human soul of the lust degree and on the side of the Glandelinian and working for the Glandelinian cause, but now by the grace of the devil, cook in the nearest Angelinian Mess hall, stepped softly across the O-many street in the ghastly lines in the darkness toward the headquarters of the Vivian girls and entered. Reaching Violet's bedroom, a vague little she perceived that of a beautiful little girl looked before him on Violet bed the whiteness of the dress and the golden color of the hair showing plainly in the darkness of the room. The dress seemed to move with the gentle heave of the breeze coming in the open window, and the little girl apparently asleep seemed totally unaware of the approaching footsteps within the room.
George the spy moved cautiously closer after softly closing the door his huge muscled arms dangling at his hips like that of some big dancer who up. He almost looked as hedious as one. The childish figure in the dark seemed to move as if to turn over in her sleep. The muscular hands were clenched and he leaped for the bed at the same instant, his tense hands grasping forward.

The out thrust fingers encountered what they sought. Something very soft yielding. They clamped vice like about the center portion of the throat nearest the chest and pressed in with great force. The town of Ophelia across the river was as black as the intervening waters of the river themselves though here and here and there flickered the yellow lights near or distant of camp fires, and glimmers of distant conflagrations as if they burned the humid gloom.

Above all these lazy yellow lights the far distant dim rolling crest of a hill rungs behind the town could be distinguished. And over all a million staring cold eyed stars blinked play through the smoky sky as they watched the Glandelinian spy at his task. But the stars did not say anything in protest. Neither did the blackness of the night. Because of a strong south eastern forest fire heat wind the air was hot heavy and parching dry. No George cursed the forced sweat that trickled down his hairy arms, thence to the little girl's neck, the heat and circumstance of the work making his struggling grip much less secure and uncertain.

The wonder to the murderer was that the little girl did not struggle or with her hands make an effort to loosen his grip nor did the face which he could see show any signs of stimulation like bulging eyes and protruding tongue.

The confounded heat produced by the forest fire as which had killed all hope of winter that year. Once this last thing was done and he could accomplish his work and break all records by killing one of the Vivian girls which none of the Glandelinians could do he intended to leave the Glandelinian service, leave the hot hell hole of Ophelia, never to set foot on any but a land again.

He had chosen the very headquarters of Violet and her sisters for his job, the point farthest away down the big long hall. He thought of poor Violet's sisters and of Jim Groveton.

"How," he glowered thoughtfully. "It would take a devil of a racket to make them doze, and when they see their sister Violet dead and their headquarters robbed they'll have a sorrow they'll never get over from." His teeth flashed in an evil grin. "Though they could fool me with a clever spy with that fate of a snake set up. Fooling only going to put me off the track. Thought they kept those plans secret, and when I caught them with it, could, they said it was a fake plan (it was) That the real thing was coming, later. It is just a trap, I know it. Piff. I'll snare them. I'm no fool. See if the poisoner or Angela can prevent me from checking their sister Violet to death.
But how still she lies. Why didn't she struggle. Maybe she couldn't stand it and died a light away though it is funny she doesn't protest. Her tongue like a dead smiling person down her neck is so soft I can't see it. I almost off and still she doesn't protest. Her tongue any."

The apparently trembling body beneath him seemed for some reason or other to give a sudden violent quiver, then still and flared like a suddenly thunder deck slab.

For ten minutes longer the same motion like a ship heeled about the now distended throat. He fancied he saw some hair on the pale but not so pale skin. Then he slowly lifted himself and stepped softly to the window creaking the limp little body off the bed. In the darkness he could only feel his way, and even that none too well. He stumbled over something Violet had left lying on the floor and swallowed a profane oath. Feeling about in the darkness he finally felt a place outside where he could hang the little girl by the neck for he intended to make off by a written note that to escape for the who was her name of the name Violet had hanged herself. Then he came in contact with a rope was hanging loose coiled on top of a table. He gripped as his fingers touched it. The rope was just long enough. Then going out into a lighted hall he took a piece of paper and a letter of Violet's which he had in his possession, and copying he hurriedly wrote (he was an expert at that he wrote).

"I Princess Violet find my sorrow and hard ships of the war too much for me. So the for a dear sister I'll have to hang myself to escape for that she suffered. Bid brother Paul good bye for me. Don't worry for I'll see you in the next world where there is no suffering."

Violet."

Then he placed the note on the table beside Violet's body and then quickly he tied the line tightly around the little girl's neck making sure that it not only had a good tight straight hold but that it also would not loosen and slip as he lowered the little body out of the window. He had to work swiftly and surely. Fastening the other end of the rope to a long pike of something that stuck securely out of the brick wall near the window he then lowered the body away until it was hanging the full length of the rope. He then fixed up the bed to make it appear as if Violet had not been in it. Then he heaved a sigh of relief, and rubbed his sweaty hands on his trousers.

"That's done he whispered hoarsely. "It went off like clockwork. Clock work. All according to the program, made up. I can fancy the grief the little brats will have when they see their beloved sister dead and comitted suicide as supposed. The next thing will be I'll wait until I reach Hanley's lines and tell him and get the story of Violet's death proved. Hall be jealous of me because, was the only man who could kill one of them. I would have killed the others too but the sorrow of a brother's death is worse than death so I won't. The lousy little Christian brats."

He glowered thoughtfully then stepped swiftly to the other part of the building. Before the room of the others he paused a moment staring once more in the unreal relieved shadows across the dark and as he lived. Then the soft plaintive throbbing of a beating fault-wafted across the blackness. He was sick of that continual thumping too. He hated music. But only a single yellow light showed against the black ground of the night. The spy spat at the town.

"What those little sisters of mine see hanging there they'll surely go crazy with grief. He turned his head. "As for me I'll go to Hanley's lines the first opportunity."

He stepped to one of the windows of the hall. Leaning out he peered across one of the company streets. Then turning his eyes off from the sleeping camp and turning back he calculated.

"What a blind old cat of the day. Now for the next act, and Jirda Thenda will be clanking the vict'ry."

Going cautiously across the hall for a corridor, he glided noiselessly toward the council room. Then taking a small flash light from his vest pocket he turned it on. It cast a pale beam ahead of him. Objects flashed into view and he blinked grimly. He looked into Jolene's room. Over there on the counter on a rack was her hair. The clothes hanging. But she was not in bed.
"They won't wake up," they won't be mumbled. "They're got rough to keep them under for a long long time yet. Then he went into Jennie's room. Over there at the head of the bed the headquartern room broom, Jennie's comical pillow. He think of it had made it himself, a bamboo handle thick dark colored brush of coconut fiber. It was a hump. The shadow of the stove pipe and a over it. He chuckled confidently.

They were not the only one within the christian lines who could think up stomach schemes.

"They thought they were very smart," he said to himself. "Trying to fool me because they caught me looking at the code letter. They're both."

"But that the Glaxo-delinquents should be forcing it on the little Piddicannas. I'll let them take it, but I wouldn't take it. We girls and boys gotta don't let you know that we do. One of us is seconded and then, and the Glaxo-delinquents get it good and hot for it."

"Huh," said the other g.I.D. "use n you don't know what you are talking about. It is safer for them and all of us. It is safer to be in the army and too as they are prisoners it is the proper found duty to do what they are doing now. But, I can explain to you how good, they have found them all to be to be."

"Th y are like all Abbieonian child - en. "Id you ever go to School in th is count - ry.?"

"Well when you've had one you'll see children are not here like in your and other countries. They're very naughty. They never whisper or talk in school when they ought not to do. They shirk their studies in school, and they won't be disturbed either. Only when it is necessary for curses would we children really fight when or like you kind do and that there would be no sin. On example this happened once when I went to school, a foreign child was there and he wouldn't be here in school."

"Then he started beating our good sister by talking loudly and wouldn't obey her. He said cruel things, and then threw wet pup-sballs at us girls. Well we stood it for quite a while then one day we laid for him after school. We do not need to tell what happened but he was a well behaved boy after that. Each of us girls righteously took turns striking him with a whip, while a boy held him. He was very good in school after that and too we forgave him as he satisfied us to see him so changed. I've been in various armies as a girl scout and a nurse and my name is Mary Stuck near and every arm, so would the Princess be. They have never said a cruel thing, about anybody, not even about their Greenlandian enemies when they could be justified to do so, bought once one of the best and beautiful little dresses she ever had her eyes on one day and saw her too. I was with her came upon some little fuges gld she had nothing on but a rag and the child was piece size Juice gave the clothes to her. you could not make them jealous if you loved, and there is hundreds of other good things they always do that I cannot think of at this moment, and be sure they laugh at some of the enemy's really foolishness, not they the enemy. Menley don't say no but I know from non-expectation as I discovered that Stanley and I are devoted to death of them. So you see they are very good, very good little girls. They will love each other most intensely, but they love Violet the best, and accept her as the leader. That is why she is always mentioned the first.

1st the school caught the hot pin of the hat or something in the dark left my loan, not something else and then said to give a trial when as compared to the old school and to a lot of the old school

On the night of 1-19-68, the defendant knew what she did and she could see that the light was on the light. In the dark, she walked until she found the flag and she took it to the school hall. There was a beautiful flag of our country torn in two, he had done it through the carelessness of some boy because it was so low, he did not know what was to do as she took it down and tucked it into her blouse, and he walked from the room in the order to go back home and try to mend it. He told me that all the time the place of flag held near the window, she seemed to feel the light of the moon and around the Crown street passing into her soul. At supper she was so unhappy that her sister, father and mother and brother and sister about her poor violent could not eat a bite and yet they told her again and again that he could not eat over something she did not intentionally do. Yet the next morning he and his sister and his cousin and sister went to her breakfast with her sister. She said the eyes did not appear to her, and the milk and sour, he had seemed to see the two parts of the flag to gather with a needle and thread but no matter how hard he looked the flag looked as though it was a needle, he could not take it. He took the flag and he found the flag and the tears were running down poor violent's cheeks, and the torn flag was wet with his tears. He and mother showed and did his little daughter's tears and helped her to mend the flag, at last she and sister found out who was responsible for the damage and she found a sign but about who was responsible for what he did, and believe me, violent and his sister and mother and brother and sister him and she came flying a hundred and four times without stopping no matter how tired he got, until it was good evening, violent and his sister were easily seen in the study of our classroom.

He recalled himself more comfortably on the bed. This was his day off. He was a hungry, hungry, as a wolf; but he did not care to Antilla was too excited. He decided he could ask for plenty for food he would have to wait just now. Vaguely sitting there now on the bed a word wonder about the situation. He had no completely as he had to do with death and then hurt out by the window. The light before nobody had mentioned yet that the police were investigating the case he did hear of a considerable excitement about one of the Division of Police meaning he would. He could not understand why she would when he did not know them. He said, "Oh, had I heard and Jack, when I was alone, alone about the missing girl. Thinking she only was lost, that the note had blown out the fire and that the girl had gone outside the building and that I had heard, I was in some way personally as a part of this case from the agent that I had with the infinite influence of a man he felt he had done his job. All I can afford to tell twice the police had passed him even that now looked in. He listened in vain for the sound of footsteps as he walked when they discovered a violent banging outside the window by the man with the note. Once he saw that this girl with the door looking in at him with a terrified expression, light his blood, a muffled

He prepared himself and opened the big pocket book in his trousers leg and examined himself. He had a lot and his pants most perfectly. He wondered if the "dead" little Vivian Girl Princess was still hanging by the long ropes near the wind or whether he had left her to rot because he could be in the "Glendelinian" camp. The world was full and the wicked Glendelinian cause would be easy then. But now he must appear weak exhausted and lazy. Thinking he walked off later toward the river.

On this same day Violet and her sisters decided to go out to do a little scouting on the river, but to find out ever if she had not angled the doll Violet was advised by Evans not to do so herself but make it seem as if she had disappeared. She did so therefore and remained hiding her state with Fern. Fred went on the river there fore and believe me it turned out that I'll have to write a story of a most remarkable escape from death for one of the little girls that here had been equalled for uniqueness at least in this story. After dinner they left their headquarters in a good sized military motor boat and began to go down the river a little ways. They came to a part of the river where though it was deep it was not too deep and they could see it to the bottom of the river. They saw below a sort of trap between two jagged rocks at the bottom attached by a long rope hanging from a floating object some distance away. Joyce herself was standing up near the edge of the boat to see what was going on on shore and she and her sisters saw a man about to throw something. He almost lookd like a man that Jim had seen in suspicious places. He hurled a rock and it struck Joyce on the left side of the neck and from the blow she lost her balance and went over-board and to the bottom of the river like a diver. Some of the little fir girls fired at the man for doing that thinking it was an attack but he ran out of range. Joyce who was a fish in swimming began to struggle and gave a strong kick which she thought would send her to the surface. But instead she felt a sudden terrific jolting pain in her ankle and found she was half a foot fast only a foot above the bottom. When she had a fit she felt herself falling out of the boat she had gulped a huge huge mouthful of air. He surely needed it now. Glancing up she could see the forms of her terrified sisters - three of them who were trying to clutch her own and pull her up. They could not reach her falling shot by no more than six inches, when V. Joyce in agony for air stretched to her utmost. But her foot was held fast in the bright of some sort of a war warp which had coiled into a deadly trap which she had stepped in when she gave that mighty push on the bottom. Joyce therefore owes her life wholly to the presence of mind of her sisters and penrod and a lucky combination of circumstances. What would take a few minutes to tell really transpired in a few seconds as Joyce with her lion lungs almost bursting for fresh air was just about to open her mouth and failing to get air down. Lying loose in the boat above was a six foot plev of garden hose. They saw when for it desperately, distracted because they in their hurry couldn't see it. Oh My god! said Jennie "please help us find it if you will and no one else had cried out when Penrod saw the garden hose. They had looked for it because they knew what to do having seen pictures of deep sea divers with his rubber air line going up to the surface.

but her sisters and Penrod thought fast knowing there was there was only one last hope for her, to get a knife kn ife to her so that she could get out the rope that held her Penrod draw his big sharp sheath knife. if he could get this knife down there so she could seize it, cast the hoxe f rom her mouth, hold her breath, stoop and slash the imp dnoosing wa r p slashed the holding strap as she might such the surface alive. Carefully tying the knife knits to the end of a stout line Penrod lowered it until it dangled in Joyce's face, would the little trapped girl grasp what to do with it, she did just as a wave broke over the upper end of the garden hose and filled it with water. Joyce seized the open knife in a death-grip and sunk as quickly as she could to the bottom. There she slashed madly, wildly missing at first, but finally by cutting her hand along her ankle, she found the strap and severed it.

With only strength enough for one feeble kick she shot upward gasping for air as she popped out of the water. Penrod dragged her into the boat, and gave her a small draught of brandy so she wouldn't faint over the recent experience. Then all went ashore and a search for the man who threw the stone was made but he couldn't be found.

McGill saw Evans standing near the gate of the Vivian Mills headquarters.

Vivian girls headquarters his blue eyes held straight ahead. He had sure a stealing yet the Foreigner was not scared as long as nobody suspected him.

Bull Olunder chuckled to himself. In a few minutes he would leave his room with the utter hope of course that the real plan was in his possession. Therefore Mr Bull smiling confidently, approached him with out stretched hands.

hand.. "Your Excellency" he said gunnily "I thank you for signing me on when I need ad some money. I'm grateful but darn sorry about the lost plan. If I hear of it I'll send you word."

Jack plans keen blue eyes flashed, fastened on Glunder's. He did not say anything, however, but gave him the pay and let him go. He turned away his heart pounding tempestuously. He was thrilled to the innermost core by his final success even though he was surprised that Evans did not answer to his "Good bye General." Nevertheless his success showed on his heavy features. It showed in his striding car, as he walked. He chuckled to himself that he had strangled one of the Vivian Girls, got the plans and to ward off a search had knocked one of them into the river all had gone on a certain distance.

"Mr Olundson"
The words came very softly, very gentle in tone, from young Tim Grovetons lips, but there really was a strange note in that softness. For an instant the impulse to loup and - an almost overcome impulse but he stifled it, nothing could be wrong now, and why should he have to run from a mere "brat" of a boy, except...he turned with an ingenuously smiling smile. The smile froze on his lips. Violet, and he persisted stood almost in a line. He was shocked to see violet and voice very much alive, but there stood Tim Groveton and he had his hand on something that made Olundson's eyes pop - a heavy forty five. The muzzle was pointed straight at him. At some distance was Perrod coming to see what Tim was doing. Olundson blinked, flushed, forced a hard harsh laugh.

"What's the idea a kid he stammered?"

"What's the idea a kid he stammered?"

Tim G. rovetone smiled, but there was no humor in the smile. "You are not real leaving us yet Mr. Glunden" just wanted to see what you would do and saw you every action. My suspicious were correct, so every thing worked fine. Oh, you suggested us, stole the fake plane, tried to murder me, two of the little girls, hanging of course one of the dolls mistaking it for Princess violet, and thought you were getting away with it. I saw it for Prince violet and hit pole in the boat."

The grim muzzle of the forty-five never wavered. The blood drained from Olund's face leaving it pallid and sickly in hue. For the first time his nimble brain refused to function. He staggered, sputtered, and finally collapsed. "Take him under two gl..."

course you crushed the neck of my life sized doll thinking it was my sister and then hang it by the window,who else did?"

"It was a bluff, Bull figured. He regained instant control of his face now. They had tried to third degree him. The little fools. The little fools. Why you crazy little fools. Some body else who'd swung you stole the plans away from me. Was the liver and----"

"Saw did the doll hang itself. "Asked Violet." And did the doll write tightly closed room. Second man, that they had remembered of hearing that a dangerous spy he was and how much damage he had done to other Christians a-miles away. The force to prevent that they must get him. And too, it ghtsously they would not take his treatment of him who had to be now in a hospital because if not so his skull had almost been fractured. And he would be probably be in the hospital for more than a month. And he was so seriously injured they couldn't just yet see him. And too though a spy got away from him it had been the spies that no Glendelinian or other spy had never yet got away from here or her sister. But this was the first time they had ever gone into the enemy camp to go after and put a spy on the "pot". It was a dreadful disaster to the Glendelinian general no matter who or where they were for he had been one of the most valuable spies ever on record for the Glendelinian cause.

Though he was on the one side, not on the other in the Christian line was there a spy to equal him in success, not even the little girl, and the force had been such a dreadful menace that the highest Christian authorities had offered huge rewards for his destruction. Of course violet and her sisters could not see a clue that would lead to they would have been the prey of themselves.

This unusual incident threw all Glendelinian difficulties into rank and file to the little girl. But it made their hat red of them in the end all the more and they plotted to bring fierce means to bring on their destruction, not to send spies to do it but without hope as no one now would dare do it. These few weeks to attempt to even enter the Christian lines and an scout the pot-boys of Glendelinians especially at night would look a-bought in every direction with a staff force of meeting with the little girl in the dark and having a fatal encounter with them. They were more dreaded than the timid persons for the so called "spook" or ghosts and thought the Glendelinian armies the excitement was intense. When go great was the excitement within the Glendelinian armies battling the Christian at "Minda Rhonda" that it caused tempo-temporarily a suspension of hostilities, hostilities, and even the Glendelinian general at night kept extra guards out, and kept light burning in their rooms for fear of meeting with the Vivian girl in the darkness under a red.

General John Manby himself said when he heard of the incident:

"Do you think I am afraid of the little girl? Let them come and try something on me but nevertheless he too put on extra guards, and his very bed-room was well lighted at night, and he dared not go to bed either side of him."

Oh no. Though very righteously doing so Violet and her sisters were the dangerous to the Christian lines and the wicked spies, that the want of gunmen criminals were to their own victims of adventure and more intolerably successful. Their country's cause was at stake and they were desperate. They had heard of disaster happening to general Minderhine's army at Minda Rhonda and that the force were winning signal victories and they were on edge. They had decided to go to Minda Rhonda as soon as possible and then bid them to go and that within a week he would come and follow them. See the adventures they'll have in the following chapters.

THE THIRD YEAR OF THE GREAT GLANDUO-ANGELINIAN WAR. A YEAR OF VIOLENT DESTRUCTION, TYPHOIDS OF WARS DEVASTATIONS, AND A HIGH OF THE "TRUCK-BYOND" HELL'S UNFATHOMABLE FURY.

The invaders after their retreat had left horrible tales behind them. Nearly two thousand miles of country had during the full duration of the second year duration of the war had been left in a dreary waste by the Glendelinian hordes. Only

Only about nine hundred cities and towns had been spared and these were in the west where no activity of any kind to had also yet occurred on account of Minderhine's armies being there in many separate columns. The only main cities spared in Calverine were Calverine, Bivaria and McWhittier, and McWhittier and these were to go soon before long as the war progressed in the west where the fiercest conflicts the world had ever seen were fought.

None were spared in northern or western portions of the east part of Calverine and neither in the south. All this devastation crippled Calverine the big city itself and also Angelina Agathia and the big city of Gordinia. The invasion of the enemy during the outbreak of the war to this time had caused much destruction to children of all kinds that it was estimated that from hundreds of thousands even three million in total were orphaned and that there were only ten million one hundred hundred and eighty thousand left. In Calverine in the southeastern part of the east the Glendelinians had wiped out nearly all the innocent children as only one thousand were left and only fifty of these were girls. The reason why the boys were more in numbers of survivors because of the hatred of the invaders were more fiercer on the girl children and their lust to kill girl children was greater than the lust to kill boy children, which the Glendelinians had intended to either force into the service as boy scouts or kill them and many of these did yield sooner than have their intruders torn out. Many millions of others were now childless and their woe and grief can never be told.

Despite his victory general Vivian believed it possible or impossible to make a move not northward as yet as his armies had been terribly weakened and the money exhausted and from horrible losses from those dying of disease and misery through the winter of that year which had covered the ground throughout the season to the depth of four or fourteen feet at some times and even now though it was the third of April it was still ten feet above sea level.

The nation in the north was completely in jeopardy from the devastated regions, from the losses in northern armies and innocent victims and could do nothing to back general Vivian up and so all was looking toward general Vivian and his armies and wondering what he would do under such a circumstance.

His orders coming to general Vivian on April thirteenth during a heart attack was to hold and not to advance until general Minderhine the chief commander in Calverine did and not to do anything until warmer weather came. Violet and her sisters knew of general Vivian's great victory at McWhittier which were not there to witness it, as they had in disguise as Glendelinian boys' scouts went back to Minderhine both from which they had fled at Tamarina's retreat. They were found with the help of Starrington to solve the mystery of the little Ann's Archburg murder and for a week they had spent their time examining every contents of the barn studying every picture of the children carefully and even listening to the bones on the phonograph with delight.

"If only herediture was here we could do something," said Violet. "There's pictures here of all of children who led in the child labor rebellion but it's not among them."

"And yet she had been one of the main leaders," said Starrington. "If only we could lay our hands on T. Thomas Philanthropia Tamarina or T. Thomas Philanthropia as they call him all would be well."

"That's true too," said Jennie. "But then it is exceedingly dangerous to tittle with that roge. He is worse than any one next to Federal the 'HUMAN TORNADO'."

"Suppose her spirit would come," advised Angelina. "You remember sisters we saw her once but then she would not break the secret of the mystery not even to us."

"I wonder what in that snuff like box box in the other room?" said Jennie. "I've been prying and trying to break it open for the last half hour but the door won't budge an inch."

"Smash the door open," said Violet eagerly. "It must contain the secrets I'm sure! Starrington himself at last managed to get it open, though it took a lot of work to smash the door from the hinges."

"I don't see why it was locked so securely for when there is nothing in it," said Starrington with a loud laugh.

"That's funny," said Jennie. "I thought there were great values inside when it was so securely fastened."

"I see it has an inside door," said Angelina.

"Maybe there is a nothing beyond that said Jennie. It looks like a door."

My dear friend Annie A. Connelley wrote you this letter warning you that governor Tomas Federal has ordered assistant governor Raymond Richardson Federal to bring on your immediate death right away for your vilest excesses in the leadership of the U. S. "Child Rebels" and it is advisable to fly for he will go you if you don't. This is a Gemini Gemini who has written. Your friendly informant

It took quite some work to remove all the pictures as so many of them were securely tacked to the wall. But the hardest task of all was to remove the boxes loaded with the books, no photograph and records. Two men who were with them carried the boxes outside the pictures having been put into one of them. As soon as everything of value was taken out of the barn several of the boys set the fire. It took some time before the fire was under some headway but they did not remain to watch it as they wished to hurry to the Christian Union.

all to themselves. They all went to sleep together for the night but there was no danger from skulking prowlers. The night passed on without any incident however and when they awoke they felt very much hungry. They did not know what to do for there was no food of any kind left in Gritchen as the retreating army had squandered off everything and besides a peccary portion of the city was in smouldering ruins. Puppy as the were were compelled to continue their journey in the latter part without any food. However for after travelling for an hour in a short time they reached a farm land where they felt sure they could get something.

All afternoon they continued on and toward the evening when the snow fell was slackening a little reached the grounds of McWhirther Run.

"After following a certain road for several hours Starrin gave a cry "Ulanislinians." He gasped; "See. In that thicket yonder." They are Carolinians and Omurians."

"Take care that they don't see us," said Violet. "The Omarians are generally the worse of them all, though there may be some that are all right."

Where they came from no one knew but they were indeed Glandelinians and coming in a seemingly endless stream. Violet and her sisters and the others had hid behind a high level ledge of rocks over, overlooking the road and could see the army of Glandelinians without themselves being seen.

"I think I know the meaning of this," said Starring in a whisper. "There were big herds of Glandelinians in this neighborhood moving to the rescue of Manley but probably they do not get here until Viviania has left this region and these knowing of Manley's bitter defeat had come to his aid. And I believe I see now why we could not see our way or find our way to the Christian armies."

"My but there are a lot of them," said Angelina. "There seems to be two thousand in each rank and yet their stream seems endless. I wonder if they had come in contact with general Viviania and defeated him?"

"That I couldn't say," said Starring. "Something is wrong though because you see we failed to find a single Angelinian soldier."

"They are advancing toward the direction we were going," said Jennie. "You know Starring I fear we are all going to be held here for several days. There must be millions of them."

"There is a certain road leading north from these rocks," said Catherine. "If we slip away quietly we may be able to continue on without being seen."

"We can try at least," said Violet. "But when they looked in that direction they saw to their dismay that this road was swarming with a stream of Glandelinian artillery men and pieces of heavy guns."

"Well did you ever," gasped Starring. "We are between two fires."

"Right you are," said one of the Angelinian soldiers. "But these rocks will prevent us from being seen however and we could shoot down all the fools who would attack us too."

"What makes it that they have no heart for children no matter how pretty they are?" asked Violet.

"They have no pity for the children of their enemies," said Starring. "And many would say probably, that the Omarians having children of their own ought to realize and have a heart, but the circumstances are too to one, they say that they would gladly butcher their own should they even say that they pity the Angelinians. The Omarians and Garpollan and Kurd, and Mc-Hollensteinian who Religion is Catholic but nevertheless they are a fierce and savage race, driven to frenzy by the lust of war and know no mercy when driven to bloodthirsty fury."

They are worse than Freemasons among the enemy. Homely looking children or those not so good looking, are not in such danger as the prettiest and most delicate if not girls. The Glandelinians literally slaughter them for the pleasure of it, shocking, putting, smothering, and tearing open their bodies as in their ways."

"I know their ways," said Violet. "And I can't help but think of it." And she shuddered.

At this moment several Glandelinian generals stopped directly under them and through a long course of conversation that went on among them the little girls learned that general Viviania's army had been crushed by both Manley and Vincentchia who had given battle to him at Fair Oaks and that general Viviania had retreated with what was left of his army, and that the Glandelinian generals were following with the design to enclose general Viviania, army which had been torn to pieces while making their brave but unsuccessful stand at Neil Hettle and Rose, and on the ground of Fair Oaks. Most of the Glandelinians who had fought under general Vincentchia were of the Mormon Religion the most hated race of people known and general Viviania had been routed with his armies almost decimated. This news caused Violet and her sisters to almost utter a cry and Violet would have if Starring had not cleared a hand over her mouth.

"Don't make any noise or we will be discovered," he said. "Those Mormon Glandelinians are more dangerous than Federal or Tamarine the whole army of them."

"If we can enclose general Viviania, all will be well," said one of the generals. "We then probably could force the Christians to surrender or kill him and the other."

"It's a good chance too," said another. "That general Viviania hasn't got much of an army now, and with Hansonia too far away to aid him and Hindernine far in the northwest another such blow would destroy the survivors entirely."

In a moment more the generals remounted their horses and continued on swiftly.

"We cannot win unless the Abiennine general Hindernine knows of Viviania's danger," said Violet bitterly. "I wish our presence could inspire them."

"Let's go and try it once," said Jennie. "Starring can speak to Hindernine for us."

"That's a good idea," said Starring. "I can make a speech that would arouse the whole of Galvarinia to the highest pitch."

So it was agreed. As the other roads were now temporarily clear Violet and her sisters stole away from their secret hiding place.

and continued on their way followed by the rest without even stopping anywhere even to get a bite to eat. Violet and her sisters felt worried over general Viviania's defeat and Starring felt disaster also. He had become fully devoted to the Christian cause and he felt miserable indeed. From the direction the Glandelinian armies were moving the little girls knew which way the Christian army was retreating and followed in that course or straight in a northwesterly direction. Fearing that they would encounter exceedingly great dangers the little girls and the rest had made themselves as dirty as possible soiling their clothes, ruffling their hair and smearing their faces and hands with being generally an effective disguise. At every step they kept sharp lookouts for signs of the advancing enemies now there could be no nonsense as they knew that the enemy had been excited to a terrible pitch of fury by the lust for the blood of little children.

As they at last emerged from the wooded regions of Mc-Whirther Run they came within sight of a great Glandelinian column that was moving steadily northward. It was General Manley's great army.

"We all will have to look out for ourselves," said Starring as they hid behind aicket. "The enemy seem to be everywhere in heavy columns and many of their leaders are no doubt on the look out for us. It would be best for you little girls to keep strictly within my sight and avoid the enemy under any circumstances."

"We can see that all right," said Jennie. "But what course are they taking? Northwestward?"

"Most likely," answered Starring bitterly. "And it seems as if it is lost as the enemy have indeed won a decisive victory."

"It is a wonder the general couldn't do something to check general Manley's headlong advance."

"I don't believe he could under any conditions now," said Starring. "He has as we have heard from those Glandelinian generals gave the fiercest resistance at Fair Oaks but could do nothing else. Vincentchia and Manley's forces are too strong and general Viviania has been weakened by his terrible losses."

Pretty far in the distance with the help of their field glasses our friends could see the surviving fugitives of the newly destroyed towns and cities fleeing with few belongings before the enemy's advance.

"The Abiennines under Hindernine are the ones who could do something now," said Violet, her cheeks paling.

"To Hindernine's army it is," said Starring. "We can reach his army within three days I should think."

Despite the difficulties that confronted our heroes and heroes they managed to pass the danger points without adventure and sending the two soldiers with the two boxes to find general N. Nora Viviania's army and tell him of Viviania's danger and to tell where they had gone, and why, Violet and her sisters and Starring boarded the first train for northern Galvarinia that came.

THE GLANDELINIAN ATTACK A TRAIN LOADED WITH CHILD REFUGEES GOING TO ABIEENNIA. THE PERIL OF VIOLET AND HER SISTERS AND THEIR CAPTURE.

The conductor of the car they were on knew who they were and so did not accept the tickets giving the money back and saying that they could ride free. Violet and her sisters knew that this was the only train line running and feared that something would happen to delay their way. They knew that the Glandelinians were ripping up every railroad track they came across. The train they were on was going very slow as the engineer was being careful for the train was loaded with child refugees going to Abiennia.

"If the Glandelinians saw this train full of children they would not do a thing," said Starring. "The train is well guarded however but then the Glandelinians always attack in great numbers."

"I believe we are going fast," said Jennie. "I hope we get out of the war zone before the Glandelinians come."

Soon they noticed that the speed of the train was quickly slackening and then they heard the sound of heavy firing.

"We are followed by an entire army of Glandelinians," said the Conductor coming up. "And we cannot proceed any farther because the tracks beyond are ripped up."

"We will have to get off here then, for we must go away at all costs," said Starring. "We were on our way to Hindernine's Abiennine army to get general aid from him."

"The Glandelinians have seen you get on this train and know your intention," said

"Your excellency general Viviania, Manley had us little girls in his power or Federal rah rather and unless you surrender Federal will make his mine meat out of our tender bodies. He will give only two weeks to decide decide and if you refuse Federal threats to count every thing inside of our bodies and number all of our bones."

Then getting up he grabbed Jennie by the throat and hurled her toward the table placing a pencil in her hand and covering her with his revolver he hissed;

"Write what I tell you or I'll bore your curly head full of lead."

"I'll never write anything when if you tear us open now and count our entrails." Said Jennie her eyes flashing. "I'm not afraid of a devil like you and never will be! Just dare shoot. Go on."

Federal brave as he was was cowed for the moment and he said;

"Very well then I'll finish writing it myself."

This is what he wrote;

Dear papa, general Federal has me and my sisters in his power and unless you pay him a heavy sum or postpone your intention to bring your forces northward to help undermine he will cut us to pieces. Jennie is the first victim."

Violet and two of her sisters were standing in his way and but hurling them to the floor with a crash he grabbed Angeline and almost choking her you write what your sister Jennie refused to write or I'll open you now and go back talk either you hear. I'm bound under any cost that you will obey or pay the consequences."

"NEVER WILL IT WRITE IT YOU BLACKED CURSED DOG OF A SATAN." She screamed and she picked up a stone and struck him in the head with it."

"Drat you ye little devil ye are too darn rr sh." He roared and he struck her a blow that felled her to the ground."

"Federal will murder you all in spite of the plan if you little fools do not surrender to him." Advised one of the guards touched in spite of himself and filled with admiration at her boldness. "Please do as he says to us. It will be no wrong to your country."

At this moment Federal had grabbed Violet by the throat and cutting her arm with a knife smeared a piece of paper in the blood that flowed freely, and then wrote down himself;

"Dear general Hanson our Uncle, this is some of our blood that Federal will drain from us if you do not give up intentions of moving into Galverinia and joining Hindernine. Please come to our aid before yielding before it is too late."

Joice he handled a little easier and he said in a more milder tone to her;

"Hurry and don't be a fool to refuse to write what I tell you as this note will have to go out this very night. If you wish your safety from such a horrible death none of ye little fools would refuse to do it."

But it was no use. She refused, and Federal finished by writing their names on down below the paper.

He soon had the note finished and Federal then then he did it up and call calling an orderly sent him off with it ordering him to go as fast as he could not to delay a moment. Then turning to the little girls he said;

"You children are now in the gravest danger for if general Viviania refuses to surrender I'll send back to him your maned men remain and opened bodies. Its not my doing only I either because I have had strict orders from King Manley to put you to death at your refusal to surrender. Your distress has never touched me in the least but just the same no one will be able to rescue you."

Then Federal got up and went out ordering the guards to keep a good watch on the prisoners. Violet and her sisters watched his departure with relief and then went as if their little hearts would break. The guards which had now been changed with the leave of Federal were more hard hearted than Federal and tore them apart sternly ordering them to stop weeping, weeping.

They did not pay much attention to them but went on weeping until the prick of the bayonet warned them that they were being a little rash. In a few moments more the little girls heard some pretty music played by some Glandelinian band and which attracted them and stopped their weeping, weeping.

In the meantime general Viviania had halted with what remained of his his arm as y near the northern extremity of Viviania border and receiving the note which general Federal had written became furious when he read it. "No I will never surrender to that dog, Federal." He said in a rage; "I'll hold out to the bitter end and come what may."

General Vivianas staff remonstrated to him telling him that Federal would really butcher general Vivianas daughters and then he probably would be held responsible for their destruction.

Despite the danger of the Vivian Girls general Viviania obstinately refused to surrender.

Hanson who was far off was also with Hanson who had received the same note saying;

"Viviania would be a fool if he did surrender, and that Federal is a damn liar for he would ruin them anyway after he surrendered. If the children die we too die in battle. But I firmly declare that they will not die. God has promised them protection in any way and we need no fear. God would send his angels to halt old old Federal if he did start anything."

The officers of both armies tried in vain to make their superiors see their folly but telling him that the very angels for fear to threaten Federal domains but general Viviania only flew into a rage and roughly drove them away brand drawing his pistols on them said;

"Get out of my sight you cowards or I'll fill you with lead. No one can turn my purpose and never will."

As soon as he was alone general Viviania sat at his table and wrote this to Federal;

"Your excellency general Raymond Richardson Federal;

Your conditions whatever, or no matter how serious can induce me to surrender and you cannot kill the little girls because God protects them out of your bloody claws."

General Viviania."

It was about two weeks after the capture of the Vivian Girls that when the Glandelinian after days of hard marching had halted at Ah Althrahamba, Manley rode hastily up to Federal's tent and meeting the general handed to him the christian generals note with a hard dry laugh.

"The christian fool refuses to surrender." He said sharply; "The contents of the note shows plainly that he does not care what happens."

Federal read the note, then went to Tamerline and showed it to him. When Tamerline read the note he was filled with consternation. In his heart he had hoped that general Viviania would yield as brutal man though he was he had become affected lately by the Vivian girls now under his charge and did not wish to have anything to do with their murder. He had literally been weakening. Day after day his lust for children's blood had been waning and now he could not even think of doing them harm. However he himself had never done any harm to any children though his armies had and yet he was unable to stop them.

Since they had been in his presence he had been more gentler every day saw to it that they were well fed and kept them properly clothed and clean.

After showing the note Federal rode off leaving Tamerline alone to himself though saying that the next day he would finish the little guttersnips as he called the children.

This once proud and haughty Glandelinian general Tamerline pondered deeply as he went back into his tent where the Vivian girls were under guard. He even dejectedly showed them general Vivianas note. They saw its meaning and burst into a fit of pitiful weeping. They were not afraid of the death if they were really to die it but they knew their deaths would bring ruin on the nation and that is what made them feel so badly. The guard was going to force them to stop with a pie prick of the bayonet when a sharp lock from Tamerline stopped him. For a long time he strode up and down inside his big tent pondering and cursing and away ring to himself, while his victims sat in a corner dejected and fearful of the coming doom of them that would follow their immediate destruction that was sure to come now.

But Tamerline had weakened. Had God touched his heart. It seemed so.

After striding up and down for an hour he ordered the guards out and turning abruptly to the little girls said;

"COME HERE."

With a great fear that made their hearts beat loudly they obeyed. Tamarline led them outside and placed them under the guard of four armed men. He marched them off toward the field where their execution on the morrow was to be. As soon as he had gotten far enough Tamarline drew his revolver and said to the guards:

"Go! I'll do the killing myself; Federal is too slow and and he covered the little girls with the guns."

The four soldiers marched off and Tamarline scowling fiercely watched them till they were out of sight. Then still covering them he marched them to the ravine where seven children were lying dead.

"Hurry change clothes with them while I stand on watch." He hissed; "I'm to pretend that I have killed you but really you are to go free."

At first Violet and her sisters could hardly believe their eyes sight, and though they hardly yet trusted him they did change clothes with the dead children and while the little girls were not watching he slipped the bodies of the dead children one open so as to deceive the Glandelinians and then returned to the Vivian girls.

He showed them a route to take and realizing that he meant it they thanked him and offering their forgiveness the little girls went off.

Two hours later Manley learned that Tamarline willingly set the Vivian girls free and flew into a rage. He did not however care to say anything to Tamarline for the general would resign his command and on him Manley and Federal depended the success of the Glandelinian armies.

Nevertheless Manley was bound to recover the prisoners and he told Federal who with Cannonia and a troop of horsemen with three bloodhounds started after them. Federal had fairly dashed to his lines when he had received the report and had hollered:

"HA HULLO there Showman, Cannonia and scores of you fellows come here. Tamarline has committed an act of treachery for he let the Vivian girls go free on purpose. I'll give seven hundred dollars to any one who catches them. Turn out the dogs quick. Turn out Tiger fury and the rest."

The sensation produced by the news was indeed immediate. Many of the men sprang forward officiously to offer their services not from the hopes of the reward but to cause the deaths of the children. Some ran so a ran one way, some another. Some were getting flambeaux of pineknots while others were uncoupling the dogs whose hoarse savage bay added not a little to the animation of the scene.

Soon the whole band with whoop and shout and savage yell of man and beast proceeded on the chase. It was the most lively chase that Federal ever precipitated in, Cannonia being the only general with him. He refused to go as he did not want to take a part in it, but despite all this Federal felt sure that he could overtake his victims and if not he would have vengeance on Tamarline. Soon the pursuers were going down the road which Tamarline had directed the little girls and the furious dogs getting the scent were soon rushing on baying madly.

In the meantime the little girls who had continued on slowly, heard the baying of the hounds and realized that they were being pursued, and they were terrified, for they knew that general Raymond Richardson Federal was pursuing them with bloodhounds.

"To the stream." Cried Violet; "We must go across before those dogs tear us to pieces."

They hurried as fast as they could toward the stream but before they were half way to it Federal and the others appeared coming on at a terrific gallop and opening fire.

Two of the bullets lodged in Jennie's thigh and she sank to the ground. As they were unarmed the little girls were helpless, but however they seized Jennie and half dragging her along continued for the stream. But unfortunately they were overtaken by the horsemen who had all they could do to prevent the dogs from flying at them.

"So you little rats thought you could get away like pretty butterflies!" He sneered Federal; "It's a good mind to let the dogs tear the intestines out of you and save me the trouble."

Several of the soldiers who had dismounted seized the little girls and forcibly put them on their horses jumping on after them, and the whole party retraced their steps toward the Glandelinian camp. As they had only proceeded a short distance the little girls suddenly drew out the guns of their captors and striking them hard caused them to reel off their horses. Then like lightning they they whirled wheeled the fiery steeds and dashed down the road at breakneck speed, Federal and the rest being speechless with surprise. Then recovering he yelled:

"After them they must not get away!" And after them they did go till the baying dogs being far in the lead. Again despite their desperate efforts to get away they were overtaken a Glandelinian leaping behind each of them and taking away the guns held them tight.

"You are the more for causing this delay and making us retrench you." Said Federal as they were going the other way again. "We will take the daring out of you and mighty quick too."

They now went on at a good pace Federal and Cannonia sitting on each side of of the captives as close as possible. Poor Violet and her sisters saw that all hope was lost. They were caught now for sure, not to get away this time and probably going to their deaths. As they were not general Federal meant to draw away with them. In very short time the Glandelinian camp was reached, and Federal had the little girls tied securely to tall oak trees. It was late at night, when the whole camp was asleep that Richard Tamarline riding back and forth on his horse, in search of something saw what appeared to him seven beautiful apparitions tied to the trunks of tall oak trees. Not knowing what to make of it, he rode closer and dismounting went quickly up to them. A fierce curse escaped from his lips.

"Caught again!" He hissed. "Well I'll be swizzled!" and drawing his sabre he slashed the ropes that bound them.

"I thought you beauties were slick in getting away." He said in a voice of terrible disgust. "You certainly are fine ones, after I helped you at that. Who caught you now?"

"General Federal your Excellency." Answered Violet. "He was going to kill us as spies to-morrow."

"He says he is but he is only talking." Said Tamarline with a wicked chuckle. "You are born liars."

"No more it!" Said Violet in despair. "He has a heart that will never-----"

"He is only saying it." Said Tamarline furiously. "And no disputing me either, for you to-morrow he will find you not here. Come with me."

He led them for a certain way then turning to them said it:

"I'm going to see that you escape Federal at all costs. I'll accompany you until you are beyond pursuit, and if any one tries to take you out of my hands I'll shoot him."

He led them for a considerable way down the road, when suddenly he heard foot steps and drawing his gun, waited for the maker of the noise, to come in sight. To his surprise it was general Richard Ricknell. Before Ricknell could say a word, Tamarline quickly retorted:

"Ricknell, you are just the man I need. These little girls, despite the cruel and many and say I am have melted my heart at its softest, and once already to night I had set them free, but that darn Federal caught them again. So I'm now I'm going to save them, and with your help I can easily succeed."

"You can if you do as I say." Answered Ricknell.

Then he explained to them the road and so on children who had been slain by some of Federal's men early this morning, but at the risk of their own lives, for I caught them at it. They are not so pretty but some how bear a striking resemblance to your charges. Have the Vivian girls change clothes with them and they will easily escape. Do not touch their bodies however for they are mutilated and so badly, that Federal may be deceived, at least long enough so he will not order a pursuit." Tamarline took Ricknell's advice, and as he continued on kept on the watch for the dead children. Soon he found them lying prostrated in the rear road. As soon as the little girls had put on the clothes of the dead children, Tamarline by the help of his flashlight wrote on a piece of paper:

"Early this morning I was running the Vivian girls into a trap, Federal tried then to trap, but they broke their bonds and escaped. So he is responsible for their escape and can blame no one. But here lies the Vivian girls because I Tamarline discovered their bodies here to night."

He then fastened it on to the tree, and turning to Violet and her sisters said "Now is your time to make your get away." First he printed a kiss on each of the Vivian girls and then led them to within a certain distance, when there was suddenly a flash and a report, and a bullet whistled close to Tamarline's head. Thinking it was a snail-like Glandelinian who fired the shot, he hurriedly discharged his pistol in the direction of the flash and hastily stopped behind a tree. There was a cry and a man pitched headlong to the ground. Quickly he went to the spot.

"An Angelinian picket, and I thought it was a Glandelinian snail-like after me." He gasped. "Great God, I hope I am only wounded." He drew out a flask of brandy, and pouring it down the soldier's throat and revived him.

"Are you hurt much my man?" He asked. "I'm sorry I shot you though you are an An Angelinian, and I mistook you for an Angelinian Glandelinian snail-like who was trying to shoot me down in ambush because I have the Vivian girls here, whom I was snail-like from the Glandelinian camp, to save from Federal's clutches. As I mentioned before, I retorted the shot because I thought it was a Glandelinian following."

"I'm not hurt much." Said the man trying to get up on his feet. "The wind of the ball only stunned me. I see you are general Richardson Tamarline."

"Yes I am." Said the general. "But I believe I have lost some of my cruelty. Of course if I have to be told that this prisoner I'll give up-----"

"No matter who you are an Angollian never let an arrest a glandolinian who saves the Vivian girls, and I've been even taken by the Angollianians during a battle, and the same Vivian girls interceded for him he goes free." Interrupted the sentry. "Put the Vivian girls I promise want you for the death of Little Anna Aronburg." "It's not responsible for it," said Tamerline. "For Federal and Thomas Phellinus Tamerline are responsible. They are the murderers and here are the proofs." And Tamerline produced a sheet of paper which in the moonlight, and by the help of the general's searchlight, the soldier was able to survey. The contents revealed for complete facts that Raymond Richardson Federal was the murderer, and that Phellinus Tamerline was the helper, for the wording ran as follows:

"Raymond Richardson Federal, you are rewarded with a great medal of honor for your execution of the little child slave rebel leader, Anna Aronburg, sister of Angollian Aronburg, and it is your duty when you receive my command of the Angollian Glandolin to make it all in your power to run down her sister also.
King of Glandolinia.
Phellinus Glandlin
of Glandolin."

"Thanks for helping us in the matter," said the sentry as the general dropped the children closer to the sentry. "But you had better go now before any more soldiers come up to investigate about the two shots." For the first time in his life, Tamerline had the love to embrace children, and crushing the little girls to his heart he hugged them and kissed them, and said fondly: "From now on we are no longer enemies though on opposite sides. When ever you run into trouble I will save you." Then bidding them good bye he rode off. The next day despite the cleverness of the trick, M. Manley alone, who knew the Vivian girls well, discovered the dead bodies, discovered at a glance that the bodies were not of Violet and her sisters, and having learned that they were within the Christian lines safe and sound, he first cursed God, and then went to Federal with the news. Federal hearing of it was literally lame with rage. He fairly foamed at the mouth. Manley had literally went to Federal saying that Tamerline deserves to be punished as he declared it was treachery to harbor enemies enemies of the Glandolinian cause. Never before was Federal in such a rage as he was then and though he knew that Tamerline alone could save the Glandolinian army from destruction or defeat he would not let the matter drop. Indeed his rage knew no bounds. Federal tore off his collar and tie in his rage and even bit his hands. He literally hated Tamerline, worse than he did Our Blessed Lord himself. And when this had occurred all the long working hatred of his soul, toward Tamerline began to gather in a desperate and deadly form. He did not the Vivian girls bravely he sturdily, powerfully, resistlessly ever since he first started persecuting them. Their very spiritual forms, their beauty, celestial like as it was burned him burned on him like the fires of purgation.

"I hate that Tamerline," said Federal that morning as he sat on his great bare mare. "I hate him for his liberating those delicate rats. Can't I do what I like with them? Who's to hinder I wonder. Damn him, I'll take his command away from him. He must go. He will not serve in any army under my command come what may. Away with him. That is my demand. I'll show him on a him." And Federal clenched his fists and shook it as if he had something in his hands that he could rend in pieces, and called the Vivian girls all kinds of names you won't find in the Dictionary. He reported the cause to general Johnston Jacken Manley telling him of his own Manley's discovery, and Johnston Jacken Manley conveyed the discovery to his main commander John Manley, and the answer came back that in the first place, he had no right to leave the Vivian girls where they could escape, declaring that Tamerline was not to blame in the first place, that Tamerline had taken the dead children from the Vivian girls, and that only the highest Glandolinian authority could relieve Tamerline from command. Again, Federal was frustrated.

When general Vivian saw his child friends again his joy knew no bounds. The Vivian girls told the whole story, how Tamerline had saved them, and of his treatment of them. And Jennie told how she tried to put Federal to sleep.

"I always thought that the three Tamerlines in Federal's command were cruel men, and child butchers," General Vivian said. "This was indeed surprising me. But then as he slew Anna Aronburg, you little girls could not intercede for him as your Father would allow no mercy."

"Federal and Phellinus Tamerline are the guilty ones," said the soldier who had been in the battle. "The sentry handed me those, which are proofs of the crime."

General Vivian read the contents of the notes, notes, and then began to examine the contents of the packages. In one package which was large the contents were the head of a child, the bottom of the package being covered with dried blood. Vivian dropped it in horror.

"Good God," cried all who saw it. "How did Tamerline come in possession of those things?"

With shivering hands general Vivian laid the very package on the table, and opened it, the remainder saw a pile of the child's intestines.

"Goodness gracious," cried general Vivian almost letting it drop and looking at the soldier as if he could not believe it. "What did you bring these for? And what in the world did the murderer preserve them for?" "I was justly wrapping it up general Vivian with his hands trembling as if with theague would the third package which was a large slip of yellow paper with the closed prescription:

"Who ever retains the terrible relics will never get over the horrors of it. Anna Aronburg, a child only less than eight years of age, was murdered by Raymond Richardson Federal personally, in his own barn, being slain before alive, and left to die that way. Who ever the nerve to destroy these relics will perish miserably for they will be stricken by God. Under any circumstances they almost must not be restored in the dead body lying in a deep ravine unless the murderer is punished, and they are to be retained by those who receive them unless the murderer is brought to justice. These relics have been taken out of the body of the dead child, by the murderer who put them in those packages, to inspire him on, in his murderous slaughter. Do not even allow the relics to lay round anyone else may destroy them. This is the order of one of the Glandolinian Creatures. The body of the child is not decayed yet."

Nearly a dozen times general Vivian read the note, then carefully examined the intestines, to see if any of them were missing.

"You Vivian girls were in the ravine once," said he to Violet and her sisters. "Did you see the body lying there yet?" "We will have to confess that we were not in the ravine, and we did not see her body, but we heard somebody turned it," said Violet.

"I hate to rot in there," said Vivian. "Let's go and see anyway. It is not far from this vicinity..."

"No one not far from that ravine," said Jennie. "and the body may only be cremated." So general Vivian, two of his officers and the little girls started off. They reached the inside of the hour, and descended into it the little girls being in the lead. In a minute they reached the spot where it was reported where the dead body had lain, and to their surprise there was no body at all, and they all went back terribly disappointed.

Federal for two weeks since the ending of May concentrated upon general Vivian who had continually received fresh forces from the east. Both armies were now again the most fierce ever seen. Though equal in size Federal had the most guns, and had then placed to sweep all the approaches to his main line. On account of general Vivian's refusal to surrender, and of the escape of the Vivian girls, Federal declared that in case he won, he would not give Vivian's army any quarter. General Vivian learned of Federal's cruel intention, and feared intensely for the little girls. He called them to him and gathered them about him said:

"To-morrow is the last stand of Old Christianity for me. If my army fails to win, I'm a gonor, for now Federal will not give me any quarter. For myself I fear not, but if he wins he will have you in his power and surely destroy you, and so I advise you to pray all night long for our safety." Violet and her sisters promised faithfully that they would, and readily kept their promise. During the night general Vivian held a council with his main staff, and in the height of the council general Vivian said:

"Federal refuses to give us any quarter in case I fail to win. If Federal fails to win alright, but if he succeeds he will murder the Vivian girls in the cruelest manner I know of. I know your love and pity for those dear daughters of our king, whose lives have all been of sorrow, and bag of you for their sakes, to crush the foe and try to attack yourselves, for through spies the enemy sees a great advantage in crushing me, by doing all the attacking themselves, and this is what I want to prevent. If you win, I'll allow you a reward, to have them with you as companions for several weeks."

At this all the generals rose, their eyes gleaming like fiends.

"We will all die first before we will yield an inch of ground to those blood thirsty butchers," they all said. "We will hold our line to the last man." All night long, and in the greater sorrow and terror, the little girls had prayed, and when morning came they felt as if something good was going to happen.

During all this time the two other christian generals, Hanson and his north brother general Robert Angold Vivian were completely successful in all their advances, and might could have way in their path. Indeed the war was taking on very queer turns. In the east the enemy during the long struggle calls called the intergarten, a massacre was asking strong head way and as predicted it seemed evident that the glandelinian armies now numerous in numbers, and great in force had only one or two christian armies opposed to them in the east, and it was such a serious situation that it looked as the last stand of Christianity.

All this was happening in the Eastern part of Galverinia and was believed to be one of the greatest horrors of the whole war. Indeed all the scenes of the great Rat Eastern section of the great war in Galverinia was a horror in itself with all the widespread desolation and destruction, and massacre of children, but then the situation in Galverinia was at all more lively.

In the west the christians were accomplishing wonders, large forces of Zimmermann armies were damming up all rivers, and were also doing other things which were now paralyzing all the enemy's hopes of getting more aid to McWhirther, the ships instead of attacking were besieging, and firing at the same time, and Zimmermann was advancing with his large force forces with the intention of seizing the enemy's main bases at Virginia Run, and Logan Zoo Bar Run. Hanson and general Vivian since the battle of Big Girlknool had moved their reformed armies from the location of that place with the intention of making a force of show in the west, but all that time since both main christian armies, the flower of Angeline had not been engaged because none of the Glandelinian armies would stand before them, and it was now coming evident that these main christian armies were moving forward with the intention of striking general and vehement blows against the Glandelinian forces stationed at Julo Julo Callio and Norma Gatherine.

These two great armies were completely unopposed as no glandelinian army had been of sufficient force to oppose these christian generals. Hanson was first heading toward Brigano and Zannagustopolis, and also moving upon the main points along the Norma Run with the intention of forcing his armies across the Norma's bridges and break up the Glandelinian armies stationed there. If this could be accomplished all would be well, these two cities with the arrival of Zimmermann's mighty armies would fall, and if they fell McWhirther would fall with it, and Glandelinia then could be brought to complete submission. The situation was in perfect favor of the enemy in the east. Here a 11 christian armies that had opposed them had met practical annihilation about forty eight christian armies having fought battle after battle until almost annihilated or wiped out and now general Vivian's armies were the only ones surviving and to oppose the enemy. The enemy in the east had won as it seemed indeed the whole war altogether, and all would be lost in Eastern Galverinia if the successful stand at Albrahambra would not be accomplished.

But in Western Galverinia all christian armies there were too victor due to relate. Every battle already fought there spelled disaster for the glandelinians, twenty of their own had been wiped out, and the losses of the enemy provisions had been exceedingly heavy and now the rivers which they had depended upon mostly to supply their armies in Galverinia was bottled up by fleets of christian warships and dreadnaughts, many glandelinian ships were totally wrecked and destroyed, and the christian armies under Zimmermann there being about forty armies under his command separately were damming up all rivers, and causing floods which made the enemy abandon any attempts to oppose him. The Angeline in the east called the glandelinian general Raymond Richardson a human tornado because of his many successes, his whirlwind campaigns, and advances, and the horrible havoc and devastation he had caused, but what did the enemy call General Hanson, Robert Vivian, and Zimmermann in the west. Within the time of the battle of Big Girlknool until now March the 28th these three christian generals had pushed on irresistibly northward, westward eastward, and southwestward with the irresistible speed of a seething conflagration, covering three thousand miles of hard marching and all enemy armies either fought desperate battles and met disaster, upon great disaster upon disaster disaster without comprehending. Of course the losses of the christian armies during this headlong advance had been exterminating in the extreme, and twice Hanson had to halt his advance until the fresh armies came up from Angeline.

Manley and his three sons had all they could to accomplish their aim in Eastern Galverinia, and now then they began to believe that they could spare reinforcements in Eastern Galverinia and send them westward to oppose the three christian "D-vil" as he called them. He decided to leave the other armies opposing Hanson and Vivian in Eastern Galverinia under general Gannon while he and his three sons, with federal would hurry west to compel the retreating glandelinian armies there and oppose Hanson and general Vivian before they captured the main fortifications at Norma Run.

This he realized would take lots of hurry to do. His main armies were three thousand five hundred miles from the scene of christian success in the west, and his men not used to Galverinian climate of rivers and forests were slower in marching and if only he could get one or two of his bigger armies to stop Hanson before he got there and captured Brigano all would be safe. He decided to send Germania to concentrate all his available armies upon the stream of Eranio Creek near Brigano, while he decided to press his own main forces upon Zannagustopolis and Wottruba, and also to fortify Mangolina, and Manglandelina. Only also decided to have all the points of McWhirther gun hold, and to fortify the region of Virginia Zimmermann Run, and also to see to it that Zimmermann would not be able to make his advance successfully upon Logan Zoo Bar Run. All this of course would take time, but it did take time longer time than John Manley or his father ever believed, and if the plans would have been successful all would have been well with the glandelinians and the advance of Hanson, his brother, and Williamabarger Zimmermann would have been thrown back completely and McWhirther and Norma Gatherine besides Julo Callio saved from capture. Of course the armies got to those points readily enough, even sooner than the christians, but Manley made the big mistake of concentrating most of his armies to oppose Vivianama at Francis Atlanta on that dreadful May 11 third year of the war, and thus all his hopes had been broken up, and though by fighting as desperately as he knew how and checking Vivianama from advancing, Norma Gatherine, Julo Callio and McWhirther were left wide open for the rush of the christian armies under Zimmermann, and it was then a matter of only a few weeks before they fell.

Of course no doubt Manley had to concentrate there as Tw Terwilliger was then in possession of the christians after so much fighting at Marie Osborne and other places, and if Manley had not stopped Vivianama at Francis Atlanta all would have been lost right there as though he checked Vivianama's advance at Francis Atlanta he could not however win the great battle and had suffered a most disgraceful defeat in the entire war.

THE LAST STAND OF CHRISTIANITY.
THE FRIGHTFUL BATTLE OF ALHAMBRA.

THE dawn of morning had approached, and Hansonian left wing then in concentration toward the city of Alhambra was suddenly and heavily assailed by Glandelinians under general Gannon. Many of the Christian officers learning that the action had become like another Big Girl Knoll, had dashed down with their brigades to Hansonian aid. Hansonian himself had been already heavily reinforced, his left wing being commanded by general Henry Darger, and there was such a blaze of firing as to terrify the very angels. Gannon also launched a sweeping assault upon the Angelinians their lines again pouring across the Mic-Holleston gun region, which was fairly deformed and desolated by the An Angelini n guns, which tore all of the Glandelinian waves of men, many millions strong, which encountered the terrible fire. Gannon fearing annihilation had to slacken the ferocity of his dare devil attack, and held his own line together, waiting for Shoemanni to come up with pick-nell and Dargin. Two hours later Dargin and Shoemanni arrived with all their available columns, and these made attacks in overwhelming numbers, crushing Hansonian left wing to fragments, and forcing his whole line to stagger and give way, and with the help of pick-nell these Glandelinians rolled up his whole division, driving the Angelinian soldiers clean to the second line of trenches, which was also taken. Scores of Hansonian generals had fallen, and countless numbers of men. The assailants made very great success so far but also at a heavy cost. Gannon had been severely wounded, in facing a severe cannon fire, Dargin had been severely wounded, nearly half of his command were down, pick-nell was wounded, and Shoemanni and Gannonia killed. Pick-nell and Shoemanni had lost two quarters of his men. Smash-in-the-head and Break-in-the-neck, and Adole-De-Garbes and Selal followed next in their assaults but they were wounded, while the latter two generals were killed in side the Christian works. General Vivian saw Hansonian's plight, and getting the range of his chain of batteries, about ten thousand cannon, began to pound the charging armies of Glandelinians all to pieces. At this critical juncture Tamerline himself now an entirely different man was advancing with his army of Omarians, and these he threw upon the Christian cannons with terrible force, and again the whole scene seemed like the slaughter of the world so fierce was the carnage. Facing a fire of the greatest intensity, and suffering heavy losses as well, Tamerline's columns after four hours of bloody fighting managed to carry the Christian batteries, but met a solid wall of infantry behind it, which let loose a simultaneous fire all along the line withering the whole wave of the assailants, and general Tamas federal leading this charge in person was mortally wounded.

In the murderous fighting which ensued, and which made it a scene as all the elements of civilization was going to destruction, Tamerline nine million men were cut or shot down, but the survivors drove in their wedge so far, that the Christian infantry could not hold, and Baldwin Cannings entire line was overwhelmed and crushed beyond reformation.

Baldwin on the Glandelinian side was killed, and Tamerline severely wounded at the highest fury of the fray. Tamerline's victors now pressed steadily on carrying the rest of Baldwin's line, but it was not as lucky as it was hoped, and though Baldwin's men went down by the thousands, the retreating batteries had taken a position on a high rise of ground, while some of the retreating columns refuted in the very ravine where Amble Kronburg was murdered. Here the Glandelinians surrounded them and soon filled that ravine with slain of the Angelinians, a massacre indeed. On account of the guns dominating the grounds of Mic-Holleston and Calverini gun, Hansonian whole division in the action was threatened with annihilation. They were in the midst of a melée of firing the enemy pressing in on him in half a circle, and the Glandelinian batteries of artillery pounding him in the rear. General Vivian saw the terrible situation, but did not know what to do. He however sent one big force after another to retake the guns, but to no avail and few of these Angelinians returned. General Vivian was appalled at the terrific slaughter, and saw that he was losing.

Federal's main armies also were pounding heavily on his left and center, and Manley on his right, and to make matters worse all the Glandelinian cannons were in action, blowing whole lines of Christian trenches and men into the air. General Vivian had however wisely held back his reserves, but nevertheless his heart was broken, for there were sure signs that he was being beaten, and indeed he was. Yet his lines of cannon were committed horrible slaughter, for the Glandelinians were making a bloody morgue of their own fallen by their terrible losses. Despite his own losses Manley was bound to win, and continued the attack for hour to hour, bringing up all the reserves he could spare. Federal's army it was also terrific. He drove his men recklessly to the attack, and stormed the Christian center with all the fury ever known in war fare. Toward Noon federal became successful. He rolled up the whole center, crushed and tangled, captured hundreds of thousands of prisoners which the rebels placed in front of themselves to prevent the main destruction caused by the general Christian fire.

By one o'clock general Federal's line of advance was overrunning the entire region north of the Christian center, and finally struck general Vivian's left wing on the flank crushing it to fragments and rolling it up and down completely cutting it up and putting it out of commission entirely. Along the Christian center all the Christian generals had been killed and wounded and the center threatened with annihilation. The whole of Hansonian army then in action, and the others were already already defeated, and were in the utmost confusion, and fleeing northward in a stampede despite the effort of the surviving officers to check the rout. Only the right wing of general Vivian's army still held its ground. All the rest of the army was panic stricken and nothing whatever could check their retreat. The officers even fell themselves from sheer exhaustion in their attempts to stem the disaster. At one point where the panic stricken columns were under the heaviest cannon fire, it was said that one hundred and sixty five thousand men and officers were mowed down all of them being completely blown to pieces. General Vivian by wireless ordered the Concentinians who were far in the rear, and in reserve to charge upon the panic stricken hordes and stop the rout if that could. This was attempted and though the fury of the Concentinians checked some part of the rout, it could not check the main part, and many even fell in the fight with them. The panic stricken hordes poured clear to the rear, and even there despite the efforts of the very Concentinians they could not be rallied, and the Concentinians were borne along with the human current, the scene of panic being compared to that of millions of crazed men escaped from insane asylums during a big fire, and running hither and thither in a pandemonium of terror and confusion.

The pursuing Glandelinians were following close behind, and the battle indeed seemed to be in their favor. General Vivian's right wing alone still held for general Vivian was sparing at the reserves he could, to keep this wing from being rolled up. Federal knowing of the true conditions of general Vivian's army, though thought it would be a fool hardy task to advance any further for fear himself would be over-lapped by the Christian wing still standing, but now he could not even stop his own men.

At this moment Federal's advancing armies met a heavy force of Angelinians under general Ziegler Murray and Henderson's Greathart, Greathart himself having had his great divisions formed in two immense squares with cannons all round them. He launched a sweeping counter attack covered by artillery fire, which continued for an hour with unabated fury despite the losses that the Glandelinians inflicted, but again Federal gathered his forces and pressed forward striving for the square under general Illian Caldwell. A plunging annihilating fire had repulsed general Glandelinians' mighty onslaught a onslaught, but big forces of Glandelinians by beating their way through the Angelinian defenses with terrible gun fire, had forced the surrender of general Illian, and then moving forward swiftly in a driving attack, struck Shoemanni's right wing, cutting it up, and capturing thirty thousand men, and three hundred guns. In the meantime new batteries of Glandelinian artillery had been brought up and general Rookies of divisions of Angelinians were shelled from their position near Rookies creek with the most heavy losses, but before they could occupy that position, the Glandelinians silenced three of the Angelinian batteries, during an ear splitting drum drum fire, the Christian batteries having kept up a sporadic hammering during nearly the whole time committing the public damage to Federal's assaulting columns.

Many times during the great onslaughts Greathart's army came close to Federal's line, which had taken on defense behind ravines or gullies only to be mowed down by many scores of thousands. General Kiss and Kerr with about one million five hundred thousand Winkie Abyssinkilans met Federal in a desperate hand to hand fight, and nearly succeeded in clearing one of the ravines, but within half an hour's time they themselves were beaten out with the loss of three hundred thousand men.

The main divisions of the Angelinians fought with demonical fury, continuing the onslaught with extraordinary persistency until their right wing had been rolled up, and crushed to fragments, Greathart being compelled to withdraw. Ziegler himself continued his onslaught against the Free Mason Line, and though his columns were torn and mangled time and again by the terrible fire of the Glandelinians the Angelinians failed to recede. Federal worried over the storming attack of the new Christian forces, and of the terrible losses that his army was enduring, had some more of his remaining fields of cannons brought into action, and though this repulsed one on one onslaught, Ziegler's divisions only reformed and went at it again with tremendous fury.

Whole masses of the assailants were mowed down as fast as they came, but the onslaught continued with such fury that a part of Federal's left grand division was rolled up, and displaced. Federal threw her heavier forces to the rescue, and made titanic efforts to reestablish the line at this point, the new forces assailing the Angelinians with all their vigor and only when one hundred and ten thousand more of the Angelinians were mowed down, did the survivors withdraw, enabling the enemy to reform his line. Though receiving a short check Ziegler was not daunted. Receiving heavy reinforcements under general Henry Ger Fearless he redoubled the fury of his attack, storming Federal's line with all his might. Federal's whole line fairly stormed with fire, which cut the assailants down in myriads, but the survivors only continued the great attack until thirty thousand had fallen in the same space of a quarter of a mile had fallen, and Paerlens among them. Though Fearless was re-lead Ziegler had made some apparent success, by cutting his way with the help of general Santana line through the gray wedge along his front, but his men met such a heavy withering fire from the Glandelinian artillery, that he again was obliged to give way, having lost more than Fearless did. Other efforts by the bravery of the Glandelinians were frustrated and each attack only met with frightful slaughter. While this action was going on, general Hanson's main line arrived near the vicinity of glis performing a line of battle thirteen miles long, on the most commanding rise of ground, which was crowned with heavily batteries. Long lines of infantry with reserves and supports were ordered to advance, and carry one of the federal positions, which were on the crest of low hills a commanding level table ground north of the Mico-Holleston Run, and the Yellow Brick road, leading from Catherine, to Beppo, and Angelina Agathia. These divisions about fifteen million, nine hundred and sixty five thousand was then in good condition, and these he divided into three wings, the left under Kindermine, to consist of the Ninth Corps, the center under general Beaumont to be supported by the cavalry dragoons and many brigades and the right grand division under general Giam Giam which consisted of the main brigades. While these preparations were going on general Joe Sateen having arrived with a strong support, had captured Barney's lane, and forced its way in here driving out all the rebels there after four hours of hard fighting in the morning, the horrible fighting ranging among rocks, trees, and ravines. A part of Federal's line was also active again having received heavy reinforcements. Kindermine placed chiefly in charge of the three wings crossed the Mico-Holleston creek and after considerable fighting captured large detachments of graycoats. Then Staking Federal's ridges, Kindermine began a fierce onslaught, Beaumont being the first to reach the summit, but after a fearful struggle the Glandelinians hurled them back with stupendous losses. Beaumont was again apprehended but having orders to perform he led his men to make another assault. A whole chain of cannon on those ridges sent forth a storm of death and destruction, but though they went down in many columns, the survivors, pressed on up the sides yelling like savages, and by a most determined assault, a part of the ridge was carried, though one million twenty four thousand of the Angelinians were moved down or captured. The main portion of the position seemed impossible to carry however, and other columns of rebels arriving they took up their formation, and met the assailants with all their force driving them down. Menley had over eight million in number while federal positions also separated into three wings, and he really was in an unassailable trench. A part of Kindermine force attacked the right grand division of Federal's army five miles away to the right near a row of old child slave plantations, but was unsuccessful. The battle had now extended to the west of the hills and three more local charges were made which brought on very severe and sanguinary losses. The Anti Angelinians were repulsed however with the loss of nearly one hundred and fourteen thousand in slain. In the meantime Hanson led his main divisions to engage the enemy on the ridges but one of his divisions was wiped out. Fifteen hundred thousand of his men however advanced and gave Federal serious trouble until Kindermine joined in, the battle now opening with redoubled fury, a sanguinary conflict breaking out all along the line. Hanson's onslaught was fearful but his left was mangled and withdrew. Kindermine engaged Federal's best brigades, the Glandelinians defending the crest stubbornly and fighting with the fury of desperation. Clouds of Angelinians forces pushed forward, and came pouring up the gain, when all of a sudden big machine guns poured a terrific broadside upon them sweeping them down in horrible numbers. However the attack was renewed but three million three hundred thousand rebel rifles poured upon them, then the whole line became ablaze, but despite the fierce resistance the Angelinians attacked in such fury, that the rebels would have retreated, had not another rebel division arrived with artillery, and the Christian general Beul was killed. The Angelinians were attacking with irresistible force, but now Kindermine's divisions were becoming demoralized and panic stricken and fell back down the slope. One of Hanson's divisions itself made charge after charge, and drove a part of Federal's right wing out of its position, but the rebels rallied, and gathering in overwhelming force counter attacked the Angelinians with moribund fury, and for two hours here, a most cruel conflict raged, the assailants being threatened with annihilation. Three of Federal's wings were now engaged. Several of Hanson's best brigades were wiped out by the fire of the enemy guns but the divisions under Jennings and Angalia moved to the attack, and won their point but their leaders were killed and they were swept off. The sides of the ridges seemed covered with smoke from the bursting shells, the discharge of musketry on both sides becoming more incessant, and Hanson's whole force was now giving way before overwhelming numbers, but he was not daunted. Recovering from his repulse, and being bound to halt Federal's advance, he went at it again, and soon the sides of the hills presented one of the most horrifying scenes of the day. Still charge followed charge, until all of Federal's guns were brought into action which increased the slaughter, the hill was practically strewn with myriads of dead wounded and dying while the ground on top was covered with the fallen bodies of both sides.

h Hanson's whole line made a fierce irresistible charge and captured a portion of Federal's strongly fortified works but could not retain them and was again driven back with stupendous losses. But the Angelinians again attacked with great enthusiasm despite the continuous and fearful artillery fire that greeted them. The Angelinians were moved down a by many thousands per minute their bodies fairly dotting all the hill sides, while sheet after sheet of flame and smoke burst forth from the heights, tearing and mangling every assaulting columns that approached. Federal's intrenched position. The Angelinians were undaunted however and only doggedly resumed the attack facing the direct withering fire of the enemy bravely though they were moved down as fast as they came. Division after division of the Angelinians rushed forward with fixed bayonets and readied the ramparts of the Free Mason line only to melt away. Here and there hundreds of thousands of reckless Angelinians coming within easy range of Federal's batteries suddenly dropped like grass mowed down by a lawn mower, and many of the survivors threw themselves upon the ground to let the withering storm of bullets pass over them. Again the attack was a failure. The Glandelinian positions were well posted and the brigades that charged across the wide plains met frightful decimation.

Federal then made a prompt and vigorous dash upon the recoiling Angelinians driving them back in confusion. It was a terrible catastrophe and hundreds of thousands of the panic stricken Angelinians were massacred during that final dash of the Glandelinians. The Glandelinian's left being fully determined to advance and never to recede again advanced after Hanson's retreating lines while the center and left having an open field began another fierce attack on the Christian lines near Catherine run but the Angelinians determined the two preparing to destroy it should the Glandelinians enter. Ten divisions of Glandelinians under heavy fire moved forward to storm the Christian redoubts held by Cantons Angelinians while other forces were led forward with the purpose of turning Giam Giam's left flank if possible and cut off their retreat. The Glandelinian divisions advanced in the most solid style up the rising ground but from the ramparts a long undulating sheet of fire flame and smoke burst forth and the assaulting columns became badly cut up and mangled. These divisions were about to recoil when Giam Giam of the Christians fell wounded and other forces advancing to the rescue the battle once more became a general a more fearful struggle ensuing at once. A heavy artillery fire of five thousand guns went once opened upon the assaulting columns the Angelinians holding their positions while the Glandelinians stormed with their attacks again and again in heavy forces on general Dore-not-lies positions but amid the most terrific slaughter they were repulsed just as many many times.

Fierce yells from hundreds of thousands of fresh Glandelinian troops and Federal had now gathered up his whole strength for a fierce and final effort and again he brought the Glandelinians to the attack with tremendous ferocity. For four hours more the Christian line held stubbornly though their whole line became torn and mangled with their dead and wounded companions piled in windrows four deep where they fell the Glandelinians continuing their attack with much persistency that the Angelinians though they fought with the stubborn fury of fiends were compelled to retire before a deliberate withering fire. The ground for miles was red with gore and so many gray and purple coats strewn the ground that they could not be counted.

All the trees within region of the battle line were rent and torn by shrapnel and pierced with innumerable minnie balls, and thousands of wounded found lying in the shattered woods were writhing in mortal agony. The Glandelinians succeeding in capturing the town but nearly eighty thousand were killed outright when the mine threw blast and hundreds of thousands badly wounded. At this same time this had occurred the Glandelinians effectually bombarded the Christian lines destroying twenty five miles of trenches and carrying another line of trenches toward night fall after night successive attacks with the bayonets, while at other points the Angelinians endeavored to check the advance of Federal's right center attacking furiously to the rear. The Glandelinians however withstood the attack and in heavy force delivered a heavy counter attack resulting in the capture of more fortified trenches, dominating the Catherine crossroads leading to Angelina Agathia. The fighting here was particularly fierce. The muzzles of the machine guns were red hot but they were seized and buried over while the attackers with fixed bayonets rushed the trenches, the Glandelinians maintaining solid lines and pushing on vigorously forcing back the Christian divisions under Geps and J. Cops and driving general Miller's forces back like frightened sheep. Hap heap.

THE GREAT WEST LANE MASSACRE

General Giam Giam who was furious over general Beaumont's fall followed up his recent repulse along the other parts of the line by immediately advancing Sheridan Bicknell across the Klein River under heavy fire and soon in the morning the battle was resumed with terrible fury by the advance of Bicknell's whole force toward the Glandelinians under Hermann.

For six hours more the battle raged along these points with indestructible fury and the Elise Elise lanes presented one of the most horrible scenes of the third day during the battle. It was practically filled with many hundreds of thousands of dead and wounded with the ground in front and rear was strewn with fields of the bodies of the men engaged on both sides. During a fierce irresistible charge in which he had lost more than three hundred thousand men Hannosins captured a strong portion of Hannosins' works and during the rest of the day the battle raged furiously.

In the early morning Hannosins ordered his immense forces of Glandelinians from Catherine Run upon Angelina Francillone Heights Bicknole and Hannosins strongly fortified positions. The Glandelinians advanced with enthusiasm and a fearful fire of artillery and musketry tore their vanguard columns to pieces, and the bleeding survivors stopped for a moment then plunged forward again, the Glandelinians falling dead and wounded by tens of thousands and their bodies strewn the ground as thick as grass. As they approached Hannosins entrenched positions sheet after sheet of flame shot forth from the heights for the length of thirty five miles the Christian fire tearing fearful raps in the assaulting lines but there was no running back of Hannosins' men. They sometimes stopped or recoiled a little distance to reform their shattered lines but then ran on the advance doggedly the nearest columns pouring a well directed withering fire upon the entrenched Angelinians moving them down as fast as they fell themselves. Many large columns of Glandelinians rushing forward with fixed bayonets swarmed over the ramparts of the Angelinians but were shot or cut down. Here and there simultaneously large bridges of reckless Glandelinians within easy range of the Christian musketry would suddenly drop away or go to pieces thousands upon thousands of them drop in like tall grass scented down with a long scythe while the survivors throw themselves upon the ground to let the storm of bullets pass over them and then crawl forward many firing deadly volleys in return.

Nevertheless it was in vain for the Glandelinians could not carry such a well posted and well defended position protected by cannellany sunken roads, and stone walls and entrenchments skillfully thrown up during the night. The Glandelinians being forced to withdraw during the following night and aided by darkness and a heavy snowstorm the Glandelinians crossed Elise river and made another terrific onslaught but the Angelinians successfully repelled the attack and then countercharged Hannosins' divisions making a prompt and vigorous dash scattering the Glandelinian army immediately in front of him, and upon Hannosins' madly thundering guns threw their retreat into utter confusion and drove the latter part of their forces helplessly into the boiling river and took many prisoners.

This was another terrible catastrophe in the battle for whole legions of the panic stricken Glandelinians were cut to pieces during the final dash and three hundred and sixty six Glandelinians were made prisoners. At the same time this was happening Hannosins had crossed Gartrudes creek and pressed forward the advancing Christians and pressed a part of Hannosins' line back. The battle now became an awful merciless and unrelenting struggle, Hannosins urging on his army with utmost vigour. Frightful and terrific became the rattling roar of countless muskets and pistols and slowly but surely the Christian line advanced across fenosa fields and through the woodlands. After eight hours of the fiercest fighting Hannosins fell back upon the main line discouraged and disheartened. Despite the unsuccessful outcome during the fierce five days action in and around Alibrahma Federal only brought his main forces and buried these upon general Vivian's already torn tottered and bleeding lines. While the attacks were in progress on the sixteenth of the battle Violet and her sisters went to see what was on fire between the main Christian lines for the sky was darkened with immense wreaths of black smoke.

Fearing that it was some trick of the enemy the little girls accompanied by some regiments of boy scouts started off. The weather was very chilly and cold and tottering in the deep snow and slush formed by the sun and after traveling for some distance they came within sight of the cause. Exposed to their sight was the burning of hundreds of thousands of barrels of petroleum and gasoline the enemy having wrecked a long oil train on the Mc-Hollister and Pandora and Pandora and Angelina railroad. Scores of the tank cars in the middle of the tracks had been derided many of them hurled into flames while others by burning fire furiously were stream long the right of way for nearly a thousand yards. Almost simultaneously to the wrecking of the train the Glandelinians had set fire to the first two cars which had soon exploded throwing sheets of flaming oil over the entire part of the wreckage causing the contents of nearly all the tank cars to ignite and now flames and immense clouds of dense smoke enveloped the train. In all one hundred and forty seven cars were being destroyed and a large number of other tank cars and of the burning train which had failed to leave the tracks had been pulled out of harm's way by forces of Angelinians who were storming the Macnic line at the same time.

Despite his recent terrible repulses Federal was not daunted and hurried to a new offensive large forces of Mc-Hollisterians also again and again after bloody fighting forced a goodly portion of the Christian line under Clinton out of its position and satisfied with the results Federal within two hours more hurled the Glandelinians Americans, Bourbonnians combined upon general Vivian's forces, again driving them from the work they had recovered early in the afternoon. The halting of the enemy was like the sweep of some mighty avalanche and within four hours general Vivian's army witnessed the rout of his armies, and strange as it may seem it happened again that the right wing was not and could not be forced back.

After a lull of two hours while the other forces were still pursuing the panic stricken Christians Federal now directed his heaviest blows on this wing, all the Glandelinians that he could muster being hurled upon this wing amid the most dreadful carnage ever seen.

In thousands those routed were in the greatest panic than during the other routs, they pouring toward the rear in the most terrific confusion ever witnessed in battle before the foe following hard and cutting men shooting them down like grain pouring from a chute. Toward midnight after a most frightful struggle general Vivian's right wing was finally rolled up and driven northward in disorder.

In another hour a total rout began. Federal's victorious hosts hosts carrying all before them and mowing down the panic stricken hordes as a fast as they could get at them. General Vivian was too broken hearted that he could hardly do do anything to rally them and fairly wept like a child.

"All is lost! All is lost." He cried mournfully as the terrified Vivian girls crowded around him. "All is lost!"

He made the utmost preparations to flee and was soon with the retreating army the little girls being with him to the last. The confusion of the retreating Christian armies was indeed sublime and also frightful. However to general Vivian's good luck the enemy did not follow as fast as before as he darkness had now become intense for heavy snow clouds were hiding the moon. Toward morning general Vivian had managed to rally a goodly portion of his armies and continued on a morbidly retreat. The enemy however followed hard and fast continually harassing his armies and causing a wide spread devastation. Throughout the defeat Hannosins' army had been so terribly ravaged by the victorious foe that out of all he had which was about ten million only one or two hundred thousand were left all being killed wounded or prisoners.

General Vivian's heart was broken. He couldn't surrender as he knew Federal had sworn that he would receive no surrender or give no quarter until either his armies were destroyed or that the Vivian girls were given up. Though victorious the enemy had however been outwitted as they had not been able to capture the Christian army and annihilate them surrounded as Federal had them before the battle began. Federal was following hard and not ever for a moment did his men give the Christians any respite. But toward eight o'clock it was found that Federal's army had stopped advancing and general Vivian wondered what the reason was. Just then an officer dashed up all excited his clothes all covered with dust. "The Abbeonians!" He cried excitedly. "The Abbeonians are coming fast. Big force of them. Perhaps millions!"

"Good God!" gasped general Vivian as in a dream. "Is it true?" It was true indeed. The Abbeonians were advancing and in the heaviest numbers and Federal had not dared or dared to engage them in his disorganized condition and so hastily withdrew his mighty armies and fell back northward. Neither general Vivian or general Sabu Sebastian of the Abbeonians pursued; on account of the crippled conditions of the Christian armies. This indeed really marked the defeat of the Glandelinians no matter how the fighting had turned out for Federal had been fearfully outwitted at Alibrahma and had met a stinging defeat though he had routed general Vivian's army for he had retreated on the point of his highest bid in the vicar victory he had won. If he had dared and stand and meet the Abbeonians which was really a large reserve force of Vivian's Federal anyway would have suffered horrible annihilation and it was wise that he had retreated. The Abbeonian army of this force had realized the grave danger and if Sebastian had allowed the Angelinians to be pursued any further they he would have placed himself in the greatest danger and realizing it had sprung immense forces to general Vivian's aid and there had been hurrying upon the Glandelinians who had been following general Vivian's so hard and again Angelina and Angelinians had fought the Glandelinians before and the Abbeonians were still smarting from the insult in April in eighteen forty nine and were indeed willing to strike another blow.

General Federal had no wish with the 100,000 Abbeonian army reinforcing general Vivian and with good reason. Had he dared it his own army crumbled as it was already from its own terrible losses would have met practical annihilation. General Federal however was too ashamed to declare himself beaten he a man who had boasted that no Christian dog of a general could ever lick him but now he was doing all in his power to avoid the powerful Christian army which were always following him. The battle of Alibrahma was the last one in the northern drama of war.

It was a quite awhile though before poor broken hearted Violet and her sisters realized the change. They did not when they did not they were not happy because they missed Starring who had been killed in trying to defend them against the Glandelinians. Starring who had been captured them. They felt his loss keenly. John and Jack Evans were far away somewhere else in general Vivian's great Angelinian hosts and wishing to have them with them again the little girls appealed to their father by telegraph to send either one but could get no communication with him and so had to write though they had no faith in the note over reaching him.

"Go have no friends at all except them now," said violet, to one of her sisters who was alone. "We have lost all, even Dan, and Kuno as they reported, and many more of our friends, and if we really lost them we have nothing, and will die ourselves if we have to go into battle together, for we will not bear any further losses like that." And her eyes flashed.

Jack and John Evans were in general Vivian's armies just now, and these armies who had moved up into Calvernia in the west, but the more forward armies just now were under the personal command of general Abbott because it was during the night when an orderly rode up to his tent and saluting handed him a message, and Evans wondering what it was, hastily up & opened the envelope and unfolding the sheet read:

violet and her sisters and your other little friends are pining for your return, and so we wish you to come back. They have lost every one except you and your brother, and if you really love them as a flower in deepest sorrow, as you have always shown, you will come back."

friend."

Evans dismissed the orderly, and hastily rode to general Donohue's headquarters. Finding the general alone, he showed him the note.

"It is best to go at once, and God bless you and bring the you safely to them," said the general.

After bidding the general good bye, Evans started off alone in disguise. Just as he was off the general relieved another note from another orderly:

"Your Excellency general Donohue; general in retreating northward toward Evangelina St. place. Make in immediate advance and have him in the line has been beaten by Vivian's in several battles."

General Hanson Vivian.

Commander just now at porothy Gale.

The poor Angelinian nation persecuted and oppressed, lying crushed and bleeding since the Pacific Jackson disaster, was now ready to fight in full earnest. Month by month day by day, thousands of women and innocent children, had been shot down, or stabbed and clubbed to death in their houses, by general Manley and Federal's men, who were ever again at it in the west, to revenge their latest defeat. Word of the latest atrocity of the Glandelinians, Ovarians, and Gargoyles, and Kards and Gargoyles had spread misery and despair through whole regions. It even conveyed the horrible news, that fifteen thousand women and children who were forced by bitter cold and famine to surrender to the rebels were killed in the bloodiest manner. Cruelty and barbarism were the little boys and girls killed by the bayonets and torn by the bullets. Plans for mercy, fell on deaf ears. Choice between Christ and Death, and Free Masonic and life was Manley's decree, and the Martyres to the faith, the Angelinian women and children choose Christ and Death. The sickening horrors of the slaughters during the early part of the war were shaded by the diabolical slaughter of women and children now from their mothers, their executions were delayed until all the women were massacred. The commanders of the captors was were not sure what torture to mete out to them so they went to Federal.

"What shall we do with the Christian children, your Excellency?" They asked.

"Oh throw them into the river," the answer, and into the river they were thrown, where their shrieks of despair were soon carefully stifled by the rushing waters, or quick sands that engulfed them. Along the shore watching the struggling mass of humanity, stood the Ovarian and Scoundler soldiers reveling in the opportunity to torture the weak, and defenseless. Proving the Christian children in the Mc-Warther gun river was not a new form of torture employed by the blood thirsty Glandelinians. As the retreating Glandelinians reached the town of Oppell nearly one hundred thousand Christian men women and children together were flung into the river, because they refused to deny Christ, while at the same time one hundred and fifty thousand others were hurled bound hand and foot into the river elsewhere. Little girls were choked, mothered and two hewn to pieces, benton to death, their opened and mangled bodies left in the streets for the dogs and other wild beasts to eat. The massacre of this long suffering nation horror was increasing and it seemed that only the act of a kind Providence could spare the refugees, the fate of the other refugee Christian women men and children, who were killed by the savage Glandelinian Scoundler and Gargoylian Kards.

The savage atrocities enacted by Federal's and Manley's men were horrible beyond description, and could not even be hinted at. Fountains were torn from the ears of the Christian women and girls, the flesh torn with them, wives and mothers and even sons and sisters of the religious were outraged and cruelly slain. Day in and day out this horrible work of inhuman butchery was continued by the retreating rebels, the crashing of musketry, the crashing in of doors, and the thud of snare blows, resounding on the ear. Any of those, or all of those whose eyes were got gorged at, and whose limbs were rent asunder, whose quivering flesh flesh was torn from their bodies not death in terrible forms. And they could have saved themselves had they known of the enemy's approach.

One little girl refused to take an Ovarian Oath which would have given over the best people in her village to the human demons. A whole night then was spent on torturing her. First she received hard blows upon the soles of her feet until she was almost senseless, then she was forcibly undressed, and two poles were firmly bound to her body, which reached from her arm pits to her feet. Next her arms were stretched out and her hands fastened to poles, and this living cross was bound to a pillar, and the scourging began. The unhappy nine year old child could not move a limb to alleviate her pain, and only her features betrayed by their frightful convulsions the tortures she so suffered. The louder she shrieked the heavier fell the blows. Next they brought pinchers to draw her teeth, but desisted when she remained firm. An officer then ordered the tormentors to tear at the hair singly by the roots, which was done amid loud and scornful laughter. When this was of no use some one held a red hot poker or spit to the hands of the unhappy child, whose flesh burned, and who only cried out in her agony.

"God will punish you for this." For spite the executioners took the red hot iron from her hands, and laid it on her abdomen, chest, face, back, and feet. Then they forced her mouth open, and burned her tongue with hot pinchers. The unhappy child fainted three times, but each time when she came to herself her resolution was unmovable. Her flesh was torn from her body, which was then gashed wide open at the belly, and the Kards left her to die this way in lingering agony. This did the poor child deliver her body to the tormentors and endured indescribable agony, and died like a Christian martyr martyr defying heaven itself as to say, in her boundless trust in God. It was to be stated by some that did she did not die in lingering agony, but that they saw little angels around in round the child, and hear her up into the skies, amid great and happy cries which were heard far and wide from the child.

Evans who was on his way toward Vivian's line after receiving the note, had been on the travel for a week, but he reached it without any incidents, but in meeting general Vivian learned that the Vivian girls were missing or had gone out on a scouting tour, worried over the movements of general Federal's army and learning of the terrible massacre general Vivian had sent the little girls to keep a sharp look out for the near approach of the enemy, and as a fact the advance guard of the foe was much nearer than the little girls had expected, and the little girls not having enough men to battle with them successfully out in the open, retreated and took defense in one of a line of ten big wooden houses which stood along the bank of the Conservatory gun river. The massacre of women and children had been at its highest pitch those days, and the Glandelinians being mostly Kards and Gargoyles were bound to destroy the Vivian girls at all costs, to get revenge for their recent defeats, and also knowing that their deaths would win the war for their own side. There was only sixty men to defend the Vivian girls and they also took shelter in every one of the cottages upon which a number of the Glandelinians made three successive attacks, but were repulsed with bloody losses.

These Glandelinians however were very desperate and were bound to capture the cottages even if they had to set them on fire, or risk annihilation. Four more attacks were made but the Glandelinians met frightful destruction. Again the Glandelinians surrounded the cottages on all sides and made a rush with flaming torches, firing all the houses especially the one the little girls were in. Before long violet and her sisters were trapped by the flames on the second floor of the cottages, and hundreds of Glandelinians mostly Scoundlers seeing the Vivian girls at the windows set up wild yells and at started firing but the bullets only hit the houses. Violet crawled to the sill and prepared to leap, but below two stories down was a hedge of deadly bayonets stuck in the ground and she fell back into the room. Scores of the Angelinians spurred to desperation by the scream of the little girls dashed furiously at the Glandelinians in an effort to rescue violet and her sisters, but were either cut down or bayoneted. A colonel after denouncing the furiously furious Glandelinians sprang to the door way ducking into the burning building in an effort to rescue them, but a volley laid him low. Soon every room was ablaze even the one where the little girls were in was a furnace at one section, and no one their doom seemed sure to come.

The Glandelinians were yelling like mad demons and brandishing their weapons savagely. Even someone of them was tramping a cannon which hurled even at short range shells that would blow up whole ten buildings into dust and planks at once.

In the meantime Evans had sent out quite a large brigade of cowardly mostly White Abominables, but not some Conscientious with him, and it was with the purpose to search for the little girls. After searching for five minutes they suddenly came upon the scene before them.

hundreds of the Angolians who had rushed out of the living cottages were fighting the garrison with the fury of men who have no other aim but to die. And Evans, seeing the faces of beautiful children in the windows of one of the more strongly built cottages from which the wind was blowing, he looked at the big women being treated to blow them all to atoms. The blood boiled as he looked on this scene, and as he recognized by means of his glasses that they were the girls, his heart seemed to leap out of his mouth. Controlling his emotion and fear he turned to his troopers and said: "Forward boys! And if you can't kill these murderers who fail to engage us, give them a quarter of a mile."

Down toward the muddy galling gladiolians dashed the whole column of horsemen with a thunderous roar of hooves, the quarrels and shotguns turned to meet them, and the gun was swung round and fired. The crash of the shell in exploding killed ten thousand men at one bang, but the survivors of the Winkie phalanxes and Concentinians though horrified at first recovered and while a large detachment of them captured the gun in one rush the rest struck at the rebels like mad. A hail of flintlocks, shotguns of the elevation variety was too rich and they were overwhelmed as if by a great avalanche. There was a pandemonium of blood fighting and the Concentinians and Angolians literally slew hundreds of the retreating rebels who failed to escape in that mad rush. Shamelessly and bravely a large number of the Angolians or Concentinians pulled the fragments from the ground, and sent them sailing.

"Jump!" cried the leader of the Concentinians. "You will catch me!" the little girl did, and lost in time, for as the last one had jumped out of the house the building collapsed with a crash of falling timbers, sending a great storm of sparks upward with the great clouds of smoke. "How in heaven's name did this happen?" asked Evans sitting up. Violet told him the whole story.

"I thought you were through with the scouting work," said Evans. "Why did you and your father leave me in the way to the Christian lines? It was foolish to take defense in such a place. No horses!"

"We did not think," answered Violet. "We did not even know they would get the houses on fire or that you would be there."

"Well they did," declared Evans. "And if it had not been for my society over your shoulder, I would not have been so soon as you would have surely perished. I don't see why general Viviani sent you into such danger in the first place. He should of known better and if you had perished he would have been held responsible by your father and the Abbaonian authorities, and I'm not afraid to tell him so either."

"I would not say anything to him though," warned Violet as they were now entering the Christian lines. "He is not in a good humor just now and would request our father to take your guardianship away."

"That is right," said Evans. "But I like to see him try it. But I'm going to let him know what happened anyway. That will be alright won't it?"

"We have no objections at all," said Violet. "Only don't say anything rash to him for our sakes."

"I'll promise that I won't, I'll be careful," answered Evans.

Evans kept his word telling general Viviani all that happened.

"I did not know the danger was so great, and was foolish to send them too," said the great general misjudgingly. "It was even a narrow escape for me. God help me if they were dead now. But I'm glad you went to the rescue in time. Where are they now?"

"They went to general Hannouin's headquarters to tell him of the movements of the foe. And don't you now your excellency that I have not to tell you once for all that Federal seems to be again mobilizing in force."

"How did you discover this?" asked general Viviani.

"I did not do it," answered Evans. "Your child friends discovered it before they were attacked. They told me all before they went to Hannouin."

"I'll have to warn general Hannouin to look out for himself then," said general Viviani. "I'll send the message right away."

And he did. Two days later he received the warning and moved northward extending and concentrating his lines. Indeed another bloody battle was threatening, one of greater intensity, than any since the battle of Florinopolis army had advanced into a monstrous trap, and the latter knowing it kept on the watch. Hanley himself was keeping an eye on both Donohue and general Viviani. Hanley however was at once because general Hannouin was separated from general Viviani by a great marsh. Should Hannouin succeed in making a junction with general Viviani then Hanley himself would be between two fires and would have to attack Donohue to save his escape. To Hanley determined to prevent Hannouin from making a union with Viviani by sending his own line in a fish hook shape (going fishing) toward the marshes with the heaviest cannons he could concentrate upon this point.

General Viviani discovering this through the scouting of Violet and her sisters and who had reported of the occurrence, again sent for general Jack Evans to warn Hannouin of the trap being set for him and also at start concentrating himself preparing to strike if Hanley got too threatening.

Evans and the little girls started off at once despite the fore warning of a thunderstorm that was approaching. It already being near the last of May, there being some rain in the air at this season. "I believe there is going to be a big flood," said Evans, noting a wall of gladiolians in the southwest which were advancing at a great rate.

"I wonder if we can reach Hannouin before the storm of battle breaks," asked Violet anxiously. "On my word there is sign of a threatening battle all the time since Hanley is trying to place his between two fires."

"It looks that way," declared Evans as they now neared a wooden country where the trees were almost bare. "Maybe if the gladiolians come too near we can seek protection behind some ledge of rocks, and there is no need to hurry for this threatening battle, and it will make so much noise it will drown Hannouin as he to do by his advance anyhow."

"That is right too," said Violet. "No forget."

"Oh merciful heavens what is that funnel shaped cloud rising in the air? and by heavens it is coming toward us," said Evans.

"It is a cyclone or a tornado," said Violet. "Go to the ravine quick or we are lost."

A strange darkness was now settling on and the dull booming of the approaching twister could be heard plainly. They soon reached the deep ravine and into this they plunged and alighted down as quickly as they could. They could not tell how long they remained there, but suddenly it began to lighten up and the sun to peep at intervals through the fast scurrying clouds.

"The cyclone may have overlooked us," said Evans. "It never hit us. It may have even missed the marsh."

They had to go northeast to reach the marsh and when they came upon it they saw that Evans was mistaken for the twister had indeed tore its way through the marsh, for every tree had been cleaned out, and the water made muddy by the lashing of the flood caused by the winds rush. The circumference of the storm as they noticed covered a mile in width, but when they reached Hannouin's army they discovered the tornado had missed it, though a shower of hail had fallen like a blizzard, for the ground was white with the globes of ice. It took them sometime before they could find Hannouin and when they did they told him of the danger. Evans after the battle of Altona Hannouin made a sudden movement that suddenly turned them back. Hanley in fact escape. Hanley saw this danger and did not know what to do.

And it was not long before the storm had reached the marsh. Three days after he had been surrounded general Hannouin seeing it useless to continue fighting sent a messenger to general Viviani asking what terms of surrender would be accepted. General Viviani was surprised at this, for he expected Hanley to fight like a lion before being forced to yield. And now he was about to surrender, without even firing a shot. General Viviani then held a council. Many of his generals were for giving Hanley no quarter, not to accept surrender on any conditions on account of the many atrocities caused by his forces. This council was held during the night, and Hanley was saying no in order to answer to his notices of surrender, and believing that general Viviani was not going to accept, determined to suspend his surrender and strike a blow against Donohue. Ward morning his attacks were successful, and before general Viviani could move forward, Hannouin was swept from his position, and his army forces were gone. Over this occurrence general Viviani was perplexed. He had expected an easy victory. Hanley had shouted no. "as what the general said to himself."

"If I had immediately accepted his terms there would be no more blood shed," Hannouin believed it was his own fault declaring that all ought to have accepted the general's surrender right away, and that the delay had been the cause of it altogether.

During the last of April and during May, elsewhere battles in the eastern part had raged at general Hannouin's bidding, on the last of April. On May and on the last of April battles raged at Julio Gallo again, another one at Gerontin Creek, Ganderon Run, Fies Hall, another battle of some, at Abbaoum, Jackson Gorge, and Empira Crossroads between various armies of both sides. The last battle raged on May 25th. All were victorious. Loss in total 100,000,000. The battle that Hanley had fought to get away from it. Viviani had raged on the Rio-Hollander and again. ...

... forest fires not by Federal had been on the march for a week in spite of the efforts of the firefighters to shut them in. The thick smoke hung in a smothering above the underbrush like a sullen dry blanket burning one's lungs and eyes and at times hiding the sun. The atmosphere made Hannouin think of a steadily crawling gray beast reaching round one's throat, while the distant horizon glowed a mullen red. Hannouin was indeed bound to advance in spite of the forest fires so bravely putting on his order and so making out, he filled a bottle of water, soaked a cloth with a cloth and dreamed both in a pigskin bag, which he slipped over his shoulder.

He then went to the pump in the yard of his headquarters, and got as wet as he could, drenching a handkerchief, and binding it over his mouth and nose.

He was going to ride straight into the terrible fire whomever his again had gone fighting their way furiously through. Many already caged in anyone fought their way out, others caught or exhausted and scorched stumbled through the smoke to the nearest lakes and trenches fighting the fire as furiously as if were the attack of the Huns. The distant mountains leaped red like some living thing, arithing and twisting. Big dazzling streams of fire driven by the wind threw a sea of flaming brands of pitch pine and fir, and from the underbrush oiled pines in blue blazed up to the sickening crackle of the flames. Slopes of growth pines and fir pushed down wasted. The limbs of the trees were covered with thick dried moss and the fire fed on this jumping from tree to tree from branch to branch up and down the sides of the hills going with the swiftness of an express train.

In a few minutes Hanson's horse was plunging nose footed over the bridge across a canon. Here the smoke was dense. Once his horse staggered and fell and he whipped a piece of burning bark of his sinched coat. The next second he was up and on they went beating the scream of the fire in the distance and dodging pieces of lighted foliage that dropped about them. The scene was like a regular hell red world. He spurred on his horse avoiding as well as he could the burning branches overhead. The hot air seemed to literally bite his bones even through the wet cloth over his mouth and the shaggy hair of his horse was burned to a crisp.

It was difficult to see even a hundred feet away through the heavy smoke so he came upon most of his men unexpectedly. He met General Huerfano, Huerfano Costello who was commanding a party of fire fighters who had forced most of the fire along their own front under control. Six hours they had fought with all their strength and like maniacs against the howling fire and now they had wait to their deaths in the fierce conflict.

"We are having a hell of a time fighting this worldy inferno," said general Huerfano Costello, "and worse yet. The inferno is shooting off my men to hinder the fire fighting."

"I know that said Hanson," "But this fire has not to be pulled through."

"Most of the army has went through though, as we are overcoming the blaze," said Costello.

"Thank god," said general Hanson. "Now I will be able to make a junction with general Vivian."

On the distant slopes slopes tender trees dropped like lacustras, the redness and hotness of the wind began to blow like a hurricane. Hanson however felt as if he had done a foolish thing. Far to his left the forest regions had become zones of fire. The air was getting hotter and the smoke thicker.

Nevertheless he had run into the zone. To go back he knew would be worse than continuing on. On it was at all costs. To fight his way through the forest blaze he would even id if he and the last man fell. The battle against the fire was continued until they reached the woods which were more clearer.

T B BATTLE OF MC-JAIL'S HUNTS ('A 141')

Here came a shock for the Huns. The army under Federal along had not followed Stanley's retreat and dragged over Hanson's advance in spite of the fires which he had made made a desperate assault upon the Christian line and soon a terrific hell maddest maddest battle was raging in the midst of forest fires. First came the Mc-Hollistins to the attack and they made such bloody slaughter that the Angels, Angelian leaders were appalled though they had managed with their run fire to drive back the Mc-Hollistins with the loss of three quarters of their commands.

Following an hour's lull came the Omarians and Amecians vults and Condencianians and these threw themselves upon the Christian line with the most frightful violence and fury. Harassed for three days by both the fire and the enemy's thunders on lights the Christian armies were jeap jeopardized, but they succeeded in repelling the Omarian onslaughts and even cutting their lines to pieces but the trees were on fire now and they were in great danger. Federal saw this and taking advantage of the opportunity hurried on one of his wings upon the weakest portions of Hanson's army cutting it to pieces and driving all before them. Federal indeed was bound to hold Hanson from advancing any further and even would sooner perish in the fire himself than be seen by his Christian enemies. He had already wiped out one quarter of Hanson's army and was now wiping out another. The brave Angelian warriors standing their ground like Spartans against Federal's frightful storming onslaughts but now Federal had rotted on his biggest guns and began to pound the Christian columns topieces. For a whole day in the midst of ravaging forest fires the battle raged fiercely but as soon as dusk came Hanson having lost three quarters of his army to Federal's one quarter was compelled to abandon the fight and retreat as swiftly as he could.

The Huns however had done the best workmaking the most terrific onslaught despite their frightful losses. Federal was exultant over his victory. He had not only prevented Hanson from making a junction with general Vivian but had humbled his army to pieces as well. Had Hanson dared to make another stand and rage the battle for the fourth day he would have met with annihilation....

A SECRETARY OF THE HUNTS OF THE HUNTS.

The meantime Violet and her sisters had startling reports. Before his fatal advance upon the forest fires, Hanson it is stated, had twice seen something like a bloody hand trail down the wall. When he had first seen it, it seemed quite dull and he had taken no notice of it, believing it to be the shadow of a hand. When it again appeared an hour afterward, it first started like a fiery stream from the top of the wall, and suddenly turned into a large red hand, which though appearing for only a few seconds, threw heat enough to scorch the bed clothes and almost prostrate him. The next day an examination was made of the wall, as Hanson had believed it was caused by some strange fluid trickling down the wall; however the examination failed to expose anything, and therefore it was believed that the hand only had a dream. One soldier however had predicted that he saw a dark spot on the wall, in the shape of a hand.

Violet and her sisters decided to find out what made this happen. Two nights they spent in the room which Hanson had occupied, but without results. Other rooms they tried, but no hand of any kind appeared, although the houses that night seemed to be reddened by a strange mysterious glow, which lasted half an hour and then suddenly died out. On the night that Hanson had been crushed by Federal's little girl had been a separate room which had not been occupied, and so was not to be left this time. The whole night passed however without anything unusual being going, though the same redness appeared, for several minutes and then died out.

"I believe he dreamed it myself," said Violet.

"No it can't be," exclaimed Jennie. "If he dreamed of it then, what made that strange redness appear two times? There was no fire of any kind visible was there?"

"There was a severe forest fire north of here," said Violet. "It may have been the fire that made that light in the sky, and clouds of smoke hid it out of sight, which caused it to die out suddenly."

"Well let's try one more night," declared Violet. "Maybe this time we will be successful."

"I guess it would be a goodly plan," said Jennie. "But I wonder if there is any apartment beyond the wall in the room he occupied. Let's peep on it and see." They did and discovered that it sounded hollow.

HANDS OF THE HUNTS.

"Hurry the mystery is hidden the secret room," said Violet. "Let's get some men with axes and saws down out in it, so we can go in and see." They were decided upon. They ordered six men to cut a door hastily and when this was done the little girls went in, finding the room in total darkness. Violet and her sisters lighted some candles they found in the room in the other room, and examined the place which had proved to be a vault for piles of money were still there in many lockers. Violet hinted upon an idea.

"I have an intention to sleep in here just for one night, and for fun," she said to her sisters. "Stay here and count a 1 that money and give it for the cause. Who is good?"

"So will I sleep in here," answered Violet. "None of us are afraid." So it was decided. The hole was hewed large enough to suit the beds, which before that time were brought in.

"If this occurrence is really true then I'll claim that the Aronburg murder has something to do with it," said Angeline that night.
 "But it was the devil's hand," said Violet seriously; "You know that Hanson said that the hand threw a terrible supernatural heat and was red in color."
 "If it is we will shoot it," said Violet; "The devil will not show his dirty hand to us."

Violet and her sisters carefully laid their pistols under the pillow where they could easily reach them and laid still for sometime. Then Jennie broke the stillness by crying just as the same redness appeared:

"GRACIOUS GIRLS! LOOK YOUNDER QUICK!"

With an impulse her sisters looked in the indicated direction and saw that their exit seemed to be closed like magic while two red hands the very height and width of the walls throwing a singing heat that scorched the very air traveled slowly up and down the two side walls and then was gone leaving everything in a seemingly supernatural darkness. Though not apparently frightened they were nevertheless excited from what they had seen. The hole in the wall had not really been closed as they thought though the redness having made it seem so dark that it felt so dark there that it had seemed so. Finding the exit there they were relieved for had it really happened they would have died of such suffocation for the vault had been air tight before the hole had been cut in.

THEIR EXPERIENCE IN THE ATTIC. THE RESULT.

"My but that was a terrible sight," said Jennie; "Two big red hands at once and such heat. I felt as if I was facing some mighty furnace."
 "Let's make some lights and examine the wall's those hands traveled on," said Violet.

The candles were lit and they proceeded to work in their nighties at that.
 "The walls seem mighty hot," said Catherine; "Maybe those hands were of fire."
 "It seems so," said Violet; "I know one thing," she added; "There is an attic above this vault. Let's make an investigation there. We can get there by one of the rooms."

This seemed to be a good idea. For the sake of precaution however they took their guns with them. When they reached the attic they lit several gas jets they saw hanging from the ceiling and got full view of the attic. Against one of the walls of the attic to their surprise a hideous scene was exposed. Two red hands seemed to clutch at them especially at their throats and threw a fiercer heat than ever where there was a strange roaring noise from them. Now the strange mysterious hands would not disappear but got bigger and bigger until it cut off their escape from the trap door. Horrified the little girls drew back and aiming their pistols fired simultaneously. Then to their surprise the hands were gone but the gas lights had went out mysteriously and they were in total darkness while a strange horrible odor filled the room.

"Light them quick," said Jennie with a scream.

Violet did so and again the frightful hands appeared seemingly from the very gas jets this time and launching toward them with a terrific roar suddenly disappeared the attic again being in total darkness. They wondered if the gas coming from the jets did it or not. Violet daringly lit the gas again but one jet this time just as what would follow. Nothing followed and they lit the other but nothing happened though the gas burned with a strange noise.

"My but it was frightful," said Jennie; "Those hands of fire seemed to clutch toward our throats. I wonder what their appearance meant?"

"I don't know," said Jennie; "Maybe it was caused by turning the gas on full force. The hands seemed to proceed from the jets."

"They put the jets out," said Angeline; "No though they did not do it. I'm sure it was something else."

"Well let's get out of here," said Jennie; "I would sooner put my head in a lions mouth than explore this attic again. There is something wrong, sure."
 The little girls were even glad to leave the building which they hastily did after looking for their clothes which they could not find having to leave in their nighties.

"General Vivian must know of this," said Violet; "I'll never go in that dreadful house again; maybe if we made one more visit to it that parrot we would never come out again."

Though Manly had retreated northward General Vivian nevertheless found himself confronted by an army of Glandelinians under General Nixon. This host of Glandelinians was the most powerful ever met and General Vivian dreading the outcome knew that Hanson's bitter defeat halted his advance. In the meantime the cheering rushed waves of Omarians rolled onward upon Hanson's retreating columns but found that the Christians had taken defense from behind smoldering tree barricades of rock and earthworks for from every Christian line poured livid sheets of flame. So terrific was this sudden shock that whole divisions seemed to melt away at the same moment. To the thousands that had not fallen immediately staggered as if drunk and in less than a minute the whole first charging column had fallen and the ground and sides of the burning woods were piled with the dead wounded and dying. At the same time hundreds of Federal guns were answering the smoldering woods with their storm of iron every gun continually breaking forth in a savage chorus. The effects of the shells when they exploded was appalling and also from the guns. A single shot would ring with a volume of a salvoes of ordinary artillery. Federal's biggest shells weighed three thousand pounds and these came toward the trenches with the sound of an express train the sound rising until the heavens quivered with the howl as of a cyclone and then came the crash squarely in the centre of the stony barriers and the tremendous explosions that followed seemed to rock the earth and sent great billowing clouds of smoke and dust high over the burning tree tops into the skies while fragments of debris were hurled a mile in every direction and no living thing within a hundred yards of the spot was left to tell the story. A breach had been made in the wall of stones through which a division might have charged as through an open field. For hours this terrific cannonading continued without pause attack following attack in endless succession the dull thunder of guns being very spasmodic and incessant with vibrations shaking the ground in tremors as from an earthquake. Hanson's one million men still clung to the portions of the burning woods and the battles fury seemed to sweep the heavens and earth with an infernal uproar.

Attacking cavalry forces of the enemy at times from thirty to fifty thousand strong fell into ambuscades carefully prepared and were annihilated. Toward night Hanson's under cover of the smoke mantle caused by the forest fires continued his retreat but no sooner had the Angelinian guns been limbered up and withdrawn from their positions when squadrons of Glandelinian and Oarian cavalry guided by searchlights charged full speed through the ruddy woods straight in to Hanson's retreating infantry. A battery of machine guns still unlimbered began spitting a storm of lead but divisions of Omarians plunged headlong among the gunners and the trenches here were soon choked with the mangled bodies in gray the huge wheels of the bigger guns rolling over prostrated bodies as over flies. Thousands after thousands of desperate men swarmed upon the booming cannons and in a fierce hand to hand fight killed all the defenders drove off the infantry and captured the guns. Again and again did the Omarians being steadily reinforced by Calvinian's terrible attacks were continued.

Yet not one of the columns that charged the Christian line returned to tell the tale. Yet not one that charged full failed to pile the Christian dead in heaps in that fierce burning inferno of woods. Whole brigades of men armed with machine guns were pushed forward through the burning woods by automobile transports to the aid of Hanson's these being sent by Clifton and Spars Abbe's line his host who were marching to the aid of the Christians. One big onslaught after another continued on the Christian lines despite the massing of guns which were coming in endless succession or procession of swirling at auto transports. General Federal being determined to close in on these guns before they could be assembled and mounted.

With savage yells resembling the screech of barbarians from hell hundreds of thousands of Oarian regulars led the charge followed by one million picked men consisting mostly of Mc-Hol-estianians. Pressing forward the Oarian regulars reached to within a hundred yards of the Christian lines the rushing fury with which they covered the space being irresistible. The sputter of hundreds of pompons and gathling guns filled the air with deafening grandeur and half the charging forces went down the remaining half reaching the first line of the Christian works. Hand to hand now, man to man they fought, with reckless fury, bayonets revolvers clubbed muskets, clubs, fists daggers stones and hand grenades. Friend and foe even mingled in mad holocaust of death and slaughter. While still they fought like writhing streams of fiends the second line of charging Mc-Hol-estianians reached the spot and joined in the fray. One thousand five hundred machine guns were captured and turned on the Christians.

Hanson's seeing that he had lost a good number of his guns instantly drew back his lines and reformed them fan shaped with each uncaptured gun bearing on the flank. Federal's men had made a tornado of whistling lead canister and shrapnell burst on the writhing masses of victorious Glandelinian hosts two thousand five hundred and forty machine guns having been concentrated with a speed that was stunning.

The Glandelinian's leaders dropped in many scores of platoons, swayed and rallied and once more faced the Christians for another charge. Machine guns seemed to arise from the earth. The Glandelinians were fighting divisions of men all around them. The commander of the advanced charging column tried in vain to rally the division but in thirty minutes there was nothing to rally the division having been annihilated. Billow after billow of graycats rolled toward Hanson's steadily reinforced lines sweeping on in a steady even wave three or thirty miles long dense masses of infantry with fixed bayonets and soon whole lines of teooping armies seemed to drop in strangling horror clutching and tearing at each others throats the battling lines writhing and twisting in a grip of death struggles.

Again and again the Christians rolled the assaulting lines up like scrolls of parchment it being done with remorseless savage brutality but again the surviving glandelinian columns surged forward sweeping the woods like a petulance laurie the fire that scoured and curled w everything with within its path. The main leaders of the charging hoes hosts had orders to exterminate the armies that dared oppose them and were setting an example of frightfulness that dare not never be described. However despite their reinforcements and after two more days of fearful fighting Hansonian was again compelled to retreat having lost one million in kills killed and three to four million in wounds and captured to that of the enemy who lost 7,655,748 in fallen. This is known as the battle of Arme May well say they may.

THE DARING ATTEMPT OF THE VIVIAN GIRLS WHICH SHOWS THAT NO MATTER HOW TERRIBLE SOME GLANDELINIAN GENERALS REALLY ARE THEY FEAR THEM NOT.

The armies under Dixon soon proved to be those of general Germainia Vivian who was in Satans place that formidable general having resigned his command the charge of being compelled to advance his armies upon children to massacre them and that he would not massacre children for no Glandelinian government that and that he would sooner see glandelinian go to hell then butcher children for their akes. General viviania when he learned of his new enemy who confronted him was almost broken hearted. He knew that general vivian had yearned day after day for his wayward son to repent but knew that instead of getting better he was growing worse.

How large his army was general viviania did not know but rumors had frequently come in that Germainias armies were twice his size and had better guns and wasteful ammunition. What should he do? Went general vivians son in a fight or retreat?

This was the first time that general vivians son was opposing him while in personal command of great armies and knowing the desperation and stubbornness of general vivians son had to debate about the outcome. Violet and her sisters were with general Viviania during the council but had nothing to say, in fact they did not know what to say at all.

They felt sad however over the wickedness of their only brother and in the height of his wickedness he would be killed. One night after the council the little girls happened to glance toward a clump of trees and Jennie who had been in the lead of her sisters gave a muffled hiss.

"What do you see Jennie what is it?" Queried Joice.

"I see a bright light over yonder through those bushes." Replied Jennie; "It flickers like a candle light and once in a while seems to be dodging about."

"Maybe its the private ghost of little Annie Aronburg." Whispered Joice with a grin.

"Hush." Said Jennie; "Cut out that nonsense or we will be discovered."

Proceeding cautiously Violet and her sisters heard voices and saw that the light came from a lantern. In an instant Jennie was peering through the bushes. Then she dropped back shaking with excitement.

"Guess who the ghosts are." She giggled in a whisper; "You would never believe it either Braggard and our old friend smash-in-the-head are out there with general Raymond Richardson Federal."

Astonished the little girls crept closer to the bushes to peer through and to listen. It was as Jennie had said: Federal, Smash-in-the-head, and Braggard were standing together in conversation and as they gathered about the bushes the little girls heard Federal say this;

"Well that settles it for that Hansonian and vivianian. No army can survive survive a disaster like that. I'm now waiting the arrival of some high officer who will partake in the movement upon Hansonian tomorrow. When he is closed in Hansonian will be forced to surrender."

"Yes replied Braggard; "I felt that you wanted me and so I made good time."

"The reason I wanted you for is this-----I have a package here which I want to send to general Germainia Vivian who is opposing general Vivianias army."

As he spoke Federal drew from his place of concealment at his waist a flat package about the size of a long business envelope;

"What I want you to do is to pass through general vivianias lines in disguise and carry this to Germainia. I think you had better let me hand it down on your back. It will be out of the way way there for if you get caught and are searched I don't want the christians to find this package."

Instantly Violet and her sisters watched the adjustment of the flat package. Violet and her e sisters greedily watched every movement with finger fingers itching to get hold of the parcel. Yet it was out of the question to expect Federal to hand her the envelope.

"Now if your story goes with general viviania and he lets you go you will be all right." Continued Federal; "However if you are recognized and suspected and are held as a spy this this dynamite will be handy in your pocket and at a favorable moment throw it. If you can get general viviania so much the better Hansonian will soon be caught conquered and be put out of the way and that will settle the two who are most dangerous in the excitement slip through the crowd."

"Good scheme." Agreed Braggard; "I suppose there is a market for the plans."

"I should say there is." Declared Federal; "There are different Glandelinian governments dicker for them right now. We will make our pile of odies on this." All right I'll be off. "Said Braggard; "My companion can follow of course. Come smashy. Let's show the christians that you can do much more."

The two then went off and Federal recounting his horse rode straight toward where the little girls were hiding. Violets hands clutched and her cheeks turned a few shades paler as she observed Federal approaching toward the bush.

"Sisters." She whispered; "We had better stand out ground as it would be folly to run from him. If he starts anything we will plug him for repay of his treatment of us when we were poor prisoners among his hands."

When he was near enough the little girls sprang from their hiding place and covered Federal with their guns.

"Your our prisoner." Said Violet; "If you try anything we will shoot you like a dog. Get down from that horse."

"I will not do so such a thing." Said Federal angrily; "And who said I'm your prisoner you little swans. He you are mere babbling babes." And with this he made a sudden dash almost trodding them down under his horses hoofs. The little girls fired at him but only brought down his horse Federal sprawling on the ground. He was up in a moment however and made a rush at the little girls with his drawn sabre but they dodged his onslaught and gave him a bullet wound in the shoulder.

Seeing that his adversaries though rarely little girls of eight or nine years were not to be trifled with he dashed into a dark woods the little girls firing again. Again and again he was hit but not seriously hurt and continued on his flight cursing and swearing volumes of imprecations like a demon.

"Darn them Vivian Girls." He said at last. "They may have discovered my conversation with smashy and Braggard and will expose him now. Darn the luck that I'm getting. How is it when we try to, they disappear, and now they attack me the little devils. That is something that I'll never forgive as long as I live."

Violet and her sisters in the meantime felt disgusted in their failure to arrest their enemy. They indeed realized that he was a reckless man who would not dare death than by a prisoner.

"I thought sure we would have scared him when we had him cornered as he was." Said Joice; "Well wicked as he is just as reckless. He would dare death for anything the fool."

"Well we showed him that we are not afraid of him as some people say." Replied Violet; "I'm sorry though that Federal is so bad."

"It is really nothing to side with the Glandelinians if he thinks that their cause is in the right but his butchery of children and his ruthless destruction of property destroys his good character."

"Yes but we will have to look out for Braggard." Said Joice; "He is going to try and pass through our lines with that parcel. We must frustrate him if we can."

Violet and her sisters made their way rapidly toward the christian living meeting in the time of an hour and telling general Viviania of the intended plot.

In the meantime of Federal's plan attack on Hansonian had been entirely successful but nevertheless did not have the desired effect and soon the flanking forces found themselves running a gauntlet of slaughter and were compelled to recoil thousands throwing down their arms and begging for mercy.

Federal seeing the reverse of his flanking parties increased the fury of his drive but despite it all he saw that he was losing. His armies in this region were growing smaller and smaller all the time and finally were compelled to retreat through the burning woods Hansonian force again pushing on and clearing the way before them.

Despite a waging a terrible battle in the midst of burning woods for three days Federal suffered a bitter defeat. His desperate intentions during that battle was to prevent Hansonian's intentions of joining Vivian in both the fire and the sword.

However this sturdy Glandelinian general was moving upon his from the south west. However this sturdy Glandelinian general was not daunted. He was bound to hold his ground at all costs and prevent the christians from retaking their state Calvernia. However general viviania losing hope of any decided victories and of the threatening attitude of scores of opposing armies sent to the Pope a refusal of making any further advances without undermanned aid declaring that it was absolutely foolishness and a folly as well.

Over the outcome general viviania was indeed over come and dishearted. He knew for facts that most of the greatest Glandelinian generals will never surrender not even to save their lives so to him there was no hopes of ever overcoming the furious Glandelinians no matter how hard the christians tried. Hansonian was all together different. He desired to see the Glandelinians crushed out of Calvernia and tried to advise general viviania that there was more folly to abandon his advancement than there was to continue it.

"The enemy would never be driven out of Calvernia." She said; "Ad "And probably they would counter advance us and carry all before us."

Most of Eastern part of Calvernia was also already disintegrated and infomedand if rippled such more would suffer a downfall and probably a complete annihilation. But he could not turn general Vivian's intention.

"Nothing doing va." Was all that he would say; "I'm not playing the coward neither am I faltering/ but I know and God knows also that none of us can ever expect another successful advance with our armies crippled as we are unless Indernia sent I his Abbiannians to us and neither can we succeed as long as Federal ain't fought to justice and the picture of the Aronburg child recovered. Over the tragedy of our own spirit itself may be holding us in our fat a because it is her wish to have her murders brought to his destruction and also the ardent wish of God. Without his accomplished if we make further advances every one of our generals with our whole armies may be compelled to lay down our swords to our enemy and even probably be killed or murdered like she was.

We are not fools and only fools would attempt further advances in the face of such inconceivable danger. One of the Tamarlines has retreated in his relentless fury and we have even befriended the Vivian girls but Federal and the other Glandelinian generals have not and may never do so either. Federal is the most dangerous of them all and, and most desperate and no wonder he is called the "Tornado". Never has any Glandelinian general fought any harder than him or made greater successes though defeated at times with his most woeful losses. He is a man who really wicked as he is fears no ghosts of spirits' nicks for facts does the very angels dare to thread his domains.

He defies both heaven and earth and even defies the demon who also fear him and look upon him as one of their princes. Why the very devils themselves would be blotted out by his wickedness and there may be no devils who has a more harder heart.

There is a fact then, and these swore before heaven and earth that Glandelinian may never be conquered as long as Federal remains alive and all have to say is that if he ever assumes supreme command in the kings palace in commanding the armies and the Aronburg picture is not restored Angelina may meet her own or either terrific defeats. I will not attempt to make the advance any further unless Federal is destroyed and the Aronburg picture recovered.

General Vivian meant what he said to: though many foresaw that general Vivian himself had sent in a forward that in another month general Vivian will be replaced by general Moro Vivian for his command will be taken away from.

Under any conditions general Vivian refused to move to move against the Glandelinian armies, and many of the officers of his staff consulting together had the opinion that general Vivian was doing just the right thing and that he was no coward and those few who may have been against him did not dare to dispute this great Christian general who indeed was doing the wisest thing any general could do and if his command would be taken away a disaster would follow in another month and many of the officers knew it. All his intentions were to stand to the last until general Vivian and Hanson would come with their armies to force themselves against Germania and the others should they attempt to wage a battle. Hanson himself was continually advancing on the Glandelinians forces but a stern request and excellent advice and then a threat from Hanson that his command would be taken away from him soon caused Hanson to see he is folly and to cause a halt.

General Vivian indeed did not like the situation and fearing that the mighty hosts under his uncle would strike him an unexpected blow withdrew the threatened portions of his lines toward the Pullaway Junction lines and made movements that proved very threatening indeed. Both general Vivian and Hanson felt very sad indeed over the situation and general Vivian himself had twice by messages begged Germania Vivian to turn to God God telling him that he may fall some day in the attics if he did not look out. In these messages Germania Vivian had been told that it really does not matter what side he is really fighting on as long as he would really repent of his sins and turn to God. But these messages were wasted. This is what general Germania wrote back to his father only;

"Your excellency general Vivian;

"Matters not what either of us do. You go your way and I'll go mine. As for the war us Glandelinians are bound to conquer you or kill you one or the other. You Christians and dogs of the earth have stood it against us not long enough. We are enemies and we will stay enemies and you are no father of mine any longer and I would come cast you down to the dogs than have you as a father you Christian FOOL/ As to my sisters if I ever lay my hands on them I'll see to it that they will go to general Federal and to their destruction. Do not write to me again you big fat fool of a Christian you gutter snipe of Satan or they will be returned unopened.

General Germania

Vivian - Commander of the Glandelinian Armies and foe of God.

Violet

Violet and her sisters kept the promise of what they would do and went to general Vivian to see what he would say or do on the matter of the condition of the house they were in. He couldn't understand their testimony of fiery hands going up or down the wall, of the black shadow thing they saw past them or of the fiery hands from the gas jets, but because of the little girls they were and so truthful, and knowing they did not dream it he was suspicious. He knew because of the wicked nature of the war that the Glandelinians carry on, place a once occupied by Glandelinian officials especially very wicked ones became absolutely devil possessed and as Violet and her sisters wouldn't tell lies even if you cut them to pieces alive and were children of as much trustworthiness as little angels in heaven themselves, he did finally believe them. They had told him that the experience had occurred before from the testimony of others and that at first they had not believed him until they had seen it themselves. Though at first they had said they would not go in again, yet they would change their minds and defy the wicked evil spirits if the general would come as a witness and also bring a priest if possible to drive out the spirits and a spirit as if it was necessary to occupy that place as their headquarters.

While waiting for the general to comply with their wish Violet said; "In one way we're glad poor brother Federal didn't come to us yet. I feel lonesome for him but he's better off that he doesn't know what we're doing. I went through and especially with the general Tomas Federal whom Jennie hit with a rock. In a letter he told us he was getting along fine but the war made such blockades that he couldn't come. So until we can give the enemy an experience he doesn't want for his and our own good it's better our dear brothers didn't come yet. Ain't that right sisters."

"Yes," said Joyce, "but how lonesome we are for him nevertheless. But God knows it is for the best."

At the appointed time (Violet declared the manifestations occurred night or day at any time but unexpected) General Vivian went to the house with Violet and her sisters, and gave orders to two regiments of boy and girl recruits each to surround the house and keep it surrounded and watch closely so that no one can get either in or out. No one was to be exempted or only the general and the little girls were to be within. Because "Who can tell," said Violet herself "That some mysterious force may be causing the phenomena through some strange art of his."

The general went in and then all closed the door. The little girls showed the room where the hands appeared, and then the gas jets in the attic. General Vivian lit the gas. It burned all right to his surprise and to of her Violet and her sisters, and no phenomena occurred. Seeing all things all right, General Vivian turned off the valves and he and they started to go.

"General," said Catherine, "You forgot to turn the gas out."

"I did turn it out," said the general.

"Well they're still burning."

"Well I'll be," said the general, "I did turn them off. You can see for yourselves. It's a phenomena all right. Who's knocking at the attic door come in."

No one answered. The knocking continued hard on the door, and all in the room heard it. It was not a slow dull knock but one like a person who is in a hurry and getting mad because you don't come and open the door. Violet opened the door and saw no one outside or down below. General Vivian himself knocked at the same part of the door from which the sound seemed to have come, but he couldn't make the same sound at all.

"Say Violet," said Joyce, "did you not poke me in the side just now?"

"I said Violet, 'Why I was not even near enough to reach you.'"

"This is getting serious," said Joyce. They listened to the knocking for a while but could come to no conclusion as to the source of the sound. Violet and her sisters now were not in the least bit nervous and said but rather defiant if not indifferent having become used to sleeping alone very often in lonesome outlandish places with him the feeble creaks elsewhere and hearing at day or night or so on all sorts of most creepy sounds, knockings, rattlings, clankings, or crawlings, and so on so that this knocking made very little impression on them. General Vivian however was a little nervous but he thought if he himself being also a holy man could bless the house in case a priest couldn't be so readily had he could do so and would then be able to commit himself to passing any judgement as to the source of knocking. Because sometimes to punish evil doers even good angels too would make mischievous man's estimation as in case of the so called "Stucco-a Clip". He pulled out a ritual to read the blessing of the house, and at the time was trying so far as he can remember to recall to his mind an account for the knocking by some kind of animal concealed somewhere in the house or by some action of the wind against the door while reading the prayer and having Violet and her sisters plausibly answer his former reason or rather suddenly became excited and with great difficulty finished it. He felt as if he had been suddenly put under some kind of exhaust pump that drained him of all his energy. He felt too as if he were injuring some one, and tears or a feeling of tears came to his eyes. He tried to conceal what happened to him by saying in a joking way to Violet and her sisters:

"Say Princesses I wonder if because of your own sufferings and hardships caused by the enemy that your own possession angels are not doing this."

"Can't be possible," said Daisy. "They wouldn't threaten to grab us by the throats with hands of fire."

"Don't you feel anything queer?"

"No we don't," said Jennie. "But you look as if you were having tears in your eyes."

At their encouragement his embarrassment left him. He sprinkled holy water in the house (not mouse) and out side in the yard and especially in the place from which the sound seemed to come. When he returned into the house he raised his hand to give the common blessing "Benedictio, Domini, Nostri, Jesu Christi, des-cendat, super-hanc domum, et maneat semper" May the Blessing of Our Lord Jesus Christ descend on this house and remain forever."

He found the same excitement come over him and the same difficulty in finishing the blessing but it was not so strong as the first time. Whatever it was gave them two hard barges and then stopped knocking but nevertheless General Viviania had a very queer feeling to which he could not explain.

On investigation of the strange performances General Viviania had said that before Violet and her sisters had entered the house he had suspected something wrong because he had seen crowds of people around the house, who claimed they did in even day time see a sort of black shadow form of something either the place and leave a strange smell behind. General Viviania believed that many Mandelinians are not possessed of the devil at times there is no lack in appearances of their being possessed... 2.22

After that day General Viviania got a priest who did the same performance as he had done and then Violet and her sisters during the progress of the battle of Mic-Calls Run found every thing all right and felt easier and began to laugh at their experience.

Two days of the last action of the battle Violet and her sisters went to the dining room to eat their supper well;

"Your Excellency Princess Violet wishes you to come to that confounded house," said a courier. "They're in trouble again. The spirit had returned."

"Good night," said General Viviania. "What's the trouble now. Girl's possession angels would make evil spirits leave them little girls alone."

"It ain't them to be mented," said the courier. "It's a boy scout they had to help them guard the place. The boy can't eat General's eleven food that Jennie cooks him."

"Why Jennie is a good cook even though a little girl. Why can't he eat. They always cook the best food for even their friends and others that they can secure. What has the spirit got to do with that?"

"I do not know your excellency. But the boy can't eat."

"Why didn't he do go out of the house then and eat."

"He did your Excellency."

General Viviania thinking something unusual had happened went out. There was a crowd around the house, house again. The people were gestulating and showing curiosity and excitement, and the boy coming out looked as if he had been scared by something.

He went in. Violet and her sisters looked dejected.

"What's the matter Violet?" he asked.

"The poor boy can't eat," she said. "As soon as he sat at the table the food flew up and hit him in the face. The darn Frankfurters I filed for him runs about the room as if alive. You can see there's a reason."

General Viviania chased the darn sausages but they got away from him. He felt like kicking the devil in the--well you know what I mean.

Finally the Frankfurters stopped in the corner and piled together one standing upright as if to defy him to get it. He reached down for it and to the surprise of the little girls it jumped up into the air and stuck to the ceiling and wouldn't come down. The others crawled up the wall... 2.2.34

Others had seen this trick of the evil spirit as it seemed to be. Again General Viviania sent for a priest and while waiting for him got a big board and tried to strike the sausages down but they all eluded his blows. As so long as the situation was horrible Violet and her sisters and when the boy could not suppress their laughter it looked so funny to see the great soldiers of chaos chasing those oblong pieces of skin covered meat and they evidently cleverly eluding him. They jumped over the chair. They would go back again in the plates. Then when he tried to catch them they would jump either on top of his head and rest there or hide in his pockets. He finally gave up the chase as they were climbing up the window pane. Finally the priest came and Father Angeloni read the prayer prayers prescribed by the Catholic Church for such cases for he had been a witness of the scene too the Frankfurters fully trying to get away from him as if frightened by his entrance, and then he blessed the house with holy water.

Strange to say though Violet and her sisters had not been to be mented. The food they ate did not fly up avoid their mouth and hit them in the face as it had the boy. The boy after that was able to eat but he wouldn't touch the meat. He was afraid they were possessed.

After this for some time nothing occupied at of the occasion except one in which Violet and her sisters reported that while in bed they were almost shaken out and when they got up and put on the lights the beds were shaking as if they had the fits.

Fearing something might happen that they would not like to see Violet and her sisters if they were determined to stay there were advised not to sleep there alone, and therefore they engaged a girl scout who was unusually holy to take up her quarters in the hall. In the dead of night the girl finally woke them up to say that two Christian officers in the hall wanted to see them concerning some plans they wanted worked out. Violet and her sisters thought it strange as they had not suggested plans to no one but nevertheless they got up, dressed and went down stairs but to their surprise could not see any one at all. The girl scout indicated where they had been standing, and described them. Violet and her sisters went up stairs again, and the girl came again in with the same story. But when they came down the strange specters had gone.

A little later they surely had some very extraordinary experiences. Their bed room not the same occupied where the hands of fire had appeared led into a passage on either side and they were awakened to hear a loud creaking sound and lighting the lights again saw the doors on to the passage swinging back and forth in unison. When they got up and grabbed the doors the motion ceased. But when they went back to bed the doors began to immediately swing again. Then a one came tramping across the floor to where the boy lay in his bed. But Violet and her sisters could not see no body. The boy stated the next morning that the finger of some unseen heavy hand pressed heavily against various parts of his head and arms while the rest of his body was burning hot with fire and other sensations the parts touched were left clammy and wringing wet with water, which he mopped up with his towel but that would get wet again and then blisters would show in those spots touched as if he had been burned by something without feeling it.

This strange occurrence made it so uneasy that Violet and her sisters brave as they were wouldn't sleep in that room again but changed to another room and slept there after blessing it themselves. There was here at this part a large double hall with rooms on either hand. Next to theirs was the very room which they had recently vacated because of the fiery hands with doors on four sides including the entrance from the main yard. The doors which connected this vacant room was always left open for the purpose of ventilation as it was so hot. But the other three doors were locked and bolted on the inside to keep out dangerous assassins and spies and the like. On the morning just when it was growing daylight and the sun was just starting to rise, Violet and her sisters were awakened by very loud knockings at the building side entrance which was the main entrance. Thinking it was a urgent call for them they began to dress but the knockings changed to loud creaking sounds which made them think that the knockings attacking Mandelinians were trying to force an entrance with rifle butts or crow bars or sledge hammers. Violet flung her shoe against the door, from which it bounced back a couple of feet or so, and the little girls fired at the door hoping to scare the supposed attackers away. As they did so the door crashed open and Violet who was closest and she sprang away to avoid being hit by it and knocked down. It was getting light outside, and they could see nothing beyond the door. Then there was a loud tramp, tramp, tramp of feet in the room next to their own and it sounded as if the door into the hall had been forced open in the same way but more roughly, as had been observed by the little girls with the door to the outside. Seizing their rifles which stood in the corner of the room they pointed it the rifles in the direction of the noise of the tramping feet and pulled the trigger. The guns did not go off. There was only a snap. Violet picked up her pivot gun and fixed the clip carefully. She pulled the trigger of that and this gun did not go off. He tried again with the same result. All noise having ceased, they hurried through their room to gain the side entrance and seek help only to find the door that they had seen crash open was now closed and locked from the inside, and nothing was broken but there was a small in the air as if rotten pus had been coming out of a horrible wound. Looking to see why her pivot gun would go off she found the cap missing and discovered it under her pillow. And she knew she had placed it securely on the gun. Only then she and her sisters realized they were not dealing with Glandelinian soldiers. Their whole seemed literally to stand on end. Violet found her hose that she had seen fall well in front of the door, actually buck against the wall, where it had been pressed when the door was open.

Violet and her sisters suspected that if these doings were not done by demons they were then caused by departed souls of Glandelinian soldiers killed in the battle. From this experience they remembered one scene they had observed when a mortally wounded Glandelinian officer had been brought to the camp who though a Glandelinian had once been a Catholic but had led the same wicked life as all the rest. Believing they could get the man to save his soul before it was too late Violet had called for a priest. He had refused the priests ministrations for a time and in accordance with the liturgy which prescribes for attendance on the dying and a flows for the distress of mind in the individual, he proceeded to give her Extreme Unction. Violet and her sisters were horrified at that time to see from the very emptiness of the air a terrible black smoking arm come round and strike the woman the priest was about to anoint with such force that he headed was dislodged from the pillow. They remembered that they had been so frightened that they screamed prayers. The priest then tried to resume his ministrations but the black arm again appeared, reached round him, and threw the soldiers from the doorway into the tent. The priest then had looked for the body to which the arm should have been attached, but found himself, and Violet and her sisters alone. At his questioning questions they told him that no one had entered the tent. Glandelinians are so awfully wicked that such things can happen. After they had gone to bed after the dreadful occurrence of the door Violet wishing to light a light to keep any strange things out of the place found that she had used up all the matches in the room, so she went off to seek a box and left it with a candle upon a table near the door of the room and lit it. Three times during the night she was awakened by some one stealthily entering the room and putting out the candle. Each time from where she lay she could just make out the figure with face everward bending over the candle, putting it out with its fingers and departing, softly closing the door behind him. Knowing that she and her sisters and the boy and girls were alone in the house, the little Vivian naturally concluded that a Glandelinian lost soul was playing a joke on her. On the first two occasions she just got up, relight the candle and went to bed again. But on the third performance of this unanny scene she felt the joke had gone far enough. Quickly she sprang from her bed with long gleaming knife in hand and rushed to the door just as it had closed behind the figure. As she reached the hall the figure vanished, but now comes the most amazing part of the story for on returning to her room where her sisters were sleeping soundly the little girl found her match box doing all sort of crazy antics and while this was going on she was shocked by a thunderous knocking again at the door which awoke her sisters with a scream. The noise changed to a crashing sound as though one of the doors would be knocked from its hinges. The three of them did fly open and one of them almost struck Violet's bed and before they were even the door was shut, and not only was it locked and bolted on the inside, and not a splinter was away.

Violet and her sisters were of course were brave and even braver enough usually not to even fear anything like spirits and the like but they had never expected such demonstrations as these. Then only an hour after the second door occurrence Violet alone her sisters being asleep now was annoyed by some thing of human shape but large and tall appearing at the door of her room in the shape and appearance of fire. It appeared to be made of fire and it was as she saw of it, and said no words and when she screamed to it to go away and leave her alone it appeared meekly and promptly to obey and went away. Then after that night two ordinary blessings of the house had no effect. The strange fiery apparition continued on unchecked during the very day time and once occurred while they were eating their dinner and acted as if it evidently wanted to sit down and eat with them. It threw great heat too and this time at the commands of Violet and her sisters to go away it paid not the slightest attention but did not dare as it seemed to come too near them to molest them and appeared afraid. Violet finally went to a priest and the priest upon going to the house and questioning the little girls asked them the details, and told them to show him the places where the repeated fiery apparitions stood, and wanted to know why though it appeared it seemed to be in such distracted terror of them. That they couldn't explain.

As Violet and her sisters were very honest and had no delusions the priest understood for sure that there was no feeling about the story and no contradiction in it. The priest blessed the house, and told the little girls to wear the big crucifixes he gave them, and to have it show especially at the time of the apparitions. What struck the priest as strange was that though he knew the story was a fact they were not much terrified. But when a special blessing was employed the apparition still continued but not in their room any more. The strange thing was when spoken to the even spirit if it was one who wouldn't answer but would look at them in stark terror and some times do as they command, and other times pay no attention to their screamed commands. They asked once: "Are you for, Hell or Purgatory?" and it wouldn't answer a word. "The priest on the occasion of the afternoon asked the little girls; "Are you really angel possessed?" "We don't know for sure," said Violet. "Symptoms are that it may be so according to what they tell us. Many many believe we are because of what we accomplish for our cause no one else can do with success and even escape. We feel strange too at times as if we get attacks of unnatural happiness. Therefore our faith makes us believe we must be, but we do not believe we can prove it."

"Then if you are why don't the evil spirit leave you alone?" "They do that work at a distance. They never come near us not even near our bed. That flaming apparition seems frightfully scared of us."

It seemed so unusual to the priest that he did believe for a time that it was something else and said:

"Could it not be those angels that possess you?"

"No could it be the?" said Jennie. "The first day we were here the spirits hurried at us hands of fire and tried to grasp us by the necks. And oh they were terribly hot."

"Maybe those angels are just trying you."

"Maybe."

"Maybe."

"It's a funny trial," then exclaimed "Violet," "but we are game and we're going to stay here until they drive us out by force. But surely it cannot be the angels. Listen to that. It's broad day light and yet the shutters are rattling dreadfully."

The shutters were being rattled indeed but the priest said;

"But that could be the wind."

They looked out but there was no wind blowing. They remembered too that smiling that no moving mysterious persons seemed to be throwing stones, into the window and that in this country boys would never think of plaguing little girls. Little girls are scared to boys there and once a boy falls in love with a girl the love is so sincere that it cannot be accounted for. They even told that early that night before the apparition of the lighting and putting out of the candle some mysterious person emptied water on them while in bed.

"Do you know the owner of this house?" asked the priest. "Yes," said Violet. "When we first came to occupy this place she told us it was a sort of 'haunted house' but we wouldn't believe her as we do not believe in such trash as ghosts and ghosts. But these are not ghosts and neither is this house haunted. It is the work of evil spirits. I'm sure trying to drive us out."

The priest decided to stay here and see for himself whether the manifestation really occurred. He had the bed he was to occupy placed across the floor in front of the door leading to the woman's bedroom room for he believed the woman who owns the house was either playing tricks to try and frighten the little girls to see how brave they really were or she did things through some strange form of insanity. He before going to bed investigated the gable jet in the attic examined the wall of the room where the thunders where the hand of fire appeared and found every thing okay. However he did not like the smell that was in the attic. Though the priest slept there for about a month in the bedroom he often heard foot steps walking up and down the steps and came to the conclusion that probably Violet and her sister were asleep in their sleep and while doing so dreamed of the strange manifestations. What he saw coming up the steps froze as to say every drop of blood in his veins. He quickly made the sign of the cross but the apparition came on a fierce tall human form as of fire hedges to behold and something from its back taking the form of wings. It however stopped only within a few yards of the priest and then seeing him stopped. It stood there for a time while the priest looked in terror at it. The strange apparition said never a word but at sight of the priest did not disappear as he expected it do but finally turned and went back down the steps. He gathered the impression that the spirit wanted to get into the bedroom of the little girls but his presence had stopped it.

The next morning before breakfast time the priest asked the little girls to take him before the Land lady.

"Do you my dear lady own this house whom the princesses are occupying temporarily as your headquarters?"

"Yes Father I do."

"Do you desire them to be here since being princesses and occupying this place as their army headquarters they have nothing for which to pay us rent?"

"Father, the idea I wouldn't take a cent from them if they made me. They're as welcome here as seven little angels would be. Why are they afraid I'll demand rent?"

"No my dear lady but they're tormented by spirits here."

"Why Father I just bought this house some few days before they came. It must be they dream that."

"Well then, dreamed too," he said. "I saw a terrible fiery apparition last night. Were you not ever troubled at night?"

"I heard lots of strange noises last night Father but not in my room. A door but open as if by some great violence but after it went closed again I doubted it to a strong inward and then outward draught of air."

But I couldn't account for it Father. The doors had been securely locked on the inside as the little girls ordered."

"I'm sorry then," said the priest with a sort of twinkle in his eyes but at first I thought you were playing mysterious tricks on them to see how really brave they were."

"From what I heard Father that would not be necessary. But Father when I came home last night why did you as I started to enter my home take me by the arm and lead me into the house and depart without a word. I like politeness and wished to thank you."

"What time did that happen?"

"About eight o'clock."

"I didn't come here until they sent for me at two o'clock this morning."

"You were not here at eight o'clock?"

"No my dear lady, wasn't I came here because not only from manifestations but the dear little girls were tormented if not frightened by noises of various kinds and of a haunting character, but mainly by strange footsteps climbing the stairs and that is not always at night but even when the sun is shining its brightest at day time. Then the manifestations are even more so."

"Well Father I'm sorry but I do think the delirious spies are doing that sort of thing. Did the little girls ever suffer from those things elsewhere?"

"Yes, but not so prolonged as this."

That following night however Violet and her sister went to bed with a light left on so that in case the spirits were afraid of a light they would not come in the room. As for herself that is Jennie did not sleep, but her sister finally got asleep. Soon she heard loud pounding foot steps coming toward her closed door, then in through the door and across to the washstand which stood in the way to her bed. She sat up and saw that something was wrong though she could see nothing.

"Where the?" she shrieked. "Sisters wake up. Something in the room room." Her sister was awakened, and then the ghost of spirit whatever it was seemed to be washing in the washbasin. Jennie got up and tried to take away the washbasin. The spirit seemed to firmly hold onto the washbasin as Jennie screaming held to it, and then it flopped the washbasin forward and the little girl and splashed the water into the child's face and all over her and slowly departed. Jennie had to remove her wet night gown dry herself and put on a clean one. Her sister had seen the whole performance and placed and lit a blessed candle and placed it by the washstand but this time left no water in it. The spirit later came again, and poured water in the basin but seemed to keep a great distance from the candle.

"Get out of here" Violet who was then awake "screamed and she hurried a stone which she had under her pillow in the direction of the sound. The next morning, Joice told her sisters she saw a very interesting experience in the night. A number of times she had been awakened from a sleep, although not roused by noises."

"What happened?" asked Jennie.

"Why when I turned over on my side I believe I screamed with fright for it seemed as if I turned over on another body, much bigger than her self and it then in fright of its own disappeared. I was afraid to go to sleep again."

"I was awakened by a so suffocating feeling last night," said Catherine. "and found something invisible pressing down on my shoulders and body and enveloping me and then in fright of its own disappeared."

"Shall we stand for this any more and go out or shall we give in," said Daisy.

"Why?" asked Violet. "Are you getting scared pale as death?"

"Not exactly but what are the spirits are they are certainly determined to drive us out for they oppose our presence here."

"Suppose it is only our own imaginations doing this to try us," exclaimed Hattie.

"Impossible," said Argeline decidedly. "They wouldn't abuse us like that."

"Then why did one manage to get in my bed," said Joice.

"And another try to suffocate me," said Catherine.

"Angels to try their friends can do all sorts of pranks," declared Jennie. "Therefore said to me one day angels may do something to try our faith in them. If they are demons then why don't they go away. They won't for us, the priest is over one."

"An," declared Violet. "Good angels would not torment us like that, and why do they mostly avoid us and do their actions at a distance. See how that fire human form was deathly scared of us. I believe the thing was scared of the angels, with us. They're demons all right trying to drive us out. I vote we go. Why stand it? Any longents have not had a decent night a sleep since we came to this accursed house. We could pay the woman the value of the house and move and have it blown up."

Joice shook her head.

"The spirit spirits would prevent that," said she. "Vote we try another night and day. Then if the priest can't help us we'll go and seek some where else and let the crazy things have the old house."

"For one," said Jennie vote that we won't go. It is not us but the spirits that go. We won't give in to them. That wouldn't be right and they'll think we are afraid. I vote we stay and win out."

"Suppose the spirits fire the house and drive us out that way."

"Well we'll stay until they do. Then and only then will we admit we have to go, but if they do they burn down their own abode."

So it was decided.

As they entered the building Violet said: "Sometimes fear at our troubles may be delusions or that something must be wrong with us through all we went through."

"How comes then the priest sees the same thing?" asked Jennie.

"He never told us he did. Don't you realize how seriously he often questions us. I know by his looks he believes we are only imagining things and therefore think something. I don't want to think too harshly about ourselves but wonder if we are not going insane."

"That's ridiculous," said Joice. "How about the water being thrown on us. did we imagine or dream that?"

"I believe we did think of it," said Violet.

"If we are so sure we dream it or are losing our minds why not question the priest and see if he really saw anything wrong. We can consent with his mind and read it as he explains. If he did see then he would deny and you can tell for sure whether we're seeing delusions or not."

"But suppose he would not wish to tell us to feel we'll be frightened."

"Then let him do us his will. I'll have the priest summoned."

"Do"

Violet called to one of the boy scouts and told him to bring the priest they had in the house the night before."

The boy obeyed, and the priest was more nervous than ever but he was more cheerful than ever when Violet and her sister greeted him as their formal selves and then confessed:

"Father I and my sisters not all of them though believe we were only having delusions."

"Delusions," said the priest, and they saw his surprised look.

"You Father and delusions."

"Violet thinks that," Violet said, "that she, and us, are losing our minds and in that condition think we are seeing things and believe the house is possessed."

For a time the priest stood at the open window saying nothing, not even so much as thinking so that though they consented that they had nothing.

Finally he turned. "Pardon me," he finally said, "I must say you are the bravest little girls in the world."

"The bravest little girls in the world," Father, who you are just saying that to cheer us up and make us forget our sorrows and troubles."

"No I am not," he said decidedly. "A house possessed like this and you dare be main and fight it out. But look out girls. They'll drive you out yet. I know it unless God wills otherwise. They can try fire and phenomenal fire too, fire that makes great heat and would destroy you but would not consume the house."

"Well only then we'll get out," said Jennie.

"But unless you are really angel possessed you'd be destroyed before you can get out because the whole place could go up at once. But I don't believe you are unless there is proof. For if you are these friends if they are friends couldn't do this. Where is your brother Peter?"

"In Father's army helping Father," said Violet.

"Did he ever write since by these war circumstances you and he were separated?"

"You'd be surprised," Father said. "We have forty letters already and we sent as many."

"Does he know about your condition as angel possessed?"

"He said he saw symptoms but won't tell us what they are."

"But then why do every body say we are?" "Put in Violet." "We don't even know that that means. Yet there are many children in our country that are Father and enough to manifest it too. Could you describe any symptoms Father if you know them. Have you had any experience with those who are?"

"No little girls," he said. "I know a priest who did and I should have him examine you. If you really are then you'll never come to harm and could say you are brave because 'landelinians have done more to you and can do more to you than these spirits and yet you are not scared of them. The reason I have heard that you are angel possessed, is because no many no matter what you do or try to do and no matter how risky it is you do not know what failure is, and you know it is in the end God help the Glandelinians who captured you. Many have tried to do less than you have and never succeeded not even the powerful Gemini."

"But Father couldn't you think of some matter of the situation. Couldn't you think of some symptom that could show we are. If we are we would thank God gratefully and never need to be afraid of anything no matter how often we would be captured in the future." "I can tell one thing, and that is these spirits hardly don't come near us. They operate at a distance."

"But one tried to suffocate me last night," said Catherine.

"Yes and you said that he went faster from you than he came," declared Violet.

"Shall I send for the priest?" asked the other priest.

"Not until we are sure," said Violet. "Sometimes we believe slick showed and off-offy Glandelinians can do this by assuming the make up of friends."

"I think so too," said Violet sister. "There could be a cunning human agency to it."

"Do not let the guards watch carefully as no body approaches the house," asked the priest.

"I never questioned the guards, and yet they don't act as if they were saw anything," said Violet. "Sometimes Glandelinians are slick enough to pass them. They have fooled us too sometimes when we did guard duty."

"But how about that flame assuming the shape of a man," said Catherine. "That was real unless it was only a delusion," said the priest. "We all know you little girls individually and without exception you are little girls who are characterized by sound judgment. You are a practical practical little girls and cannot imagine these things. You are rather very much phlegmatic than otherwise and have in each case shifted every possible natural cause as an explanation."

"Then is it really all hallucination or is there some strange memeric influence at work against us as more than one occult has suggested in connection with Glandelinian trickery," asked Violet. "Of course in have we here in this house a modern recrudescence of the diabolism which we make every effort at explanation by natural causes?"

"That I cannot tell, but if I tell you one thing you'll think I am crazy," said the priest.

"What then are we to think," said Jennie almost fearfully to think of the accounts that we believe we have witnessed if they are not delusions, as we call ourselves and the only reliable witnesses except the boys and girls as well as our own personal experiences which defy finding recorded in the Scriptures?"

"Taking the cases cited as a group,--the collected evidence," said the priest, "I feel compelled to acknowledge that we are dealing with some preternatural agencies of forces, call them what you will, to gain the ends of course Glandelinian spies practice all sorts of tricks almost to the nature of magic, but I do not believe they are the direct or immediate cause of the mysterious happenings, unless the power of this house is strangely insane through appearing normal and does these things half itself with some preternatural influence on the part of Glandelinian spies. I would appeal to me and you little girls too as being very repugnant to Glandelinian and the angels too in the ordinary course of human events, although it might be permitted on rare occasions."

"I know," said Violet, "and for His Own Good purposes God may permit it at times some friend of Satan to exercise preternatural if not supernatural power. But this is not the ordinary course of events. But this isn't the first time of place we have had this sort of preternatural scenes. One place was so terrible it seemed death to stay there. Certainly all the phenomena which we ourselves have been able to study and witness in houses outside not in a single instance have I or my sisters found the slightest indication that the happenings were invoked by a single human being, and strange too though they occurred by night, they were more often and worse by day even in the brightest sunlight. And so called fake ghosts would only operate by night and near midnight and a sort of raid of any light. If this directing force is really diabolic Father then I believe His Infinite Majesty may be seemingly if not directly conducting operations in person if not aided by his spiritual followers and not at the behest of any of his servants who among the wicked Glandelinians, and Father, the most terrible experiences we have among Glandelinians is when we are prisoners is that so many of them are really possessed by demons and under the influence of the evil spirits I saw them running wild in the woods or in camp, climb trees and work the most fearful from ropes and fetters with which their comrades have sought to restrain them, and they have been frightfully terrified of us and at sight of us would scream and run away like mad. That is the reason we found the place here in possession. Of course if it is only an optical illusion then something is wrong with us."

"That is not so," said the priest. "I can tell insane persons by their eyes be because I had as many. When you are insane you'll look it any person could see it in the second facial expression. In and among Glandelinians devil to ship as you know yourselves in is in great voice and the evil one is allowed in various parts of Glandelinian jurisdiction to take the way of material manifestations, that even dreadful numbers of obsessions similar to those of Holy Spirit occur from time to time even among the Glandelinian people too. They even say you were a foe that Tomas Federal whom you Jennie hit with a stone is dominated by evil spirits and once this was his headquarters. Did you not know it girls?"

"Yes we took it from him recently. But we didn't expect phenomena." "It is my conviction," said the priest, "that all this is by permission of Almighty God, perhaps as punishment for dealing with the devil and fighting for the unholy cause of the Glandelinians are doing and for the usual attendant vices and massacre of children, or perhaps again as a mere time of warning to others."

"But why don't they leave us alone and go out of this house," said Violet. "They want the place and try to drive you out. When the atmosphere as you know little girls has been properly saturated with electricity we may expect a good thunder storm or even blizzard depends the time of the year, with all its disturbances of wind and rain, or blinding snow. So too once any amount of wicked Glandelinians have created that might call a diabolic atmosphere in any district or within a house or houses once occupied by wicked Glandelinians, when his communications with the devil have given him some God standing in the spirit of the devil life of the community, and how much which is the devil which is the wicked society has firmly established in the place which is the place of the wicked demonology and need not be surprised if the power of evil will begin to manifest itself and will do so with all the more no matter how much each place of communications, good as you are you will never change them as if we do not be able to do so so readily and "I have Christian friends and hope that the people of the community truly feel in all that the Lord has done for them that they would go. Better you go and leave them stay here."

Q Did you spend one night with us Father did you see anything like we as did?"

"I saw it withfully I saw a human shape of fire. I was rooted to the spot with my right. It came up the steps and then I heard 'Why I didn't see fire to anything it stepped on was a mystery to me. It gave me halted looked at me for about three or four minutes, and then went toward your room but didn't go in. It went back down the steps after giving me one long searching look. I made the sign of the Cross and strange it had no effect."

"... "Gaul it not have been a soul ! Pit-tat-tat-tat Punga to y.?" asked violet.
"o"said the priest."It had fiery wings the shape altho was that of a bat or Dragon."

"Father - are you trying to kid me?"

"Then little girls are you trying to kid me. you want money was the name to me."

Violat and heavilister is looked at each other "Oa-ah-his are a all night" said violat. "O- I do hope we are angel possessed.
Father got that priest will you please if he knows about these things and and have him examine us-----" he in the world there is a great stone. "little
"It came for a moment side through the window."

"Some boy maybe signalling to you that way," said Police. "You know that is our agreement to them."

"They looked out. It was black as night but there was no boy in sight. "I can't get him for some more days," he said. "I'll go and have him looked up but if you have any more, I would send for me and I'll bring several others and all the holy things that is necessary. I'll try to put them out or I can't you better seek headquarters elsewhere."

It was the next day that the same police got a notice blocking such use.

He was called again to the headquarters for it was apparent that this time the spirits had been tormenting the lives out of the little girl as to say and that often times during the night despite the -bores she had not been able to stay within unless they desired to be seriously injured. Their head quarters had been roughly treated to a tremendous shower of stones of all

...s had been roughly treated to sides and the little girls showed the black and blue marks left by the stones. The priest Father John found every window pane in the building broken. Violet described how when the stones came through the window windows they even swung, and deflected to strike them even when they were not in the path of the stones, and also struck their clock, and other ornaments and even religious statues and all their possessions in sight.

The extraordinary thing was that Violet and her sisters had been hit by the stones even while in their beds. For their beds were covered by the

the other even while in the room. Even while he came and it was dark yet the priest saw a perfect fusillade as it one throwing from invisible hands as it seemed and with which his visit was rewarded. He believed glances and spies were doing this, and ordered his priest and members to open fire on the tormentors with their pistols. They obeyed him but their pistols wouldn't go off, and to their surprise he thought that they knew a minute before as they

They found the cartridges back in the bait when they knew a minute before they had taken them out to load the pistols. However it being dark the priest was unconvinced and told the little girls that it is better for them to not remain in the house any longer. He promised to come by day and see what he could do and told them to remain in a tent not too far from the house. They left the other two children again to sleep decided to do so and therefore while the others tried again to sleep, two of them remained on guard to watch proceedings, and made huge camp fires with all the rubbish that could be prepared so there would be light enough to see any one approaching the house. To their surprise stones hit them from unknown quarters, and now seemed to come from the house. The tent itself was unharmed. Was there a cunning human spy agency behind it all, two one not even the guards could explain it at all.

By the next morning while awaiting the arrival of the priest, Mrs. Jones and her sisters were being up examined the house as much as they dared. They took the chances of going in, and saw piles of stones in all the rooms. When the land lady and her family were driven out and what struck the little girl in the stomach and true was that the poor woman and her husband and three little girls and one boy were really terrified beyond their wits, so much that they were concerned for the boy and the little girls lest they become deranged by fright, and they were covered with many bleeding wounds made by the stones and the woman had a black eye. They made the father tell the details about their experience of the stone throwing, and then warned them that it is best that they not occupy the place again.

 "The little girls are going back again" asked the woman.

"I should say not," said Violet. "Those stones may be repeated. We're all bruised for we were hit by a perfect shower of stones as we ran out and they seemed to come from every direction. Unless the priest can stop it we're going to have that house blown up as soon as we can get men ner'vy enough to move our belongings. If not we'll do it ourselves."

Violet and her sisters could see that the three little girls and the boy was living in an agony of great fear of stark terror. The mother appeared to be a very nervous person and the Vivian girls had first suspected her for a while with terrorizing her children, and trying to terrorize them, but the fact that the whole family was so very seriously bruised and cut by the stones showed that there was something extraordinary. The priest when he came asking the condition of the woman and her husband and her children questioned them for details. Still the priest believed that Cardinalian culprits did that Glendelinian spies in disguise and believed now and for good that they did all the manifestation to drive the Princesses out of the room and that by some electrical trick they may have formed the fiery men to scare the little girls, and the fiery hands too, but soon he got a surprise. While standing in an open place he and the whole bunch were routed from where they were standing when a great shower of stones came at them as if blown to them by a terrific cyclone and yet there was not even a feeling of a breeze. The stones came from every direction and though at large now all the stones failed to touch Violet and her sisters they pummeled the woman and her children and the poor priest unmercifully so that he couldn't even give a blessing of the territory. It was a dreadful shower of stones and showed that it did not come from the house either simultaneously; the house was bombarded too and with a shower of awful big rocks. Finally after they had been so miraculously missed Violet was struck in the back of the head by a big stone and melted and fell being knocked almost senseless. Then the shower suddenly stopped. As soon as it was believed that the extraordinary demonstration was over the priest ran and over the yards and open ground, and within the building the service of exorcism and blessed the scene of this extraordinary occurrence.

Yat a second night he saw this creature repeated when "101" + and her sisters had gone into the building balcony all was well, they were a showered in their bed room with big stones this time even the size of bricks but not one hit the little girls.

The next day came with out further adventure and the little girls still maintained the same headquar headquar ters.

"BANG. The door of the big room flew open. At this time they had had with them a big bunch of boys and girls, some of whom they were telling of the strange manifestations, very little had in the room twisted around and saw the doorway filled with the powerful figure of a man that appeared to be about twenty eight years old or more, whose face was a split color, not human, he acted and looked like one.

He took at him one of the child's own whipsawed. He held a long shot gun in his hands, and he was pointing it right at Jennie. Was this only a joke if you know it was too frightful. He appeared to point it at any one even if you know it wasn't loaded. But indeed his face did not look as if he was joking. It was filled with the corners of his mouth drawn down, the eyes a movent and malevolent and wicked looking and demoniac. All the hands for all the heads turned back to see if the Vivian girls would take it as a joke but their pretty faces were white, their jaws had dropped, and their eyes were round and staring with terror but they had drawn their own weapons. The child scarce thinking nothing would happen had not brought their own weapons. Their heads revolved again and the doors with slow but heavy tread the man advanced steadily toward the Vivian girls, that market still held on the little girls. Two slow strides and there there was a thump from the front of the room.

At times and then there was a thump. He didn't approach any farther but also looked at mid-Violet and her sisters knew what had happened, knew unless their possession of guard-dian Annila helped them, how they were doomed, but in the face of death their thoughts were for their child scout for them, Violet and her sisters were more like a sister into their lord and his secret friends. If Violet and her sisters should uncover a way to dodge the figure would shoot for men where he was and then a reading shot would probably strike some of those little heads in the way. It was a pity, it was thick and forward and even if they could actually see through it, not shoot at it, themselves would be in vain.

It appeared so dreadful and so frightening at these words but the woman came no nearer of comfort that dreadful staring, flitting face, a very horrible expression to show that her plan had been foiled and she added a warning to the child again:

"Run, Run, run outside girls and boys. You can't hurt it is a Demon in human form. Save yourselves."

Not one of them moved. They wanted to more than ever, but they couldn't for they were too frightened too. They too could see it was a spirit for it could be seen through and through. It was also again in that fiery man. The rifle he held was no spiritual one though. It was a real true big Glandelinian musket. On came the man with the gun slow and queer, like a machine until Violet and her sisters saw that should he fire now the last of the child scouts should be out of range. Then the instinct of self preservation asserted itself. Too late to run, the little girls made a pathetic attempt to hide crouching behind a tall long bench. That futile last hope was in their minds nobody will know. They prayed desperately though they perhaps thought the strange thing would not kill them in that helpless position with their backs turned or it may be merely that they could not bear to see what was to happen. But the child scouts saw. They watched him slowly and methodically as if he were killing a cornered rat in a cart ridge for each little girl.

It was apparently that the poor little girls heard the sound of the cart ridges being placed in the gun and understood it meant that they might have a man and a saved themselves, because until that moment the gun had not been really loaded. In a choking voice voice screamed to the children to run. But they were frozen all but their eyes, which saw the spirit place the gun to his shoulder and get ready to aim at Violet first, and then pause.

The pause was not probably as long as they remembered it but long enough for most of the youngsters to begin to believe he wasn't going to do it after all. Then came the concussion of the gun so deafeningly fired in that enclosed space that it made their ears ring. Also it broke the spell. Like a flock of startled birds they scattered at the sound, (not into the air) but all over the place some hiding under the beds, and others dashing out the door. Through their own confusion they saw eight figures moving swiftly except one which was slow, the spirit with his smoking gun and Violet and her sisters. Perhaps it was a joke after all and the wicked spirit had not shot her but did that to terrify her sisters. Those of the children who got outside saw Violet run outside the house and disappear around the right side of the building. She was followed by the figure with the same set face and slow strides. The strange man seemed to have been looking for her but he turned right instead of left, with the result that Violet met the specter whatever it can be called face to face at another corner of the house. Again there was an explosion which sent the children fleeing from the building in panic like a flock of startled sparrows. By the time a swarm of soldiers and two priests rushed to the scene, they found Violet miraculously unhurt and the strange thing gone, but the rifle was lying on the ground.

"That's what you little girls get for staying in such a house" said Father John. "Get up" said the other priest. "If they went off they could be considered cowardly. Instead it's up to us to drive the demons out of that house. If it can't be done to day I it must be blasted by cannon fire then."

Violet's sisters testified as to the nature of the thing. "Father" she said between sobs "It first came in the doorway as a man with a gun in his hand and then became that fiery creature once no more. He tried twice to shoot Violet but I don't know how she escaped. Honest there is the gun lying there. When the child scouts were panic stricken. They'll tell you." "I believe you" said the two priests knowing they wouldn't like a lie. He looked at Violet for a moment with a faint cry of despair she had tottered back and few steps and fell at the second shot. He was examined by a surgeon who came up but there was not a single bullet wound on her any where. It seemed extraordinary. It was impossible to examine whether the bullets were black or deadly once because the breech lock would not open under the strongest fingers and when one tried to shoot it off at a target to their surprise they couldn't even pull the trigger. Two the gun seemed to have a strange pulsive feeling about it that made the man throw the gun down in abject terror. Violet had not fainted she at first was in too much fright to rise for fear of meeting the dreadful creature.

A little later Father John said after poor Violet had been quieted down, "This is a sort of condition of that house which it takes more than us priests to do anything for. If you little girls are so good and really are Angel possessed and can't sent these phenomena out yourselves it is beyond our skill also. I just got word from your brother James, a civilian who wrote to me that you and your sisters must not occupy this dangerous house any longer unless these manifestations can be stopped. Though if you are really Angel possessed I do not know why these manifestations occur. Why they torment you and your sisters so dreadfully. I have here the priest who is supposed to examine and mine you though, doubt if you are in a condition for it now. But, sternly insist insist do not go in there again. You may really be killed for those evil spirits if so they are more determined to drive you little girls out, then you are determined to stay in. If they envelope the place suddenly with Phenomenum fire you'll be lost for that fire though it would not consume the house could destroy your lives. God's sake keep out please, implore a you."

Violet and her sisters decided that it was best to take the priest's advice until by some means the priest can clear the house of evil spirits. At first though they thought it would be cowardly and letting the evil ones get the best of them for the first time. But for the fact that the strange occurrences happened despite even the holy water and the crucifixes in the room and sacred pictures and images confounded them and these were blessed too.

"I almost believe it is our possession agents trying our bravery" said Violet after a thought. "Absolutely impossible" said the other priest who was to examine them. "Angels of heaven do not do such diabolic things as that. You must understand little girls that despite all religious things the demons can work at a distance. I had a possessed woman once whom the devil remained with even when I brought and placed her on the very altar within whose Tabernacle was the Sacred Host. Demons won't go you know unless our prayers cause God to command them to go. We alone can do nothing against the wicked powers of darkness. If your saying is true that the things threw stones at you then it sure was no angel from heaven. Though it seems strange to me that you could come to all this when so many speak about you being Angel possessed. Do you little girls believe you are?"

"Yes" said Violet. "Our other pen rod can prove it." "I believe they are" said the other priest "because otherwise they could not have contested against these manifestations in any large way." "Then to see what is wrong they must take the nerve to reoccupy the place longer" said the other priest. "I have sent for two Bishops and three other priests and the best thing I believe is to have a Mass said in this place every morning. If that don't stop the phenomenon then it is God's will they must abandon the place. But then warning signs must be placed up so other people will stay away from there."

"When are you going to examine us?" asked Violet. "I need your brother here too if possible," said the priest. "I don't believe he will or could come" said Jennie "not just now anyway."

"Why?" "Every path way and communication to here is blocked by the enemy. Passage in this direction is inaccessible."

"Can't you write to him and try?" asked the priest? "We can do that and no more," said Violet. "The fact is we can't even get to him, and we wonder how he succeeds in corresponding to us and we to him. Two of our letters so far did not reach him but others did. One of his didn't either." After going to their room Violet herself sat at the writing desk, and the two priests stood on either side of her each holding a blessed candle and a crucifix to shield her from a phenomenon as she wrote.

Christian a my section near, is called, run!

April the 2th.

"Dear brother Pen rod, please excuse my rotten paper and pencil but I'm anxious to get this to reach you and will write in in the code form you know so well. Since coming here it seems even though you make think it is a joke or that I'm dreaming that, and my sisters are at night possessed by devils, and at day by angels and devils together. We took possession of a old brick house owned by a woman and believe me while am writing there are two priests standing beside me to guard me again against the phenomenon. The confounded house is possessed by the powers of darkness and they won't leave us alone. The priests wishes that I should notify you to come if list it is possible. Violet is quite sure by your methods you could get here through the dreadful barrier. You can get here by acting from one Glandelinian a my us Angel a delusion. The priest though wants to find out whether we are really Angel possessed and wants to get details from you and records of our experiences during the war if you need papers to get into the enemy's lines go to your friend Sister Rose. She is quite sure she could help you out fine. These papers can be secured from the genuine who know how to make them out. You could get them from Rodney Graves if he felt so inclined. If not I'm quite sure they could be gotten from either Daguerre or Schoeder without a great deal of trouble. Then you can get through as quickly as possible. Come quick if you can as we need you badly."

"You dear best sisters."

The letter was sent by special telegraph and fortunately it reached the brother who was then engaged with his father the previous when he read that message he did not know what to make of it. He however did not show it to his father on being questioned but said:

"The letter doesn't state much but they are in trouble with a possessed house. It was once Federal headquarters the one Jennie told me in the letter she wrote whom she struck with a stone. I don't doubt there would be because of these Glandelinians father there are many such situations. I got driven out of one once and you know it. I don't know how I can get to them. But I'll try. I'll send them a telegram however right away."

"Do sent telegraph, Vivian," and try to reach my daughter. They'll feel more protected with you with them. It's too bad they were separated from you even though it was only for less than a month."

"I'll go as Keldob" said Penrod. "But first I'll write and give them advice."

Violet and her sisters only two hours after mind you got this telegram: telegraph]

"My friend Esther has seen a great number of places which suffered the same trouble did our sisters. If there is any ailment which is making the strange condition more pronounced I would advise would advise dear little angels for your sakes and mine set up a big crucifix at the head foot and sides of your beds and you will not be molested. Otherwise if that does not any good do not occupy such a place. Put it down or blow it up or do as the priest suggests. I do wish you had not gone in the old man afraid there was something wrong with you enemy general comes Federal which has caused this strange condition about that house. Please give yourselves a fighting chance and keep out. You can't fight evil spirits physically. I'll try to reach you and your dear sisters to me now. I'll come as Keldob. I have the papers."

Your dear loving brother Penrod."

While awaiting the arrival of Penrod the priests and others made a complete examination of the whole house seeing it had only three sleeping chambers one kitchen and a bath room. In the bathroom though the facets all were all right and the water not off no water would come. The attic also was examined and the gas jets lighted but no manifestations occurred there now. They examined the big hole in the wall but saw no strange red glow. They had heard the most serious and persistent of the strange phenomena was the fiery man and the dreadful banging open of the doors. Violet and her sisters pointed out the doors, and the priest suggested that all doors should be heavily guarded by strong men within and without so that if there was again the phenomena they should report it immediately.

The priest then wrote to one of the high headquarters but they could give little advice without examining the house and said that they could not come now. The priest then appealed to general Blain night engineer help.

"It cuts no loss what ails the house," wrote the general. "I will send men that will look into the affair. They will find what is wrong and know what to do. In the meantime advise the priestesses to make a great distance between themselves and that possessed house. I will see to it that other priests will help you with great pains to find out what is wrong. The best thing to do is for you and your friend to stay with the girls if they won't go out and have plenty of hot water ready in case the fire apparatus appears again and then throw it at it. That ought to lay him."

On others who were informed about the situation believed that Violet and her sisters were losing their minds through their hardships and should be taken care of. They believed that the poor little girls were overburdened with their horrors and were fighting a losing battle against insanity. Most persons they wrote can believe they see the most horrible things when they are losing their minds. But any one who knew about insane persons could tell easily that they were all right and the priests wrote back that the phenomena was real because Father John and even general Vivian himself had witnessed them especially with the Frankfurthers.

Penrod did not come at the time he had wrote he would if from the fact that he was for the time not able to come at all, but since the display of the spirit with the gun nothing happened for several nights and days.

The third night however it is doubtful if any fiction would despite myself would hope to make readers believe that a human or other character would do to little girls what apparently one or more of the spirits actually did that night. According to the usual custom of the little girls seeing nothing further they happened and that the spirits seemed now to either have gone or were behaving themselves, went to bed early as they decided to do some early scouting on the enemy the following morning. It was a pitch dark night and unusually severe heat but the place was in such a pitch dark night the heat was so unusual that they left no windows open with the purpose to keep out so uncomfortable a warmth depending on the chinks and cracks in the old building for sufficient ventilation. Taking Penrod's advice each little girl placed a crucifix at the respective places of their beds. About nine o'clock the priest himself who had remained went to bed in one of the down stairs rooms turning the gas light very low. Nobody at first could have convinced any of these priests that even a fiendish spirit would be a spiritual heat less enough to molest the house that night as was to be done. Therefore just as the two priests were going to sleep, Father John was a bit slow in responding to voices statement that she smelled something like a chloroform but at once. But when she choked and her sisters too and began to vomit, he sat up, got a vial of it himself, and going through the house hastily threw open all the doors and windows. Only however, voice was made slightly ill by the mysterious smell but she recovered in about half an hour.

"I wonder what it was and who in the world could sneak up to our rooms and squirt some thing like gas into our building and why?" asked Violet who now was a little afraid to go to bed again. "Could it be again the strange phenomena?"

At first the priest believed that this time it was not but some crafty human being, and that the real seemed to be no motive but that of the designs of a hidden and disguised Glandelinian spy, and yet apparently if it was not a hellish creature again it was nevertheless appeared the gas had an assistant. They looked out side for marks on the ground for if any one had been doing it from the outside there would be some tell tale marks on the dusty ground but nothing could be seen and there was no odor outside. At first too it was believed that it might be some Glandelinian spy who lived close by and who may be so familiar with the construction of the building in case he was a man with general Federal as to be able in the dark without hesitation to apply the gassing apparatus to some crack or hole in the wall or window, which lets the gas into the sleeping quarters. But a search of the very house showed too there was nothing missing not even a map or a book or anything not even writing material.

Twice that night too the phantom if it was one was seen once shot at and the man who fired aimed straight at it and even Heaven knows didn't miss and he was horrified to see the shot took no effect. Violet then at the attack had heard a faint sizzling sound and then came a sickly sweet smell and for those caught a sudden agony of gas poisoning. None of the victims so far had died. Only once it so happened to Violet and her sisters and voice had got the most benefit of the dreaded gas. Yet this night nothing unusual had been seen or heard and they were at a loss to guess how the strange gas had gotten into the house. One of the girls sent a messenger who brought Colonel Lemonia to the scene. When the colonel arrived the last trace of the gas had disappeared and Violet and her sisters had suddenly felt almost ashamed to tell what had happened because to them it sounded so "oor Oor Oor Oor" But the officer had detected some of the gas and knowing the bad reputation of the house, Violet and her sisters stationed a number of well armed guards armed more with holy articles than with shooting weapons at every door and lower window, and the colonel stationed guards at the windows on the upper rooms but these guards were within the rooms and also at the doors with orders to shoot to kill should any power try to get in.

After about an hour of quiet and even with no further manifestations of the other kind they decided that whatever it was the thing would surely not be repeated that night and started to go to bed. Voice the oldest of the Vivian girls seeing she had left her shoes on the sill of the northwest window of the upstairs bedroom bent over to pick them up. She paused in that position a moment listening to a strange sizzling sound that seemed to come from the corner of the ceiling above until the room she was in became strange with a strong horrible smell. Voice fell with a choking cry. The priest heard her fall and quickly grabbing her up carried her down stairs and but of doors but he too got enough of the dose to make him collapse as soon as he reached the steps leading at it to the yard. Voice seemed to her frightened and grief stricken sisters to be really and actually dead really and positively dead for even the priest claimed he found not even a heart beat and a doctor was called. Yet after hours of artificial respiration she was out of danger.

"She'll be in a dreadful state for a few weeks if you keep on staying here," said the doctor. "This happened once to a woman in a house of this kind and for five weeks she had to be under the doctor's care and even now still suffers from violent convulsions which come on several times a day."

Joice however no doubt was not affected by that kind of gas for her recovery was surprisingly rapid after some fits of apparent suffocation several times that night, and violent vomiting, but that morning she couldn't eat her breakfast. After this attack there was a desperate search of the neighborhood by child scouts and soldiers and though this revealed nothing it was assumed that the strange gasses would surely be driven away. But things then commenced to happen. All of the searchers when near the house, no matter how many there were, were cleaved from as it appeared invisible hands such a tremendous bombardment of stones that those that did not seek shelter behind trees and big rocks were driven away in a panic screaming rout.

Joice however was not going to recover as it was supposed. He was now being undressed by physicians and also and too was suffering from violent convulsions which came on several times a day. General Vivian believed it was done from without and not by the spirits this time. He had the idea that the spirits finally had become of mind of the little girls as to abandon the house altogether and so he for their sake devoted the next few days to making the house as nearly gas tight as possible and Violet and her sisters got their big dogs - Jim had recently as mentioned before had brought forth and good as they are they are a fully mean to strangers and make good watch dogs. However if poor Joice had not been made so seriously ill most people would have thought that poor Violet and her sisters were imagining things. When as it was it was whispered that one of the Princesses had accidentally spilled some sort of chemicals.

Then despite the dogs and the guards within and without came the third visit. This happened however to the owner of the house. Again it was a pitch dark and hot smoky night. Her name is Mrs. Onnes and she and her child were slept on the top floor to keep such an awful heat and smoky atmosphere out the mother did not open the window but depended on ventilation otherwise. There was no where in that part of the building any cracks or crevices of any kind.

At eleven thirty the mother was awakened by what she thought was somebody stepping into her room. She turned on the light near her bed and after listening a moment got up and started attending to her sleeping child. On the way she says she remembered a horrible sickening smell, far worse than that of what you call "Smelling feet" and apparently a thousand times stronger. He heard no faint hissing or sizzling sound but the atmosphere in her room seemed to be clouded by a strange blue haze. At the first sniff she began to choke, was unable to cry for help, couldn't draw her breath no more than if some one had held a tight rag around her nose and mouth, and fell three or four times before she could get the window open and hold her head out. She then became unconscious but when she came to this time she was fortunately not ill. By instinct or by accident the mother had thrown the coverlet over the faces of her child and thus protecting them from much of the fumes yet it was two days before the child could be awakened, and they are now dreadfully ill. The gas permeated other rooms of the house so rapidly, that Violet and Jennie, Vivian were violently nauseated and couldn't get their breath at all for two minutes, while her sisters hastily covering their heads with their blankets were only slightly affected.

The woman testified it didn't come from outside for she had heard mysterious foot steps and saw no one.

The next day passed and there was no trouble at all and Joice herself felt much better and for once could eat a little breakfast. Yet while at the breakfast table Jennie and her sisters were sitting beside an open window and while they were eating, was at the center of the table eating a soft boiled egg. The child suddenly clutched at her throat and coughed and gasped as if she had swallowed something the wrong way and choked herself, and fell to the floor struggling for breath and in great agony. Her sisters were also similarly stricken down for it was another strange stifling attack but were not so seriously injured. Daisy however did not get the attack either so had us to be long under a doctor's care.

"It felt and smelled very good at first," the little girls had said "and then choked us. We couldn't breathe and we couldn't move."

Instead of their big dogs attacking any prowling prowlers you couldn't get the faithful animals into the house. Dandelionian spies have committed atrocious crimes for their successes and other motives which we will leave to the least competent but the persons perpetrating these attacks if people they were could have no such incentives and to make it even more incited the attackers seemed to prefer only this one house where Violet and her sisters were occupying. When off and one some one or other of the brave little Princesses have been gassed so strangely it became evident that the phantom worked only within the building and not without. If it is one of the evil spirits possessing the house how does he conceal his identity as he goes about his business. That there is no sign now of any one in the house and other phenomena had apparently stopped was a puzzle. And yet if the gasses is is only a dandelionian spy, and a full blooded man and not a spirit who does also to remain hidden in the house how could he do it from unseen sources. And who ever does it doesn't seem to try to get away from the scene of the disturbance either such gas phenomena there for seemed to fit the theory that again the phenomena came as gas. What the gas is remains a mystery too for on different times it had different odors and once smelled like chlorine mixed with Lycol and chloroform but the symptoms indicated that the gas was something that worked much faster if it was from a real hidden human person than the gas must have been carried to the house ready mixed in some sort of large syringes from which the human phantoms, the phantom squirrels it though some hole or crack which he already had marked with his eyes into the house. But all the guards declared faithfully and Violet and her sisters could tell by mind reading, truthfully too that no one had really passed them to get into the house or out, and when a diligent search through the house was made, no one was found, not under beds, in cupboards or other recesses and the house also was tested for hollow apartments with secret doors in walls and found to be truthfully without them. It was discovered also that it was not a gas that is made on the spot by combinations of chemicals, no in liquid form. Under such conditions a few drops of the liquid or bits of the uncombined chemicals would have escaped and left stains and other traces. Nothing of the kind was ever found. The strange gasses left no clue behind, and the greatest problem was in where can the person even if he is a spirit, get the gas or its ingredients.

At first too even still the priests believed all these phenomena were caused by an insane person and insane persons are as cunning as they are crazy if not more cunning but no normal person could be found, and according to the "Possession" description books the priests studied, the symptoms were more like they read than done by an insane person, and yet insane persons can do phantom work so cleverly as to make a place appear possessed. If it was an insane person then so far he has performed his fiendish tricks so skillfully that the authorities too now admit that they have not the slightest idea who they are, but if it is only a person then it is certain that if he keeps on with that dreadful amusement and especially if he detected and found not insane and doing it only to torment the little Princesses then if captured he will wish he had never been born. Then if he keeps on the finger of suspicion will fall on him and once they start investigating the right person, they were quite sure to prove it on him or her. Among the Christian lines were a number of polygamists who though not exactly bad may play pranks now and then and they were watched and questioned but they were able to prove they were never near the building.

But unmistakable evidence proved that it had been done by a evil spirit, for after another gas attempt had been made without success a blessing of every room followed and though afterwards there were some other phenomena at occasions it seemed after all Violet and her sisters were winning and that they themselves would soon be driving the evil spirits out and be able to continue possessing the house themselves. All this occurred before and during the battle of the angels. Run, and a little time after Joice no doubt through the working of the possession angels we covered pretty quick from the effects of the gas when in reality God even Himself knows she had received enough of the gas to have killed a very strong man instantly. When now after this event nothing more happened Violet and her sisters began to believe that all was well and that the house was beginning to regain its reputation of what it should have been before the phenomena occurred.

One morning Jennie said jokingly: "Sisters who will dare go up to that attic where we once saw the fire hands."

"Nothing doing," said Violet, "don't want to go there again. I'll stick my head in a lion's mouth first."

"I'll be game," said Joice.

"You won't go," said Violet. "We won't let you. If you do we'll go too as you cannot go alone."

Therefore no body went to explore that attic again for they were not sure whether the house was all right or not. From the experience of the gassing the owners and his wife and family had absolutely abandoned the old place refusing to stay there another minute. For the ensuing days too in one of the rooms the priests both of them said "We cannot believe that it would at least allow peace and rest for Violet and her sisters."

And to make sure they would be left alone Violet and her sisters slept in the rooms where the Masses had been said on and which too they attended. It is hard to tell however whether even this can always effect any extraordinary purpose for once at dinner time in the following day only an expert can explain really what Violet and her sisters exactly seen.

It was big and black with one big staring fiery eye, something of the ho-rid black shape they had seen once before. It seemed to shape like some sort of ho-rid shape that a little child may try to draw but make it in all the sort of odd and ends of shape as his other young mind can conceive. It spread out and floated toward them as if to envelope them, and from it came such a piercing shriek as if it came from some one to be dreaded dreadfully in Hell, black in color as it was it was a singing heat, and they surely screamed hastily out of its way. However it did not pursue as they expected but headed upward toward the ceiling. Violet picked up a plate lying on the dinner table and hurled it with all her might at the black object, but the plate passed through it and struck the ceiling rebounding and hitting her smack on the top of the head and breaking into a dozen pieces. She was stunned by it but she was not cut. The black thing refused to disappear even when they screamed prayers but when voices got a bottle of holy water and hurled it bottle and all at the black object it disappeared when the bottle broke to pieces against the ceiling.

It left a ho-rid smell in the room similar like the gas that had over come them but they hastily ran out of the room and closed the door after them. To their amazement and horror it was in the hallway this time standing upright showing this time two big fiery eyes. The head was round the eyes almost the form of that of a Chinaman. Violet and her sisters this time seemed at it to go away and leave them alone but it started to move forward and then with sudden hesitation stopped.

"What and who are you?" screamed Daisy. The creature wouldn't answer but glided down the hall the other way assuming the peculiar shape as before. The little girls realized that when Joyce threw the holy water at it it had fled from the dining room out into the hall. From the smell it even left here they felt sure it was either a lost lost soul or a demon for as it seemed to move away, the sounds that came from it was so piercing, uncanny, and doleful heart rending that the little girls if they were not brave would have fainted. It remained at the other end of the hall and wouldn't go away. It was the same black object they had seen the first time some days before the day of the fiery hands and when standing upright it seemed ten foot tall. When she standing upright it even then did not assume a human shape and its head though black was like that of some hideous gigantic frog, and it had hands as that of a frog but had black talons.

They felt sure it was a demon assuming that form to try and frighten them out of the building. They assumed courage and started to move toward the thing itself to see what it would do. It seemed to see them coming for it then started to show a sort of menace and they stopped in their own tracks. It was no more scared of them then they were of it and they had believed if they started toward it it would show fright and go away.

Violet then drew out of posy and with that it disappeared.

CHAPTER NINE.

STRANGE STRANGE TO SAY IN THIS STORY FOR ONE REASON OR OTHER THE PHENOMENA STOPS A LITTLE AFTER THEIR ODDS

MA HATED TO ARRIVE.

WIDHE STOP IT.!!!!

FOR a time after this incident Violet and her sisters felt like admitting they were defeated, and that they must go out and stay out of this house forever. Therefore they ordered some of the soldiers to go forth to apply to the old structure. They obeyed but finally came to General Vivian with the statement that as soon as they tried to set fire to the place unseen hands violently and roughly either knocked them down or pulled the torches from their hands and flung them far off with harsh words of—

"No you don't! We avenging spirits won't let you destroy our habitation."

First time it was announced the evil spirits ever spoke.

"I'll fix that confounded house" said General Vivian. "If there are evil spirits see if they can prevent me from having it shelled."

This was attempted and though the gunners were experts not only could not hit the place but even their guns finally fouled and would not work. Then through this incident and also other reasons too Violet and her sisters began to feel themselves cowardly not to stick it out for if they are really angel possessed it was sure they could win out in the end.

While they were preparing their room again.

"I say Penrod when are you going to go to your sisters from this army." Ask a friend as the boy scout "Maddox passed from his room." Some who know you believe you have forgotten your promise to your poor sisters. If so I wonder if you would secretly send a sort of parcel to them at General Vivian's army. The enemy General here won't know the difference."

Penrod looked severely on the boy. "You ask me when I am going to them?" he sneered. "Do you think Jack I can work miracles. I've been trying to get away from this dodgery army for the last two days. I will send the parcel if you like as I'm going to write to them explaining my delay but hurry up for Bill Murphy has been calling to me from his horse for the last five minutes and as busy as he is he has to be kept waiting."

"Wait till I address it" Object Jack.

"Oh need you do that and waste time" said Penrod. "Hurry up" and Penrod showed his impatience, and finally he took the parcel from the boy bid him follow and ran down the stairs. In the hall he met another disguised friend Joe Hayman waiting with another parcel of about the same size and shape in his hand.

"Are you going to get out of the lines to night?" he inquired. "If you will you send this parcel to your sisters on your way. I once promised to send them a nice cake."

"Cake" said Penrod disgustedly. "You should know better. They won't eat sweet stuff unless it is absolutely necessary. Well all right, they'll give it to some War refugees. It's always a pleasure to do anything for my sisters. They're an inspiration for Heaven with their sweet voices, cheery smiles in all sorts of sorts of trouble and their unusual unusual holiness..."

"Pity they're troubled by those evil spirits," said another boy by the name of Bill (not his full name) going on courtship to another army will take us quite a bit out of our way and, can't bear to hear of such an unusual occurrence. Can't imagine how it comes that such dear little girls like those who are supposed to be angel possessed can be so annoyed by spirits but they seem rather smitten."

"They could get it over with if they would leave that building" said Penrod. "But I know my sisters. Only an angel can beat them, and then, doubt it. But I hope it is only a paucity fancy that they just dreamed it. Put, remember when some likeness of Jennie appeared as a spirit and possessed house and I received a letter from her. I was k after saying she and her sisters were having a grand time. I stuck it out toward the spirits quit both ways. I'll allow them for by the holy men, know in America know how to use means to restore that house they are in to normal. I'll help my sisters beat up those so called "Spooks"

"Put why don't they leave the building."

"They're not afraid of evil spirits. Too my sisters have become used to all all sorts of dangers and difficulties and troubles and sufferings, and, don't fancy there is any fear of their giving in to those strange phenomena, so why should we worry? I think for my self those spirits are trying to rout the girls out and they won't go for them come what may. He was at the mail box. And jumping off his horse he delivered the package to the mail man just coming up.

"Strange to me though that the little girls should be angel possessed and yet be annoyed by evil spirits," said another of the boys.

"The spirits can molest but not harm them," said Penrod. "My sisters will have the laugh in the end. If they can't chase them no power left on."

"What kind of girls are your sisters?" asked another good boy who had never heard of them or seen them before and even did not know Penrod had any sisters.

"They're a continent from other little girls. In many ways I can explain them. You will have to see them to know."

"But in character?"

"They have the charm of angels about them. They're pious beyond belief, beautiful beautifully reserved, with refined manners of angels, soft beautiful bird like voices and bright kindly smiles. It is believed they are angel possessed but for the reason that they and angels seem to be one. They are always ready to help any body say the kind word, do the unselfish thing. Though they will fight the Glandelinian enemies they of ten have shown mercy to Glandelinians who are wounded and won't fight even among these which seem incredible. Their faces are just as God made it unusually beautiful, Jennie is the prettiest but Daisy is the cutest and she is a little comic and full of fun. There are indefatigable workers for cause and church as well as the sunshine of all places they seem to be. They're braver than they look but good as they are if they're righteously angry look out. Wild cats have no equals. The enemy have found that out."

"Who's the youngest?"

Hettie is but she is a little taller than Daisy and nearly as cute and comical. My sisters and I are the children of the Abbeysman parson who is called "General Vivian" because of the uniform he wears and some times "overseer" and they and I have been brought up just like our ranches to be here, and they think never of themselves. No matter how good you are too them you cannot spoil them. In fact the more you do the more they'll do, and even if you wrong them they're prompt to forgive if you are sorry and repent. They forgive their worst enemies who repent. They are bright and dress charmingly on all occasions expect when spy ing or scouting, they're good sports girls for good horse back riders, and they have even the gift of attracting attention even from the most serious minded saints of heaven. Wait till you see them and you'll wish they were your sisters. But here we are in the limits. Now well we have one more for our army to go through. First I'll send a letter and then I'll make the attempt. You go back to the Christian lines and I'll go this alone. Too many will make me suspicious or under suspicion I mean you who questioned me about my sisters stay with me. I'll give you an example by letting you see them. You'll be so scared of them for a while but when you get used to them you'll love them as all the others do."

When the parcels came from the mail to Violet who relieved them she tore it open and seeing it she exclaimed to her sisters with a smile:

"A cake, who in the world could have been so stupid as to send us that when we don't eat sweets, and as if we hadn't oddies of cake here which we distribute to the fugitives. It must have been a friend who don't know our eating habits."

She handed it to a boy scout and said:

"Here donny take it to the family we promised them something to. They'll like it as it is a very good cake. And don't forget the chicken, the eggs, and the oranges and apples. They just got in our lines and have not had hardly eaten in three days the poor things."

Violet and her sisters had been expecting something good from Penrod, so in the second package that came they discovered that the parcel contained a beautiful satin covered box full of religious articles and another big box of the sort of chocolate candy they will eat (chocolate throughout no white sweet stuff) and when they opened the box and found a long letter from Penrod, telling of his passionate love and hoping they would excuse his delay as he was checked and couldn't make it as fast as he had desired to, and entreating "his dearest sisters" to give him at least a faint hope that they would prove their "Angel Possession" by sticking it out against the "evil spirits" until he came and take good care of themselves, then delight and surprise were great though they worried how he managed to even send the parcels through enemy possessed territory. But they knew there was nothing he could do. They knelt down immediately to thank the Sacred Heart with tears of this happiness that had come to them that they would soon see their good and loving brother again as after two weeks away from him.

As soon as they recovered their composure a little they all went to the army church and then after turning home while her sisters went to straighten out the inside of the old house, Violet went to write to Penrod at Vivian's headquarters, for strange to say the evil spirits wouldn't even let the little girls write to any one always interfering in some uneasy way.

"My

"O my very dearest brother"

"We cannot express in words with what joy I and my dearest sisters relieved your packages and dear letters. I think we have loved you all our lives even when we didn't even know you were our brother, and now we look upon you as the most ideal brother any person may ever have had, but now our love for you has been so deep that when we were apart we for the shortest time we have suffered much because though you were always good and kind, we never dared think you would ever come out of some of your own perilous duties alive, we have prayed hard to the Sacred Heart, that He will shield you like He does us, but to tell you the truth when you didn't come the day you said you would in the last letter we feared you might have been captured, captured, and it nearly broke our hearts, because the territory you go through is extremely dangerous. And now to think you are succeeding after all and have only one more for now to pass through. I will and my sisters too offer a Mass for your success. And now to think that you say you know ways of helping us best our spiritual mentors. Oh it is so lovely. My beloved and our very dearest brother you ask me if I can give you hope. Why our whole life time will not be long enough to show you our deep and true true and undying love. But our troubles with the spirits have been severe, one tried to kill us with a gun, we have been stoned from unseen hands. O dear God is sure good to us because you and I love each other so truly so intensely that I know we would willingly lay down our lives to make each other happy."

You ask me dearest brother and my sisters too when you can get here and whether we can help you, but we will do our best. I am not of the force of you, you will self into perilous duties, but we will try to find you near the army you'll try to pass out of and we shall be looking for you with longing, unless God will help you to get through sooner. We wish you were here now and Father and Mother too."

Violet, and you dearest sisters."

Half an hour later Penrod who had been waiting feverishly in the hope of getting a speedy letter in answer from his sisters, saw what he believed to be a messenger boy approaching and hastened to open the door of his headquarters now near Vivian's army and far from a for army. To his utter surprise he found himself face to face with Jim Groverton who said with a serious look:

"I am not after opening other people's letters, but this one apparently you sent to your sisters, did because the writing was suspicious. I read it and was shocked. I know what happened. I know and you and I can thank God it did not reach your poor sisters. Such shocking language in it. Here it is."

Penrod looked it over and was too stunned to say anything. It was addressed to his sisters almost in his own handwriting and signed by his own name. It wrote as if he told his sisters that he didn't care for them any more, that he would never go and see them again. And that only because they were so good he did not like them any more. There were lots of other words here dear reader then would make even our dear loved Mother blush red with shame to read or hear and Penrod's face turned scarlet and white stunned to say anything, but mechanically took the letter and Penrod followed him and running up to his room noticed with horror that some of his papers and envelopes were missing and then discovered that in another room a man was writing and using his papers. It was too late to escape he was caught. To think of such a letter and just before he had read his sisters' impassioned words of joy and love which had made his heart beat with love and respect to suffocation, and now this second letter would be writing this on the fly.

"To write such trash to break the hearts of such little girls as these," a moment Penrod couldn't say anything but gasped, the whole room seemed to be swelling around him and strong athletic boy though he was, he felt as faint as a sick three year old girl. Gertrude Argeline supposed it. The man was a reward by soldiers, such a letter it would have broken the hearts of his sisters if it had gone to them and they had not at once detected the handwriting. Little girls whose charming qualities he had admired so much, and he could not but be deeply touched by their holy passionate expression of more than sisterly to us and admit that they received this letter. It would have broken their hearts and placed them in a terribly awkward position after having so often opened their hearts to him as they had done. Each base traitor who could such a little thing, almost happen and to them. His only thought was of their misery. Had this letter gone, Penrod for a long time felt dizzy with bewilderment and distress. Angelina A-onbu had always been his much trusted and loving confidant. For however in his trouble he went to her for help and advice and almost sobbing with anguish, grief for what might have happened to them and also with blind righteous rage told her what had happened and showed her the treacherous letter and the other one the man had been caught in the act of writing.

"Oh your poor dear sister," exclaimed Angelina A-onbu. "It's God's will my dear boy that you got hold of that letter and thanks to Him and she surely looked lovingly upon the letter. I'm glad you prevented the letter from going and breaking the hearts of Prince Penrod's poor sisters, and which even if it did last only a short time till it was discovered also make his life miserable for a short time. I have always prayed and begged the Sacred Heart to prevent things like this to the poor little dears and I feel certain it was he who allowed this letter to fall into Penrod's hands. And she looked so pitifully as a wild cat at the prisoners.

"At Angelina how could a man do this to the little girls the whole Christian world and all of heaven loves so intensely. Pleading Penrod's name it was an awful sin and could have caused misery to all of us. And he looked at the man so pitifully and his eyes flashed like Angelina's lions. He had his nature.

Penrod was suffering mentally and physically from the shock. He got him on the lounge bathed his forehead and chafed his cold hands, petted and soothed him as she had often done.

In any case we can't do nothing to night my dear," she said at last. "Try to rest until to morrow when we will go to Mass together with the rest and ask our dear dear Bishop to enlighten us as to what had better be done." Just then Jane Hailford walked into the room panting with excitement and exclaimed "Oh Angelina, what do you think has happened? You know Mr. Mary, ok Lockhart, Lockhart. Well she spied on the enemy last night and she has accomplished the best of things for us. She just said she did it for the sake of Violet and her sisters and declared to me that those who would not do as much for the good little princesses are not worth thinking about twice. But Angelina what's the matter with Penrod," she added as Penrod white to the very lips was lying on the couch.

Angelina told her and added:

"I can't show you the letter. I don't think it is fit for any human eyes, so run off to bed like a good little girl you are."

The following morning Penrod was better but he was still shocked, and still too angry to eat any breakfast. Then he went to where Angelina A-onbu was sitting and asked for the "etern cotton rotten letter." He gave it to him and not noticed he was in a tantrum. He slammed the door so violently to his apartment that after a while Angelina went in with him that it broke the glass. There was an awful crash. The prisoners stood between two soldiers and there was two others standing by.

Penrod then grinned but as to any of THE WAY OF EXPRESSION IN THE MYSTIC, FAINTLY.

"Then he pretended to giggle as if it was a joke holding up the sinful letter.

"Ha, ha! Well beautiful letter you almost send to my sisters. So that's what they are according to your opinion. Well beautiful words."

"I did not write the letter," the man lied.

"You devil of a lying cheat!" Penrod hissed and lunged angrily between clenched teeth. The man was dumb with fear even though Penrod was a boy, but Penrod was a prince and he knew it was God help you if you got on the wrong side of him. Angelina A-onbu-Angelina A-onbu looked up at Penrod whose steel blue eyes were black with anger and righteous and holy angelic rage.

"You wrote both of these letters for," caught you at one of them. Penrod now yelled fiercely at the man and his face was purple with passion.

"O whom," he man tried to say to lie out of it. Egg-wit! Egg-wit!

Agg-ravating Penrod again.

Then Penrod laughed scornfully. "Oh, I reckon you don't know who. He snarled.

"You devil of a lying foul."

He took the last letters and laid them in a non-by big ash tray. He lighted both letters with a match.

His eyes glared fiercely.

"Hold the sounder's hands of those firmen!" Penrod said fiercely. And only too willingly the soldiers obeyed holding the wicked man's hands over the flames.

It was a horrible thing to do but Penrod before God and Heaven did right.

The men screamed and struggled, but it was like banting against a wall of rock. Penrod had become mad with holy rage and he saw to it the men held him firmly holding his hands over the flames of the burning letter until they almost roasted.

"You won't be writing my poor sisters any more such letters. Penrod screamed. "You ain't going to be able to write any more letters when I get through with you. I'll make you know what it is to try and break their hearts."

When the soldiers finally released the sounder he was weak and nauseated from the awful pain, but he managed to get to the bath room. He wanted a tube of ointment from the cabinet there and was fumbling helplessly at the latch with his badly blistered hands, when a soldier came in and grabbed him. He pushed him into the bath room and onto the bed and made him stay there. The man's entire body was throbbing with pain and soon the fingers of his hands were glued together in one solid blister. "That ever happened to this man's hands after this no one can tell but it is positive however that he never had any such serious results that he ever lost them. But heaven knows never in his life was he ever able to write again and besides he was to be held a prisoner for years for such letter writing.

Though this was a very severe thing for any person to do and though it may nettlesome of the readers in thinking that Penrod was cruel to do this, let any of the readers know, that even before God himself Penrod was not cruel in doing this but perfectly just, and he himself would have sinned had he not punished this skunk thus. And who among the readers would not have done the same if he had discovered a dirty scoundrel writing such a threatening letter, to even his sweetheart not even considering about his sister whom he would have avenged it still worse.

The details of the letter cannot be fully written here because it was too dirty in words, too immodest and blasphemous. That his motive was only heaven knows but one thing it was found out he was no spy. He knew he was a glandular man. He was a good agent but from what country he came from Penrod didn't know and as he knew it he would break no language but Abbiannian. Many soldiers gazed him and gazed him to find out why he had attempted to send such diabolic letters to the poor little girls, but his only answer was that he hated any one who is "Goody Goody."

Some time later when the man was allowed treatment for his hands and his hands had been bandaged up Penrod went in to see him followed by two strong guards and Mary Stuck, Angelina A-onbu being behind.

"Why did you write those letters?" Penrod snarled with a sneer.

"I didn't like them!"

"Why? K. Hissed Penrod.

"Because---because---

"Are you a spy in service of Angelina and trying to make a capture between me and my sisters to get hold of some important plans?" "No I'm no spy. I only hate good little girls and boys."

"You hate us Abbiannian children because we are good. Ah that's an alibi. I believe you are a spy!"

"Honesty costs my heart and hope to die I ain't insisted the man looking scared for he knew the fate of spies."

"Well what did they do to you that you hate my sisters I should like to know"

Penrod sneered.

"Because they're so good."

"Penrod laughed. "Did the Devil send you here to torment them?" he again sneered.

"No Prince he didn't."

"If so do you know he didn't didn't." growled Penrod. "If it wasn't for the gosh damned devil the world wouldn't be full of sin. I'd like to kick him into your face as you're like him. I'd like to see to it that you'll be given a long jail sentence for such rotten dirt writing to my sisters and their dearest."

If you don't like us Abbiannian children because we are good what are you doing in our prison?"

"I'd go away if the warden didn't stop me!"

"You would. There are plenty of ships sailing in other directions far from the war, and one will take you to the island prisoners for five years. You'll be in solitary confinement there however as you'll never be able to use your hands for any kind of work. I should have cut them off entirely. You are a dirty rotten snake to write things like that to my sisters and their dearest who I'm not ashamed of said to say are as equally good and pure as even the purest angels in heaven themselves. I suppose you thought you could make them believe that I had turned against them but you would have been fooled for you wrote too much shocking dirty stuff, and your imitation of my hand writing was so awfully poor. Had the letter reached them, they would have only been shocked and if they had their hands on you you'd have got it worse than I did. No to you for they could have found you out. You could not have fooled them by that letter as they know me too well!" Penrod is right. Had those letters reached them, they would have been sent the devil to catch the writer and the thing. They had kept Penrod's real letters and would have compared.

comprehended his hand waiting for the diabolic writing and then the fun would have begun, and I'd been so very far from that man. They would have punished him more severely. Penrod without any more words left the man and had soldiers take him away out of his sight for good and all.

Since the time that Violet had written the sisterly love letter to her brother, and had returned to the old house they did not seem to be troubled much by evil spirits. Any further so far. Another day passed and another night came. They some what decided to go to bed however for fear of another phenomena but they did nevertheless after kneeling beside the beds and praying for a long time before getting into bed and going to sleep. Yet that night passed without any event apparently but when they awoke the next morning they found their floor all wet and the hall outside streaming with water, and two of the faucets of the wash room room basin wide open. Nobody had ever got into the wash room room as it had been locked securely and the little girl knew well they themselves had not left the faucet water turned on. Besides too the light was on, and they had put it out.

It was another phenomena indeed and a tricky scampy one. All the clothing in the bed room had been deliberately thrown to the floor no matter what they wore, every thing they had, and all soaking wet. They were in a hole indeed because they had nothing to put on on unless they waited.

And for Modesty's sake that they had to do, and thanks to the weather it was not that moping no more.

Violet went in the wash room to turn off the water and stopped it from running and pulled the stoppers out of the basins.

"What plank will the old spirit do next?" she wondered.

Jennie seemed to have even read her thoughts for she said:

"Well whatever planks they will have to do next they'll not drive us out if we can help it."

"Well the hole place can't kick." giggled Daisy. "It needed a good bath."

"And it sure went swimming" said Hettie. "It was a wonder these rooms did not fill up and drown us in our sleep."

"They couldn't the windows were all open" said Catherine. "Our windows are low almost to the floor and we are only two feet off the ground. It's funny our guards didn't notice the water. Maybe noticing it they must have been too concerned to enter the building."

"Well it's a water phenomena" said Angeline. "And every room got a good wash out and will make work for the others who will have to come and clean up. But we will help and direct the work. The water has to be cleaned out or all the calling will crash down on us as the upper rooms are flooded with the water was turned on up there too. I shut them off. Wash basin, sink, in the kitchen, faucets in the bathtub and the stoppers of each in the holes. Those spirits must have thought we were afraid of water if we supposed they didn't shatter about the windows and try and drown us."

"Wouldn't we?" said Violet. "The pressure of the water would have burst the plans. Maybe they had no intention of drowning us. Just to scare us. But they sure threw all our clothes down in the water shoes and all. I'm supposed the water didn't swamp our beds."

"Beds were too high" said Jennie. "Had the windows been too high it would have happened or we would have been swimming in our sleep."

"Good thing any way the beds are made of wood" said Daisy. "We would have awakened and found we were getting a burst ride in our rooms."

The little girl went out to raise the alarm and soon had quite a number of men working in the place with boots on, sweeping out and scooping up the water which even was cascading down steps. The workers did not know what had happened to cause the strange diabolic disaster and as the guards outside had declared that no one entered or left the building they thought it very unusual. It took all day with even Violet and her sisters and a number of boy and girl scouts helping to get every thing straightened out, and even then the floors were not dry. To prevent a repeat of the phenomena they sprinkled every faucet and water pipe with poly water and also before going to bed again to see to it that the water was turned off, and the main lever fixed so that even the staunchest strongest man couldn't monkey with it. Violet suggested staying on guard duty herself that night and make the rounds of the place frequently like a night watchman and carry Holy water with her and a big crucifix but her sisters objected as they did not want her to lose any sleep at night.

Despite the phenomena some of the soldiers inwardly believed that one of the little girls had walked in her sleep and turned on the water, but had she done so the outside guards could have easily seen her for the windows were of such on both floors that the guards could have observed anything even if it was dark night.

On account of the flooding of the place that night Violet and her sisters must confess did not seem to have the nerve to go to sleep in the old house at following night so General Williams gave them special and most reliable guards to watch every room room in the building including their own where they slept in Violet and her sisters had the fear that the evil spirit could work such a spell on the windows in case they had been closed that the pressure of the water could not burst through the glass, and the force there for they could have drowned unless they awoke quick enough. Yet though they themselves did not say so, to each other nevertheless too the little girls almost doubted that any spirit had done it, and that one of them might have caused the trouble in her sleep. There could be a likely chance of that.

Finally they could not resist the temptation to suggest that and that made Violet so determinedly to be on the watch herself that they could not persuade her otherwise and she at least remained on the watch for nearly half the night but nothing happened, and then too her sisters were so nervous that they didn't hardly sleep either.

However nothing happened so far and the force Jennie begged her sister to come to sleep and go to bed and get some sleep, and that as she herself felt too nervous to sleep she herself would remain on watch the other half of the night. Violet finally gave in to her pleading and Jennie took her place. As it was warm she sat by the open window looking out and watching fast moving clouds pass the full moon (not the moon soon) There was a big clump of bushes not far across the company street and from that direction there came something something through the air that flew in the window and struck the wall with such a resounding crash, that her sisters who had not fallen asleep all sat up with a start.

"Don't sit near the window you'll get hit!" screamed Jennie and Violet to Jennie, but she did not need their advice or warning for she had gone away from the window as quickly as possible.

"Maybe it was a spy" said Jennie as no more objects came.

"I can't think so" said Angeline recollecting the stone fusillade of the other night and day. "I'm afraid our place is going to be stoned again and—"

"YOW, YOW, YOW" loudly from some where across the company street and a little refugees girl came running as if she was mad with fright.

Violet was out side in a moment and had grabbed the little tyke by the arm demanding—

"Quick what's the matter little girl?"

"I SAW IT—IT'S RIGHT THERE IN THE BUSHES" and she pointed in the same direction from where the stone had come. Violet's sisters as soon as they had jumped from their beds at the sound of the scream had followed her out side. They followed with their eyes where the frightened little girl pointed, and saw a strange round black shape between two trees, with a small black oval shape above it. It at once seemed to have two big shapes like ears, and glaring eyes a number near the bottom of the head as if the creature was looking downward and exposing the top of its head. Jennie remembered she had not seen anything there like that before.

"Quick Catherine go in and get a bottle of holy water—" began Angeline.

"I've got two" interrupted Catherine but that seems too far to throw it."

A crowd of soldiers had not come from their tents having heard the child's scream and the first thing they demanded was what she had been doing out so late in the night and in her arms late night.

"Something scared me out of the tent" she said shivering. "Then I saw that there—over there" and she pointed. A number of the soldiers leveled their rifles but Violet cried:

"Don't shoot. It won't do any good if it is a spirit and that would not make it go away. Every one help me scream a prayer."

"Her command was obeyed and the thing suddenly vanished.

It was some time later probably a little past twelve o'clock in the morning when the little girls while trying to go to sleep again were awakened by a strange sound and suddenly sitting up in bed they saw the most horrible sight of all. It appeared as if they saw the very spirit of their brother Penrod dressed as a skeleton and he literally spoke saying that he really had not come to them because he had and wrote fine letters to fool them but that he had not cared for them any more, and that now he was killed and in hell for the sin of deserting them. He spoke in such a real meaning way saying that they would even find out that it was true that they could not help believing it and only heaven knows how wild was the thing. Their cries of fright and distress brought many into the place and Angeline Archibald herself did all she could to console them but it was in vain.

The one who could have done anything for the poor little girls was too far and that was him. But he was not for a moment. When Jim got the word of the disaster he came out of his tent and followed the courier on horse back. He had told himself there was no hope of seeing any one able to throw the evil spirit out of that place but he knew by the bitter pang he felt now that he had hoped to the last. At that hour there were few people or soldiers about the company street and these were only the forwards of the sentries. When he reached the powerfully possessed house he could not summon courage to enter it, but stood for a long time outside until at last he saw Angelina Aronburg put her head from the window for she was not afraid of any manifestation. He succeeded in catching her eye, and placing his finger on his lips signified her to come down. A moment later she suddenly appeared at the door.

"Is it true Gertrude?" Penrod dead. Surely it must be false. Surely all the good he has done for them Our Dear-Blessed Lord would never let the Glandelinians do such a thing."

"It is true that they saw the spirit of Penrod for when they screamed so wildly, I ran in and saw it myself. He said the same thing to me and then with a look of hatred put Jim dear for God's sake do something for them the poor things upstairs. What shall I do, what shall I do? Jim dear I tried to convince them that it was only an evil spirit taking that form and not Penrod. They can't be convinced for it seemed so real. They are in their room and I think they have cried themselves to sleep. My heart has been breaking all this time to see them. It has been dreadful. Poor little Daisy and Hettie cried terribly, and sobbed for hours; but it was a long time before the others cried. Joice fainted, and when I got her round lay still and quiet. I with out speaking. Poor little Jennie was the worst of all. I couldn't bear it to see her sit in the chair by herself with her eyes staring open and her face as white as if she were dead. She did not seem to hear anything I said, but at last when Daisy's sobs were stopping, I began to talk to her about Penrod, trying to convince her that it surely cannot be true and then at last she broke down and she cried so wild, that I was scared almost to death, and then her sisters cried too, and after a while I persuaded them all to lie down and as I have not heard a sound for the last hour and now as it is getting daylight I hope the good God has sent them all to sleep."

"It must so indeed Angelina. I will stay here quietly for an hour or more and if we hear nothing I will go home and will be back in the afternoon. Sleep all do more for them than anything I can say. If it is that confounded demon I'll do my best to get even. A Good Bishop is coming to see me a man a good Holy Father I know when I was even three years old and Hall help me help them get that house in good condition."

At the end of an hour or more all was still quiet, and Jim however though his heart was some what lightened did not do after all what he said. He decided to remain on watch and see that nothing happened. At two o'clock in the afternoon Tim entered, and when he came poor little Daisy ran to him, and throwing her arms around his neck, again burst into a passion of tears. Tim felt for her sake that this was the best thing that could have happened for the others were occupied for sometime in trying to soothe her crying quietly to themselves while they did so. At last her sobs became less violent and then Tim did his best to tell them that their grief was all for nothing, that Penrod had not really turned back on them or was not dead, that he was sure that a wicked evil spirit had played a dirty trick on them, and that if Penrod had been dead they would receive word from other sources before now.

"I'll tell you what," said Penrod embracing and kissing poor little Daisy. "Mail or news travels fast despite the size of our armies and distance even by courier. If the afternoon is over and you get no word of his death then that will prove it's false won't it. You know yourself that the news couldn't fail to reach you."

"I'm so very musty," Tim interrupted you," said a boy scout coming in and saluting, but a courier just now arrived and handed me this message. It was sent to the Princesses from the out skirts of our camp. A special boy friend of theirs by the name of "ADMIRAL" has just now arrived within our lines with a party of boy scouts, one of them Jack Saunders and said he'll be here within an hour if possible."

At this announcement on what a feeling of hope and relief came upon the little girls and little Daisy and Hettie suddenly stopped sobbing and looked pleadingly at Jim as he opened the message. He read:

"Dearest sisters;

I do regret severely that I couldn't come sooner but circumstances delayed me much against my will. I almost got captured once and have thirty dead Glandelinian soldiers to my credit during the pursuit and captured one of their ringleaders. Will be at your place as soon as I can and will change disguise at the "Harvard" house.

"You beloved and darling brother Penrod."

At this news poor little Daisy and Hettie could not hardly believe their eyes.

"Come come now," said Jim laughing in spite of himself. "Here little angels dry your eyes and don't let him see you were so grief stricken. He'll be so proud. Wipe your eyes Daisy. Think of it only an hour and he'll be here probably sooner. I know it was a spirit who deceived you, don't you remember the day a spirit almost deceived him and made him believe you were dead Jennie. That's right. I feel better when I see you smile again. Get ready girls and I'll go and meet him. I know the road he'll take."

And kissing them good bye he hastily made his departure. He mounted his horse and they saw him ride swiftly away. Angelina Aronburg then came again and asked:

"What's the matter with him?"

"Violat only silently showed Gertrude the message."

"Oh it seems so good that it is true," said Jennie with tears of relief in her eyes. "We were deceived by an evil spirit!"

"There it is again," cried Violat and she was right for the likeness of Penrod appeared again.

"Don't let that message deceive you," it said. "I'm Penrod and he's an impostor."

A feeling of strange horror came over the little girls, even they now realized that in the spiritual world if he was dead his voice would not change. They could not recognize the voice at all and blamed themselves for their folly at not taking note at the time of the first visitation. Violat hurried a water pitcher at the apparition and it only said:

"So you would hate and strike your own brother. Well, are well. You'll never see me again. I wanted you the one coming is an impostor not your brother."

At first they began to feel as if it was right and their grief was about to return, but some how or other something made them panic stricken and they fairly ran out of the house Gertrude following.

Soldiers ran up at their cries.

"A demon takes the form of my brother," Jennie shrieked. "On that house. I won't occupy it again until Penrod comes if he really is alive."

The soldiers tried to quiet her and then led her to general Vivian's headquarters where the general heard the details.

"It is positive," said the general, "and I'm positively convinced too that it is a demon assuming that shape and telling you those thin things because you little girls won't give up the house to them. I know those demons are afraid of you but they're getting worse. Unless you stay here a while they'll be doing all but kill you. So for God's sake abandon that house for good girls. It's dangerous and only courting with the unknown. Take my advice and stay out until it is cleared of the spirits any how."

"Besides," said General Nemo "if you're brother had died or was killed and it was found out you would have got the news by wireless telegraph before now. And you little girls look closely at that message. If that ain't Gertrude handwriting then who does it belong. I know his writing any where."

They felt much better after that being more than ever convinced that an evil spirit was finding this sort of way of turning out to torment them.

"But he will be meeting us at that house," said Violat "so we got to be there. He'll think we are scared. We won't go in. We'll stay in the yard."

"Don't do it for Henry's sake," said General Vivian. "I'll send a guard there to inform Penrod you and your sister are here. It's safe and don't go chasing a devil around a stump. Wait till your brother comes and he'll bring some one who will clean out that house for you. If a Phenomena fire starts a God help you. Take warning in time. In fact, I won't let you go back until your brother comes. I demand you stay here even though you are little princesses. You cannot whip those demons even if you are angel possessed for they claim possession of that house and mean to stay there. Take warning in time. This shock you received should be a warning for that was the worst yet, and supposed you would have been drowned that night. Don't go back."

Violat and her sisters realized that General Vivian was right and decided that Penrod should first meet them at general Vivian's headquarters. In fact now they were a little too frightened and upset to go back to that dreadful place again. All things they had seen the felt there and sensed the "fake" vision of Penrod was the worst and the most horrible. Yet they feared because they knew they could and have that the evil spirits would follow them even to general Vivian's headquarters tent and torment them there, but fortunately their fears were well founded. The demons were satisfied as long as the little girls were not there.

In the meantime while Violet and her sisters were with general Vivian in his big headquarters tent, and he was having soldiers prepare the beds for the Preparing the beds a great crowd of soldiers and boys and girl scouts were as close to the possessed house as they dared to go, for they had observed a dreadful phenomena a little after Violet and her sisters had fled from the building. The strange fire phenomena had occurred but it did not last long, and they were watching waiting for it to reappear. The whole building inside and out side had been enveloped in a fierce conflagration conflagration with its attendant rolling clouds of smoke. At first it had been believed that some body had after all succeeded in setting it a fire in spite of the spirits, but as the fire had raged for an hour and the fire department had not been called, it gradually went out of itself and to the astonished gaze of the spectators not a section of the building inside or outside appeared at all burned. In fact it stood as if there had never been no fire.

Every body who had witnessed it had been stricken with horror and their astonishing cries had soon caused the collection of the crowd. Hearing the noise of excitement general Vivian and the little girls came out.

"What's wrong with the confounded building now?" the general wanted to know.

"It had been on fire," gasped one of the men. "And—"

"On fire?" said general Vivian looking at the building as if he thought he was seeing double, and then glancing strangely at Violet and her sisters who looked in terror at the building which now seemed to be shaking as if there was an earthquake. "What are you telling me a dream or—"

"No sir it was on fire. Ask any one of the crowd and they'll tell you the same, and what struck me as astonishing it didn't burn up but looked the same after it was over."

"I suspected this right along," said the general to the Vivian girls. "Had you been in the building when this happened only your possession angels would have been able to save you by a miracle. I believe you had better stay out for good and remain in my tent. You know very well you would make me very good company, and no need to make company to those who hate you. It's so good an old house however that it is a shame and if your brother can do anything as he said he can we can in the end have the last laugh. But we must wait until he brings the help he said he could."

"Every body though will think we gave in to the fiends," said Angelina. "So they won't," said the general. "And I'm not advising you little girls to give up but to wisely remain away from it until help can come that will bring about a change. Penrod said he could bring you help when he came and so wait till he comes. You said Jim went to meet Penrod."

"Yes."

Penrod knew the road he should take and so did Jim. Jim had gone to his own tent first and then summoned as many of his girl and boy scouts as possible to follow him and give Penrod the necessary greeting when they should come in sight of each other. Time had not said anything however of Penrod's clothing and soon while they were waiting at a certain spot one of the boy scouts said:

"Look there Jim a squad of Glandelinian boyscouts approaching."

"Where?" said Jim.

The boy indicated.

"Give me your glasses," said Jim excited and he looked carefully through them.

"Get into formation and prepare for trouble," said Jim.

"Are you going to attack them?"

"I sure am," said Jim.

"But suppose they are Prince Penrod and his gang coming objected one of the girlscouts.

"Then our friend Penrod has made a poor impersonation of Fredrick Daguerre the arch enemy of the dear little Princesses," said Jim. "And Fredrick Daguerre and that Jackson boy is with him. Pen Penrod is not in that group unless I'm mistaken and he has caught them. I'll wait and see first before I do anything hasty. But all of you lay in hiding."

They obeyed his command, however some of them had seen the last of them run to hiding and halted in their advance fearing an ambush. One of them went back to what appeared to be the leader of the squad and pointed to the place where he had seen the few go in hiding.

Tim from his hiding place watched them through his glasses and saw them turn down another road and go off toward the east. They were too far off to be pursued and Tim reluctantly had to let them escape. They had been wise to their peril and escaped.

"I wish he'd run across Prince Penrod and his gang," thought Jim to himself.

"The little devil wouldn't get away so easily...."

Finally Jim decided to continue down the road slowly until they should meet with Penrod and his followers. Penrod gave a glance at his wrist watch and saw that it was some time yet before Penrod would be along. But he knew Penrod. Penrod usually says he may be coming at such and such a time and Jim never saw him yet fail to come a certain number of minutes or so ahead of time. Soon Jim quickly again heard the sound of hooves and they were not coming at any snail's pace like the first squad. On had come though they were not coming at any furious gallop. The others did not hear any sound but Jim listened more carefully. Finally a round a turn in the road he saw a lone boy coming.

When around the same bend came a good sized squad of boyscouts.

Tim gave the leader a look with his glass. Among the boys was an officer in gray uniform his hands tied behind his back.

"He signalled to his followers to follow and they got ready for the deception. Only you trace flag or the prince may mistake us for enemies," said Jim to Francis Hart, and the boy obeyed.

"All right for now," said Jim. "I said Tim and remember do not go fast. The distance is quite great but there is no need to hurry."

However the trace flag had not been necessary. Penrod saw the cavalcade coming and not only recognized Jim but nearly all the others in the force most of the ranks and he and his column suddenly were seen to increase their speed for a moment. As soon as they were within hailing distance Penrod raised his hand to his followers and they halted, seeing Penrod's action Jim did like wise and then he and Penrod rode toward each other alone.

"Thank God and His Blessed Mother you have come at last," said Jim after the first loving greeting was over. "Your sisters need you worse than ever."

"I sure expected that," said Penrod for now the two columns were as one and going on back toward the way Jim had gone. "I received enough from their recent constant letters to make my own birth almost stand on end. Some how or other mysteriously I got a boy notice that they even saw me as dead and in hell in a vision and that the spirit said I was an impostor and not their real brother."

Jim was surprised by this news and said for now he had to go.

"It is true Penrod. They were awfully surprised at first when they believed it but succeeded in convincing them and getting them out of that unnecessary girl and general Vivian's trial to get them to stay out of that house."

They were troubled more than ever to day.

"I know most of the symptoms for they have written me," said the prince. "I couldn't understand the phenomena of the banging and opening of the doors though which they still wrote. And that horrid black shape they saw with the dreadful eyes, and the hands of fire. That shocked me as much as that vision of my supposed death and being in hell. Those demons will do any sort of deception."

They hoped that you would succeed in getting some body to help them," said Jim. "I sure did," said Penrod and with his head he indicated two priestly looking men at some little distance behind the squad.

"Are they priests?"

"Not a one. One is a bishop and the other a cardinal. I had them come with me from the Christian army I left. I know a way to do my share and I'm going to help them. A very Holy old Catholic Indian in America showed me how to do it when once a place he was called to was possessed. He got the fiends out in a hurry and they stayed away too after that."

"The poor little girls are dreadfully upset."

"I hope they are not frightened much," said Penrod looking worried.

"I don't believe they are but they sure stood some ordeal and that shows how brave they are," said Jim. The main thing that drove them out was the showers of stones."

"They wrote me of that," said the prince. "That to me was the most astonishing of the phenomena. Was it ever in possession of Glandelinian soldier's hat that house."

"It was, by general Thomas Federal."

"I thought so."

They rode on silently for some time and soon were within general Vivian's Vivian's army camp. Tim anxious to get the sisters hastened the pace.

Finally they came to the place and by that time the crowd was gone from it and only the long guard stood by the fence.

"Strange," said Penrod. "The place looks all right."

"It sure does from the outside," said Tim excitedly. "I wonder why the guard is there and looking so at ungle. I hope it is not another phenomena."

He went forward while Penrod having dismissed his followers waited at a little distance. Time soon came back.

"Your sisters at general Vivian's headquarters," said Tim and his face looked white to Penrod's startled surprise. "They left in good time. Prince had been a phenomena fire here and left the building intact."

But the guard said it was the heat of the fire and could have killed them. A great crowd was here just before we arrived. The building is dangerous to approach now--- my gosh gosh Penrod look at it shape will you. And there is no earthquake either."

The building sure was shaking and doing so in a manner as if it would be shaken down or shaken to pieces. Penrod and Tim watched it in blank amazement and approached as close as the gate. As the two boys did so the shaking stopped. As if it was brought to an end by Penrod's approach. Here the demons for some unknown reason really dreadfully afraid of him.

"Would you dare to enter the building if I took a chance?" smiled Penrod.

"Are you not afraid?" said Tim.

"Not with this I ain't. The Holy old Indian gave it to me."

Tim looked at what Penrod showed. It was a large crucifix the image made of some shiny metal.

"Part of the wood of the real Cross Our Blessed Lord hung upon is in this" said Penrod and therefore is a good holy relic. "He opened a little something in the cross and showed a little very dark color wood in the hole. "This is the relic" he continued.

"But could you not rout the fiends out for good?" said Tim.

"Not hardly. They will only go as long as I'm the real thing. I'm telling you the truth the shaking stopped because I came, but I am not going to experiment now. I do not wish to waste time. I wish to see my sisters first and encourage them and let them know that the world vision was a delusion for me and not even injured. And I went through a world of trouble trying to get my best to get here and confound those Glandelinians. They wouldn't let me through in the second army even though I acted as Adelfob. I had to go a long distance out of my way to get around, and that delayed time."

The two boys with the Bishop and the Cardinal now headed for general Vivianias headquarters tent being directed by Tim who knew the way. It was not as far however as Penrod had believed it to be because it was just across from the possessed house. It was a big (not pig) tent the height of the house itself and housed a lot of general Vivianias officers. But just then only general Nemo was with him. Among the generals the others being out on various other duties. The guards in charge of the tent outside were supposed at seeing Tim approaching with what was supposed to be as he looked a Glandelinian boy scout of very high rank indeed.

As they stopped before the tent entrance the corporal asked of him:

"How did you manage to capture a Glandelinian boy scout of so high a rank?"
"I captured him because he is a personal and very good friend of mine" said Tim almost laughing. "He will be a prisoner of the little princesses as soon as we go in. They have a claim on him not I."

"How come?"

"They are his sisters."

"What would the guard taken by surprise. "You mean to say that is Prince Penrod."

"He sure is just got through the Glandelinian armies on his way here. He's going to take possession of the possessed house himself."

"Why they'll drive him out like they did his sisters."

"Guess again," said Penrod as the two guards let the boys pass into the tent Penrod going first. As it was a little dark to his eyes in the tent Penrod for a time couldn't see anything, and the boys had come in so quietly that the two generals and the little girls sitting with their backs toward the entrance did not see or hear them enter.

"I'm sure so very to intrude" broke in Tim poking Penrod gently in the side as a warning not to say anything yet. "But here's a prisoner," brought in which you little Princesses can claim as your own. At least the guards thought he was."

General Vivianias and his companion suddenly looked up, and the little girls swung their heads around as if startled by some sudden words. General Vivianias had never seen "Adelfob" before neither did Nemo and at first they frowned, but Violet, and her sisters recognized him and were on their feet in a moment.

"Penrod! Violet gasped. "Is it really you?"

"Sure unless you want to see "Adelfob" better" smiled the Prince. "I see here I came sooner than I predicted, come here Violet and your sisters too and let me hold you in my arms and kiss you and dry your eyes. It looks as if you had recently been crying. Really it surprises me that you believed that fool apparition and Violet first was in his arms and then his sisters and after the excitement was over and he still held sobbing away in his arms he heard the whole set details from Violet and her sisters and also from Angelina Aronburg who had ran on seeing his approach. General Vivianias and even Nemo told their part of the story and General Vivianias related his trouble with the Prince. And also told of the phenomena fire.

"At first" said Penrod "I could not hardly believe it about the phenomena fire. Did you see it yourself General?"

"No but there was a big crowd near the place before you came and as they all and us they all testified that they seen the dreadful phenomenon it surely must have been true. At the house too when I and your sisters looked out shook as if it was having a fit. I expected it to crash in but it didn't."

"Are you sure" asked Jennie "that you could really believe us of this dreadful annoyance or should we abandon the house for good. It's such a nice comfortable place otherwise we hate to."

"According to what you tell me" said Penrod "the situation is worse far worse than I had anticipated. I intend to go in first and investigate. I might be able to learn details."

"Do you think it is safe?" asked Angelina.

"I'll have to take the chances" said Penrod. "I'll get the two priests to sprinkle holy water in my path to prevent the phenomenon fire if the evil spirits intend to rusticate me by that."

"Will we go with you?" asked Angelina.

"I'm afraid you'll have to" said Penrod. "As you're needed to show me the details. Then I can know how best to act."

The Cardinal and the bishop were instructed by Prince Penrod to sprinkle Holy water over the whole yard and they did so and advanced into the building followed by Penrod, and the little girls and Tim. The generals of course stayed behind. They said they were brave but they would rather stick their heads into a lions mouth than explore that house again. But Penrod had warned them that if evil spirits were doing it the phenomena could spread and infect his tent as his tent was just directly opposite the house even though two city blocks distant from it. At first Tim was some what nervous of going into the place again since he heard of the phenomena fire and for fear that something might happen Penrod entered first and warned his sisters to stay out until he felt it was safe for him to enter. As he entered a rat scurried past him and disappeared into a hole and what struck him as strange that the rat was of unusual size and as black as ink. He finally went the rounds of several rooms and then from the open window called to his sisters and Tim to come in, while the Cardinal was already saying the blessing prayers in the room. One at a time. Penrod had soiled his hands on something dirty in looking through the room rock room and he started to wash his hands in a large round wash basin and poured some fresh water into it. As if thrown by some unseen hand he got a perfect fountain of water full in his face from the basin so much of it that the basin was empty.

Every body in the room including Violet and her sisters who had come up were a witness to that phenomena.

"Well I'll be spluttered" Penrod started in spite of himself. "He hastily dried his face with a towel and turning to his sisters asked:

"Is this one of the phenomena?"

"It sure is" looked like it" said Tim for Violet and her sisters were too shocked and dumbfounded to speak. "And the water is all splashed over you uniforms."

"Don't worry about the uniforms," said Penrod. "That water splashed into my face with a force as if it came from a hose. He looked the wash basin over and saw that it was solid throughout."

"Next I suppose" said Penrod "if I was to go into a bath tub and try to take a bath I'd get thrown out by some unseen hands. I'll have to try and do something girls otherwise our chances of using this place for headquarters till the army moves in here is small."

For a time they were all silent until Penrod finished drying himself and then took off his disguise. Then he finally said:

"It is best for me to stay here at night first and see what will happen. If you wish your little girls may stay over but if you stay sleep in a two bed room. There is a room with two big beds the beds big enough to accommodate us all but I'm not going to bed. I'll get the sleep I need to morrow. I want to see what will happen. Your little girls can get some sleep and I'll stand on guard in your sleeping room to see that nothing happens. I do not believe there will be any phenomena fire because of this Sacred Crucifix which I have set up in your selected bed room. I told the Cardinal to set up a constant and never ceasing novena for we'll need means to give these evil doers a constant and never ceasing fight to drive them out. One alone can't do it for as soon as the prayers are said on the priest goes the things only to return."

Tim whispered something to Penrod.

Penrod then turned upon his sisters.

"Which apartment did you see the apparition that claimed it was I in hell?"

he asked. "That particular apparition needs special attention."

"In the two big bed room."

"Well he can come and see me and prove his story," said Penrod determinedly. "He even said you were not my brother, that you was only a boy disguised as he and an impostor," said Catherine.

"Spirits of the infernal regions will always tell the blackest lies," said Penrod. "If I was an impostor I could have been found out before long. I suppose I'm Frederick, you know now and Frederick Lorde is Penrod. How many times did that apparition appear?"

"Three times. Once at night. Twice at day time in the morning, and was this morning once early and then at sunrise. The last time he was menacing and we ran from the building."

Penrod offered to get some more water and let Violet and her sister wash their hands and faces but Violet said giggling; "Nothing doing brother-dear."

"Why that's the first time I ever heard that," said Penrod surprised. "You always wash yourselves before going to supper."

"Yes we do put in Jennie," but we'll do no washing in this place. We may get more water on our faces than we intend to put there. What happened to you may happen to us."

"I believe you are right," said Penrod, "but I say where is the pitcher and wash basin? Did you take it out, Jim?"

"What pitcher and wash basin?"

"The ones I used for washing."

At his questions the eyes of his sisters opened wide in astonishment. The pitcher and wash basin was gone. And no one had come into their room either, so they would have easily been seen. Jim looking was so dumbfounded he couldn't say anything more.

"Well," said Penrod, "if the spirits start taking our things it is a time we do something soon. But let's get ready for supper for one." He added, "Don't eat in this place for if we do we'll see some phenomena with our food we won't like. At General Vivian's headquarters mess hall they all with the officers and men had a grand supper indeed and then the little girls and my sister and I went to bed. Penrod remained on guard and all night long there was a phenomena. Then that morning a courier came into the house as far as he dared and told Penrod that a great number of those who had eaten their supper that night died of what was believed of a mysterious poison and many more were dreadfully ill. Penrod was horrified and asked the full detail and he found that those who ate supper with him and the little girls died of eating deadly fungi commonly known as toad stools. Fourteen of the dying ones and sixteen of the dead were officers. It was suspicious the courier said that some one had from some place gathered that they thought were a species of the harmless and delicious mush rooms which are common in the region but it was sworn by the cook that no body had even slipped any into the food. Indeed it was a most tragic supper. The courier said that soon after they had eaten supper a great number of them had suddenly become violently ill. All were rushed to the Base Hospital and that nine of them had died by morning, and that the doctors said all the rest would die within the next twelve hours."

"My god," said Penrod, "I and my sisters especially they. What was the fungi in?"

"The Chicken Stew."

"God be praised we didn't eat that," said Penrod much relieved. "Do you think any spies did it?"

"No so the food mysteriously came as they say from this house."

"From this confounded house?"

"Yes."

"I'll bet those evil spirits picked those toad stools instead of mush rooms to poison my sisters and me," said Penrod. "He didn't eat the chicken stew because we don't like mush rooms and we saw them in it. In fact my sisters detest them because they are afraid that there may be poison ones and they won't eat them. I was going to eat the Chicken stew and Violet said to me last night -

"Penrod don't eat the Chicken stew. There is mush rooms in them." "I didn't please them but how else we didn't know they were deadly. I know them when they're picked but when cooked they do look alike. There are seventeen main varieties of these deadly fungi, and when I was over there I counted there were three hundred different species in the United States alone. Many of these species are almost identical in appearance with harmless and palatable growths. Even expert pickers can easily be fooled. The difference between those deadly toad stools and the delicious mush rooms is revealed by chemical analysis. These harmless looking fungi so similar to their edible cousins in outward appearance have been found to contain some of the most dreadful and deadly poisons known to medicine. The toad stool known to science as the Venenarius Muscarius, but known more commonly as the Fly Amanita or Fly Trap contains the dreaded Muscaria, a very stultifying alkaloid most deadly poison and for which there is no known antidote. Others of the less deadly but still poisonous species have been found to contain halvellic acid, cholic acid and pilz-atropine, all poisons. pl poisons.

One species of mush room probably more deadly than the fly trap and known to science as the Venenarius Phallides but aptly known by mush room pickers as the "destroying angel" contains some dreadful virulent poison which has defied a analysis. Science doesn't know yet just what it is in the chemical make up of this fungi that is actively poisonous. Yet a small bit of the plant, no bigger than a pea will cause death, and in the case of the Fly Trap science has not yet discovered any antidote. Therefore it was either the fly trap or the Destroying Angel which caused the deaths of those luckless men and officers. If my sisters had eaten any of that they sure would be lost to me now. Our Dear Blessed Father Lord sure in His mercy mercy prevented them and me from eating any of that Chicken Stew. Did General Vivian or Jim eat any?"

"I don't believe so if they are not ill," said the courier. "The doctors knowing the symptoms that virtually every poisonous mush room attacks its victims in the same manner by paralyzing the nerves of the heart, injected atropine, a heart stimulant and gave also an emetic. With all the mush rooms Prince except the Destroying Angel or the Fly Trap the victim has a chance if treatment is prompt enough after the first symptoms of the poisons set in but there was no saving these and they were treated even at the tent before going to the hospital. It must have either been the Destroying Angel or the other."

"What were the symptoms?" asked Penrod.

"Those symptoms are violent pains, a loss of strength and an amazing rapid loss of flesh. Strangely enough Prince though the symptoms do not usually appear until from eight to twelve hours after the toad stools have been eaten, yet in this case the symptoms occurred even while at the supper yet."

"If there had been fiendish spies who really did this," said Penrod, "they should be caught." "But it seems as if there were no spies implicated. You say the food was brought straight from this house?"

"Yes Prince."

"How ridiculous. Nobody cooked any food here."

"But it certainly was brought over from this house."

"I will have the whole premises searched for all sorts of Mush rooms," said Penrod, "and have them destroyed. Maybe a spy was also operating unseen in this house. It surely couldn't be the spirits on this occasion."

Penrod kept good his word and a thorough search was made for Mush rooms and toad stools but not one was found. "Dear reader it was the spirits that did this thinking of destroying the little girls. The toad stools used were both the Destroying Angel and the Fly Trap put to gether one of the spirits stole Penrod's basin in which to bring over the deadly fungi and slip it into the Chicken Stew while the Cook was away. General Vivian, No Nemo and others who also didn't like mush rooms ate no stew because of that and therefore escaped. The searcher found no toad stools of any sort but in looking the rounds of of the building Penrod happened to go down to the kitchen, and found lying on a table still around a number of what appeared to be Mush rooms. Just why it is that certain of these fungi have poisons in them and others have no science has not yet determined. Penrod discovered there were species among those on the table which contain fiery substances so irritating to the tongue that no normal person would eat a sufficient quantity to cause death. There were also many of those of the Destroying Angel and the Fly Trap. The latter is so named because it attracts flies which eat on it and die. To be sure no spirit interfered with this purpose he trapped or tied a string around around the mouth and wore it while he made a fire in the stove, and then pitched the poisonous mush rooms in and waited until they burned out or turned to ashes. Then he put out the fire and fearing that even the spirits would use the ashes to poison some one he dumped the ashes out some distance beyond General Vivian's headquarters tent. Then he went back to see if his sisters were still asleep and as they were he looked at his watch and found that it was four thirty in the morning - all - than he had supposed. He had not even so much as closed an eyelid that night and had not seen a thing. Had he not had the experience with the wash basin he would have begun to believe his poor relatives had delusions caused by their hard ships. He then went up to the attic to explore. He used his flashlight and looked all over the attic but saw nothing but old furniture furniture lying around. The attic was very large and had a good number of big windows. He struck a match and lit the gas and then started to examine all the things that were in the attic.

settled Penrod and Violet and her sisters were up in their room bed room with the Cardinal. They had been investigating the report of the men's estates when they were startled by Time loud vic voice which sounded full of excitement and fright. They all came down the stairs in a hurry as fast as any one could and Violet who happened to be in the lead saw the lighted candle. He had a sense that some one else had been in the room beside him, and she saw Time white face.

"What's the matter she asked as her sisters and Penrod came down followed by the Cardinal and even the priests who also had heard Time panic stricken cries. Time as best as he could explained the horrible manifestation which had been.

"The whole thing was black in color and dreadful in shape, said Time. It came from that corner (pointing) and lit that candle. It didn't seem to use any material either."

"Keep cool, Jim and don't be so scared," said Penrod. "Here's a good crucifix for your protection. I forgot sisters to tell you. I saw an apparition do that three times this morning. Twice I put the candle out and when it was lit a third time, left it lit. That happened sisters in your room room before me very face."

"Was it black?" asked Tim.

"I couldn't tell the color of the form," said Penrod "because it had a very big black cloak of some kind over it. It was an apparition because it disappeared through the wall of the room. After I had put the candle out a second time and it returned it looked as if it suspected my sisters or sons of them of it and became menacing. I feared it would attack, but it appeared to be afraid to go near a man then. Then it looked toward the cupboard where, hid and then relit the candle. I left it burning to see if it would come back and put it out but it didn't."

"Well we are going to work on the rooms in this whole house simultaneously," said the Cardinal. "If we can't stop this annoyance then it may be that God wills that the evil spirits stay here and the best for you little sisters to abandon the house. Only when God wills it you know will evil spirits depart. For His own good and for punishment of wicked evil doers God usually allows cases to it that these manifestations happen. And only through His own power will would he allow it to stop. The first priest told me who were here before that all their efforts were quite unavailing. It seems when they did succeed in stopping certain phenomena others of a different and more diabolical sort occurred, getting worse and worse. If as you little girls say your cruel inhuman foe General Tomas Federal occupied this place recently before the Christian army moved up this way, then for these phenomena to be happening here must have been a very unusually wicked man and also had intercourse with the evil spirits, and so also may have had his followers follow him. Are you sure this was his head headquarters?"

"Yes," said Jennie. "I believe it was in this yard out side where, struck Federal Federal in the head with a stone."

The Bishop and the Cardinal held a council of conversation aside and in low tones with the priests for several minutes, and pointing several times to the candle which had been lit. Then the Bishop went over and blew on it hard. It to their surprise wouldn't go out. Penrod then tried it and to their greater surprise he was able to snuff it out but he did it with his fingers.

The Bishop then turned to Violet and her sisters and said:

"There is only one hope little Princesses and that is if you little girls are really and truly Angel possessed," said the eldest of the priests. "I surely could know by examining you each carefully for I understand the cases as I have seen some and examined some and they surely have been beautiful cases. If so that is a reason then why you have so easily so far been able to stand your ground even though you couldn't drive them off no more than they could drive you. If you are really Angel possessed we must then have your help. We cannot do anything to night to speak off for in each room to move now morning simultaneously a high Mass will have to be sung. As there are six rooms each of you little girls being good singers, I know must sing for the Mass, two of you in one room as you are seven. To the Cardinal your brother can act as altar boy as we know he has been one for many months already. Then there must be Benediction to move now night in each room after the Exorcism, but first to make sure we must find proofs whether you little girls are Angel possessed or not. Do you know who the you are or not?"

"We can't tell on that said Jennie. "We only believe so because many said we must be because we go through so much as we did and are still sad and sound. And they say we act like Angels more than even any of the other good children too. We believe we are possessed only by our article of faith. If it is true then only one person besides Penrod, believe can confirm it as he has been with us never but often as our father has yes, even more often than anybody. He is hardly never away and is only, within hailing distance now. That is our Guardian Jack Ambrose Evans. But he might may not reveal anything I'm afraid. But he'll tell the truth in any thing he says. And also the testimony of Angelina Aronburg if she'll reveal it, and also my Father's. Penrod our dear brother can tell you a whole lot, and so can Walter Starling."

"Would it be necessary to consult them?" asked the Bishop of the Cardinal. "We would have to get sworn evidence, beside their testimony," said the Cardinal. "But of course a virgin we could only get this by signal correspondence because he is just now too far away. But I'm afraid he'll think we're prying in his little child's business and--and--"

"No Father won't," said Joice decidedly. "He would be glad too. But I'm afraid about Jack Evans. He usually would tell no one not even if we asked him. He would be very angry if you asked it of him. Maybe our brother could get him to do it. Will you try Penrod. He's our superior being our guardian and we do not like to ask him personally."

"But surely we do not need those witnesses do we," Cardinal asked the Bishop as he looked from the little girls to the priests as well."

"Most likely we would."

They had left the possessed house by that time, while Penrod had ordered that altars should be erected in every room and that guards should be there with big crucifixes and stay day and night to see that nothing wrong is done to the altars by the evil spirits.

Penrod went to see General Jack Evans having been given directions as to his headquarters by Violet. In fact Evans was stunned by Penrod's story. He did not even know had not heard that the house the little girls were in was possessed by fiends.

"Well," said Evans frowning with perplexity "for the sake to help them conquer those enemies I'll do what I can but, I do not think I can explain very much. But I've seen symptoms that shows they're surely Angel possessed and severely too. Barely for all they went through and survived ought to prove that in the first place. But I'll go and interview the Cardinal and the Bishop. But only their signs shall hear my testimony. And if they don't keep it secret from any body else they'll be sorry. I won't have this phenomena spread to the world unless God wills it. I had been warned often in my sleep. But before I decide I first must go and consult Our Lady of Good Council. She'll show me by a feeling whether I should reveal what I know or not. So I'll be over at eight o'clock. The two must wait until then. I'll go to the Army Church right now and you go back and inform them what to do. As for Walter Starling he'll be glad to tell you all things and have him interviewed first. I and Angelina Aronburg may tell the rest. But the Princesses must testify their own too. But it seems at times they cannot do anything unless their condition is proved. But for those little dears if God wills it I'll do anything. For I hate to see evil spirits give them the hell, because they were forced to leave the building. That I won't have. I hate them too much. The fact the little girls have stood it out against those fiends when any one else have an hell from the building shows they have immeasurable courage the brave little dauntlings. So I'll help them to win if God wills I should reveal. But I go now and see his Blessed Mother's advice."

Penrod then shook hands with him and they parted. He stopped long enough at Evans gate to look at his watch.

"General Evans will have plenty of time," he said to himself. "It is only half past five and still a little light yet but getting dark from that confounded forest fire smoke. But he'll see what Walter Starling says."

He mounted his horse and rode for the boy scout leader's headquarters. But as he got there the guard halted him.

"I'm so sorry prince but Walter Starling is not in. He went to Angelina Hedges tent on some important military business."

"Can he be summoned if it is necessary?" asked the little prince.

"For you or your sisters he would come I suppose but for no one else. Could you write the summons Prince?"

"I guess I'll have to. This is a very necessary situation. I must see him and speak with him privately."

He wrote the summons and the sentry went to take it while Penrod think of it though a prince actually took his post until the guard came back. The guard was gone only ten minutes and then returned holding a paper in his hand.

"Walter Starling will be here in a minute after," said the guard. "This is a plan he captured from some Angelinian office out in the sea."

He saw early this morning and he told me to give it to you. I was in such a hurry to do so I bent him down the road about a mile. But he is coming as fast as he can."

Just as he spoke Penrod saw some one coming in the distance through a clump cloud of Just. He soon rode up along and dismounted. He just nodded politely to Penrod and turned to the sentry.

"After this wait for me and don't don't rush off so sharply," he said. "There was no such haste as that. I had something else to give you and you left me a minute behind. What in the world was your hurry?"

The sentry was too embarrassed to answer for he had made too much haste in his excitement.

"As for giving the man this time," said Penrod playfully. "He was in a hurry and didn't do it right."

"I will but he mustn't do those things," said Starling. "Suppose a Glandelinian could have rode along side and he not even armed with pistols. A musket is no good on horse back."

"That would be serious," said Penrod looking at the man almost reproachfully as he took the papers. "You must be careful. It would even cause your death. Starling is only a boy but he sure could prevent anything happening if he can defend my sisters and others like he did."

He put the papers inside of a coat sleeve and then turning to Starling said "Remount you who are and I'll tell you what I want as we go along." Starling was surprised when he heard the news, though of course he knew of the situation of the house.

"It's strange that they need all that information," he said. "But if the little girls are willing I'll reveal as much as I know. But I know only a few experiences about their angel possession. Why didn't the priests consult General Evans. There is plenty he knows and I don't mean maybe."

Penrod did not intend to stop at Angelina Aronburg's tent for he had before he rode this sent a courier to ask her to come and wait for him at the headquarters of the little girls on the outside with rather a

However, he found that they with the Bishop and Cardinal had gone to General Vivian's headquarters. For though they wouldn't say what it in or was the little girls did not want to remain at the old place until they got Evans' decision. The Cardinal had said almost sternly too. "No one remains in that house to night. I can sense something very dangerous."

Penrod and Starling headed for General Vivian's house.

"My God," said Walter Starling. "Look at that old house will you." Penrod glanced in that direction. It was in a state as if it was in a fierce conflict of a long ration and near it as close as they dared to go was a great crowd of soldiers and boys and girls. General Vivian, Violet and her sisters and Angelina Aronburg were also watching it at the rear of the crowd. It was terrifically hot, and great clouds of smoke rolled from the fire but strange to say the building would not go out. The fire department had been called out and were throwing streams of water on it thinking that would reduce the phenomena believing the water would overcome it, while a priest was blessing the water as it came out of the hose. But the fire raged on hotter and hotter soon throwing such parching heat that even the crowds with drew.

"See what you little girls escaped," said the Cardinal. "I'm surprised it didn't happen when you were asleep last night and—"

"Wait," said Penrod getting down from his horse. "I can explain it. I was in the with this crucifix. I forgot myself and took it with me. I wonder if I can stop that."

"Do n't go in," shouted some of the crowd. "You'll get scorched."

"I'll only go as near as I dare and see if I can stop it by saying a Prayer and holding it before me. If so then all will be all right." Of course being the prince they had to open up to let him pass them. He approached the gate but that was as far as he got as the heat was unbearable. He fell on his knees, made the Sign of the Cross and then held the Crucifix high in the air and held it there. A priest followed him and started sprinkling Holy water but had no effect however and that explained why. The phenomena was not demons but done by demons and no doubt this phenomena fire had its time to burn and expire out and would not until then. The fact of Penrod being there with the crucifix prevented the demons from making it while his sisters were there and the possession angels too. The reader can understand the phenomena occurred when they were not in the building, not when within it was a purpose to keep them out."

Finally it began to subside nevertheless and to the astonishment of every body the building was not in the least bit singed. That an act of magic by the demons.

After the excitement of the phenomena was over the crowd dispersed and the prince and princesses were soon with Angelina Aronburg. At about a clock at Aronburg in the building, Starling was the last to enter. By a clock at on the General's tent it was only six o'clock army supper time for the princesses and their brothers. They invited Starling and Angelina to dine with them. Angelina and Starling, as only too glad to accept, loved nothing better than to often to be with them. And little Jarvis was there too but had not been in that afternoon. The Bishop and the Cardinal and the priest were so out with them. But to their surprise a courier came and said

"His Excellency General Evans summons you all up to his headquarters right away. The bishop, the Cardinal and the priest too. He had prepared a great good supper for you all, and he'll interview you there at supper. He has been at Church and fell feels sure he can tell all for that cause. He wishes you all to hurry."

"Then there is no need of me to do any cooking," said Penrod with a smile. "Come every body. It is only a little of ten minutes."

As they were en route anything that Jack Evans cooked would surely give anything worth eating to eat there again even if he had to pay a big price for the meal. For those who choose however there was coffee or tea, for Violet and her sisters and Penrod and Angelina Aronburg and Starling too there was milk, but that they were not allowed to have coffee, but because they would never drink it unless they needed it as a stimulant. They didn't like coffee. The customary grace a before and then after the meals were said and then after supper Evans arranged a large oblong table and ordered every body to be seated. Then he produced a good sized ledger book and pushed it over to the Bishop and Cardinal.

"I do not know for sure who wrote all those records," said Evans. "But they're in that book. It tells all what the little girls went through since their experiences began. Many of them are scenes of horrors and how the little girls survived them no one can tell. All miraculous escapes. It may take some time for you both to read them off probably about an hour or so. Some of those I had with them myself. I read them carefully and see if you can make them out. Both of you to save time can look at them together. Then I'll show you something else. But there will be so much to do before you get the evidence that the little girls better sleep to night up here and keep away from that place until you may succeed in clearing it out. I'll go with you and help you to morrow. If it is necessary we can awaken them sometime to night to examine them. But if you intend to do anything at the start to morrow morning we'll have to be all up all night except the little girls and the prince, Starling and Angelina can sleep all day to morrow."

"I slept nearly a good part of the since since after saying Mass," said the Bishop and so did the Cardinal. "So well we're unnecessarily even to morrow and gain what sleep we need afterwards. But that place is to be cleared if possible."

Both went over the descriptions in the book very carefully and took over an hour in reading all the details. It seemed to them unbelievable that such little girls could and did go through such experiences and still live and the two looked at Violet and her sisters long for they had not yet retired. They retired at nine o'clock some nights and seven at others. It is accordingly that they have to do. And they had to stay up yet to bear their own witness to what was in the book, and any hour it was not even yet seven o'clock.

"Did you write all those and keep track of them?" You Excellency asked the Cardinal at which littleaisy giggled at the look in Evans' face.

"I just told you and the Bishop my dear Cardinal that I'm totally ignorant as to who kept track of all those descriptions. However the book belongs to my charges Violet and her sisters. There's something strange about that book. I could not account for it myself. Glandelinian spies have tried to get it for some reason or reason or other and never could succeed. Only last night one got into my room where I kept it. The book case was open and the man lay dead killed mysteriously in front of the book case. Something strange about that book because it happened to be every spy's spy where ever that book was. And only my charges or their brothers or faithful followers can touch that book without disaster."

With a pencil the Cardinal marked at the places in the book the worse of their experiences and especially the dreadful bloody massacres of children they had witnessed and had almost been a series of victims of and yet miraculously escaped. Then as the book was finally shoved over to the priest Evans went into another room and brought out a large and big book only which he could carry. Other men could not even lift it.

"I can't account for this either," said Evans.

"What's in that book?"

"Photographic pictures of the very experiences that are listed there. There. Mind you, not drawings or paintings. Pictures taken by a camera camera." "He laid the book down gently on the table. "I must say he continued. "The book need not be so heavy. Those who tried to steal it were dead in the same mysterious way. And my charges and their brothers they never even seen the spies enter. The book was so big that every body could look through it at the same time."

Violet and her sisters explained the picture to those who had never seen them and there were over five hundred of them and it took quite a while before it was over. Then the little girls and Penrod went to bed for they wouldn't stay up any longer. But Starling and Angelina Aronburg remained up.

"What did they do to that Augustinia girl who was so brutal to the little Princess Jennie?"

"My gosh!" Penrod said who overheard that remark. "I forgot entirely about him! It was he who captured him. He positively is still a prisoner and I have to get to bring him to trial. That would seem strange and think of any body who does that was easy with him but that's the worst thing I could do. He'd been better off if he had been tried and sentenced some where than what is happening to him now. God caused me to forget to punish him severely. A prison camp in an army here is a terrible thing, but I won't bother with him now. Haven't got time. I'll try him next month."

"I wouldn't bother my head about him for a trial," said Starling sarcastically while Angelina Aronburg showed an offensive look. "Would not Jennie's testimony be enough?"

"It sure is," said Penrod. "But I wish he to accuse him before my Tribunal so they can use the most measure of sentence."

"Put I have no witnesses," protested Jennie soberly.

"You don't need no witnesses," answered Starling. "From what kind of a little girl you are your testimony is worth a thousand witnesses. For get it angel dear and for your and my sake don't lose no sleep over it. That second trial will get him and you ought to be his judge."

With that they went to their respective bad rooms where at least there was no danger of disturbance from evil spirits. Of course such things are likely to spread, but the evil powers were afraid and wouldn't follow the little girls being glad enough if they stayed from the house they possessed.

The priest and the two others and the two children studied the pictures for quite a spell and then finally commented upon it.

"Have you anything else to show?" asked the Cardinal.

"Yes this," and Evans produced a smaller record book. "They have been wounded deep often during their experiences but if you could look over their bodies you wouldn't see a scar anywhere. And yet their wounds were deep enough that had any occurred on others scars would be for life. This book is a proof from the reliable physicians and surgeons who attended them."

The book was carefully looked over.

This is unusual," said the Bishop while the Cardinal was mute. And this book says they too have often been strangled long enough by Glandelinian even past the number of minutes to die, or even smothered and still are alive. How does that account?"

"I cannot explain that," said Evans. "But the written facts are there. No one can get that book either. The same phenomena occurs. Death to the would be thief."

When the priest studied the book they looked at each other. They felt kind of queer.

"Who wrote this book out?"

"The reliable surgeons," said Evans.

"Have the surgeons witnessed?"

Evans laughed at the question goodheartedly.

"If you want to continue on this investigation a year I'll get the witnesses," he said.

"Good night Nurse," said the Cardinal and he looked at the priest as if he was amazed and dumbfounded.

"Have you anything else?"

"Yes the horses they personally own all beautifully black ones. No one but the birth or the little girls can ride them unless they stand by as you mount. As for Glandelinian soldiers if they try to mount, they won't stay again. And you cannot shoot the horses or even overtake them on any fast one either."

"You don't mean to say the horses are..."

"I'm not saying anything about the horses being possessed by angels. They're miraculously guarded that is all and the angels make them dangerous to the Glandelinians."

"Could I mount one of them safely?"

"Yes I suppose so. But do not try it with a Glandelinian uniform on though. You may be taken to a hospital," he said.

"But about the case of the most serious wounds and not receiving any scars. That seems impossible," said the Bishop. All of the little girls had received not just bullet wounds, but cuts from sabres, shell fragment wounds and as of them shot through the chest twice and in the heart and yet lives. That seems only an Alibi."

"Alibi! If you will," said Evans. "Then what is the use of questioning me further? You should question the priest who gave Violet Holy Communion at the time she was shot in saving the Blessed Sacrament from a musketeer. As for Angelina Vivian her cure was impossible from a mortal lung wound. Little Jennie, and Catherine Jones, attended her when she was so ill. At times she didn't hardly know what it was to breathe. She's alive and well to day and there is no scar mark where she had been shot in the lung. Doctor Michael Rufina was her Surgeon. As Prince Penrod told you just not long ago it is not usually up to me to give any information unless it is my will to do so. Their conditions whether they're angel possessed should have been kept secret from all one. Why bother about the possessed houses. Let them sleep here. In fact I don't hardly believe the place is possessed. How should I know? I never even saw the place."

"You don't believe that and yet we saw some of the phenomena," said the Bishop. "So you say. Do you think I would believe that because you say you saw a phenomena. Why should I believe your words if you doubt mine. It was positive that I intended not to reveal anything, but I want to church seeking advice from the possessed lady in prayer, and I got a feeling a strong feeling that it would be perfectly justified. But that don't make it so that I should reveal anything further if you're going to show doubts. If that book to your ideas don't seem to you to tell the truth then go and see the Surgeons. I can give you the list of their names and they are here right in general vivian's army. I'm the main command here. I could send for them at once. Let them tell you those things then and I'll drop further information. I'm not supposed to give any one information about those little Princesses, and Emperor Vivian wouldn't like it if I do so unnecessarily as it is no ones business. You came seeking information saying it would help in the case of driving out the evil spirits. If you think I'm telling you things wrong or making a sort of Alibi then leave the devils stay there, leave them alone. The princesses can remain here. I never asked you to go and chase them out. Prince Penrod did. What the spirits do there doesn't concern me at all as long as they're not here. Since you say it is an Alibi then seek your information some where else. Don't come to me for it."

Evans rose from the table as if getting ready to go. "I didn't say it was an Alibi," said the Bishop. "I only say it seems so from the unusual statements here."

"To say to seems so to my hearings means the same as saying it is, you have wasted plenty of my precious time and caused two others to stay up longer than their time and say that. If that isn't true then why do spies die mysteriously who try to steal those books. Why I don't even have to lock the book case. It's too dangerous for any thief or spy to even lay a hand on them. I suppose you'll say that phenomena is also of the devil. Surely the devil himself could be glad to see those books stolen. But even they wouldn't lay hand on them. And also those books have been blessed. You have seen enough in those books to convince any one without further information which I could give you and you say it seems an Alibi. It is best you get your information some where else. I'm not supposing I supposed to reveal any secrets from any one. If you doubt what I'm telling you you're doubting one of the Articles of our Faith and you are supposed to be a Bishop."

"But I did not say I doubt anything," said the Bishop humbled in spite of him self for Evans was really angry. If that is true then there is some unusual phenomenon about them that I cannot understand. To think of shell wounds. No shell wounds ever occurred to persons without leaving big scars, and bullet wounds even to scratch leaves scars. If they have no traces of having been wounded then they are a phenomena themselves. Why he is the priest who attended Violet when she..."

"Princess Violet," corrected Violet Evans. I would not reveal that priest's name to anybody. He will not tell any how. Princess Violet warned him not to and it is not her request. It is her command."

"But how can I tell then..."

"You don't need to see that priest to find out the details, as can't you see it is written down there in the book by the priest himself, but he did not assign his name as Violet for he told him too. Isn't that evidence enough. Or is it too an Alibi?"

Violet and her sisters, their bed room in a room just opposite overheard those remarks. They were surprised themselves that the Bishop had mentioned the word Alibi. They did not care whether they would remain in Evans' headquarters but if they through their own accord did not get the evil spirits out of that house then the evil spirits won, and they were little girls who wouldn't even let evil spirits get the best of them in any way. Of course Evans did in a way in his heart believe something about the house since the little girls told him, but it was his way of expressing to the Bishop when the Bishop showed some signs of doubting the information he had received. Looking through the partly opened door Violet saw Evans was going to move away.

She knew if the Bishop or the others did not get the full details of what they were seeking, they would pay as much attention to the house then as if it was not possessed. Of course being doubted Evans was offended. For everything he told, even as the reader knows was all truth. If scars had remained violet and her sisters by now would be all scars. For the number of times they had been wounded. Violet came out and pleaded with Evans not to take it so seriously.

"We want them ousted or we're whipped Evans," said violet. "I don't think the Bishop means what he said though he might have found it astonishing. If he thinks it's an alibi then I'll tell him it isn't for we ourselves could furnish proofs that would make him gasp, and my sisters. We were once even charged to death as to say as we're here, don't be angry at the poor Bishop. He didn't mean what he said."

Violet looked so pleadingly at him that the general couldn't resist. He kissed and embraced her and said he would then and led her back into the room. "In the room he said;

"How about that priest, should I let him reveal anything?"

"Which one you mean?" asked violet.

"The one who gave you Holy Communion when you were shot in the heart?"

"O violet said "That is not necessary. That holds for good. It's too scared. That priest couldn't be found now anywhere. Only Our Blessed Lord knows where that priest is."

Evans turned to the table.

"There are instances with forest fires," said Evans. "We were caught in their path the fire advancing twenty miles an hour it is claimed, being with them was the cause of their being saved. But it seems so strange I usually usually believe it was they who saved me. But the saving of us all was miraculous on all occasions, and then in in the summer thunder storms of unusual violence break out immediately after Glandelinians had done anything wrong to them, I was a witness of a horrible and yet deserving sight one day. I sometimes even dream of it at night. A terrific wind blown thunder storm was raging. I was out scouting with a party of officers and I had this boy Walter Starving and Angelina from Glandelinian with me, he could tell you he said and she is not a day or so either."

I saw violet and her sisters on horse back racing madly from a party of Glandelinian cavaliers. They were not intent on capturing the little girls but to sabering them to death as soon as they caught them. I saw my followers could not do a thing for we were too far distant though we would like mad to get the running horses to death. The little girls were instantly over taken and some of them already grabbed just as he got within a hundred feet of the scene. I felt my heart in my mouth for it was too late to save them. But my God, I was almost blinded by a terrific flash that seemed to envelope the Glandelinians and everything in view including the Princesses too, and the shock of what sounded like an explosion knocked me and half my troop from their horses. When I got to my feet there were the Glandelinians lying beneath their horses' bodies burned to a black crisp and the horses not injured struggling to arrive. The little girls were not harmed but were dreadfully frightened at the catastrophe for, could see it in their faces and also bewildered. At the time the Glandelinians were going to cut the little girls down a dreadful lightning flash struck at us and struck them killing every one. Six of the Glandelinians had their hands on violet and her sisters thus making a circuit and tying yet the little girls told me afterwards they had not even felt the slightest shock and their horses were not harmed either. There were fourty in the party and all the Glandelinians were killed. I have a hundred other witnesses including even Penrod to prove that for he too was with me on that dreadful occasion."

There was a pause and then Evans continued;

"I'll never forget Penrod's face when he saw that disaster. It was for quite a while that he would ever go near the Vivian and Princesses or talk to them because he was very much afraid of them. He didn't know they were his sisters then not did, and I had a terrible time to get him out of his scare. A party of Glandelinians who at a distance saw the disaster thought, had hurled a big of grenade at the Glandelinians attacking the Princesses, and despite it all they made a fierce attack upon me and my troops and we were worsted badly because of the numbers and the little girls were captured any way. These Glandelinians were different soldiers however and did no harm but carried us off to camp. And the little girls then a later managed to make our escape in the dark. But I never yet got over that awful experience. If it was n't a intervention of God through the angels I'll eat my hat. I feared was part of the disaster when the others captured us but nothing happened. I believed it was because the others did no harm. No hand grenades were found on us and the Glandelinians believed I had exploded only one."

Evans then stated many other things he could recall, and then said it was time to turn to tell what he knew.

"I know many but I'll tell two of which, was a witness of one of which was shocking throughout, and another which was shocking at the beginning and laughable at the end."

In one case I was even too far away to get to their aid in time yet to save them. A party of Glandelinians had captured the little Princesses and tied six to a tree. Believing that the little girls could not be saved by any one the soldiers slowly left, leaving one to do the work of hanging the little girls on the charge of being spies. I don't know what sort of a rope they used to hang her with that is, since but it was evident the one man left to do the work was to kill each one by one so they could suffer the horror of seeing their sisters die. Joice was the first to go up. I was close enough then to see in horror the proceedings but the horror had changed to startled surprise. He was standing underneath her and she had stones tied to her shoes. That is the way Glandelinians hang children to increase their weight so they would surely strangle.

She came down all of a sudden, the rope snapping off at the limb as if broken and she landed feet first on top of that man's head and crushed in his skull. She was thirty feet above him and was unhurt. Before I could do anything she had liberated her sisters and disappeared. Later I saw them come into camp. I went up to see what Joice had done, and believe me that man's head was squashed. I climbed the tree and tried to untie the knot but I couldn't. I tried to cut the rope off and the knife was spoiled. I never saw such a rope. It was to my eyes unbreakable and could not be cut, and yet it broke when she was strangling by it. I believe that was a miracle to save her. An angel purposely cut it with a fiery sword or something to let her down on the man. I went to see a farmer-inter whom, knew to ask for some thing badly needed for my scout troop and he gave me all the details. He told me the little girls came to him, with the rope still around Joices neck. He had to buy it loose and he said it took him two hours and a half. I forgot what he said, but he was so struck by the incident and his testimony that he took the rope to a rope factory to have it examined. He told me what it is made from and though, still remember I cannot pronounce the word. The rope can be burned, but it cannot be broken or cut, and yet it broke when she hanged there because, said it, and if you think I'm handing you an alibi then ask her for she had the experience and knows."

"Did the little girl ever keep the rope?"

"Yes," said Evans himself. "She claimed it from the farmer to prove it in case of necessity. Here's one truth of the statement" and Evans grinned. If you doubt it Bishop and my dear Cardinal I can prove it by going out side and showing you I'm strong enough to upset a uproot a tree by my hands. But kill me if you must, I cannot break that rope."

"I'll bet that rope was rotten somewhere where it broke," said the Cardinal.

"That rope doesn't rot," said Evans. "I have it and I'll show you the pieces. You can see where it broke at the ends. If that is rotten you can have the rope your self."

In less than a minute Evans produced the rope. It was long and coiled and of a dark gray color though at a distance it looked black. "I know that kind of rope," said the Cardinal. In Glandelinia they manufacture it. I know that kind of rope to be used for tourist hunters who wish to capture strong upon a live. You can capture a big porilla with that alive and he could never break it. It is much stronger than chains."

The Bishop looked it over very carefully especially at the ends of the rope. From the looks of Evans it could not be doubly doubted. He wanted to prove about the rope so he took them that he could do what he said but he wanted to prove about the rope so he took them all out side and made his demonstration. He tore up a good sized tree by the roots and to their great surprise (and interest of staring) who was used to such feats of strength laid the tree down as carefully as if it was not so heavy at all. Then he went back into the house. He wasn't pretending either, for they could see it on his face, but let him strong as he is try and break that rope. He only made his hands sore trying it.

"There now," said Evans, "cannot break that rope. Yet Joice told me herself that she didn't stay long. He had only been down until she was thirty feet above the rope and then she was suddenly down on the man and killed him. Though she choked for that half minute she nevertheless heard the crack of that rope as it snapped in two."

"Who cut it off the limb?"

"I did," said Evans. "I was then able to untie it after, shattered the limb against a stone."

little girls faced to get a good look at their faces. Yet it was too dark for them to see their faces and the Bishop no longer to use the candle. Finally he went over to Pen and said:

"I must take the risk if you wish me to help getting rid of their evil phenomena in that house, if you wish to help them win the victory over the demons. I cannot see a thing in the dark and I can tell things as, even while they sleep. If they are not angel possessed Prince things can come to a pass that such things as the evil phenomena can spread. Did you not know that?"

"Yes," said the Prince, "but if you awaken them you'll not be able to detect anything either, I believe."

"I don't think I will awaken them by a mere candle light if, hold it high so it don't give glare in their faces. I must know for sure. The other things I have heard do not sound really angel possession, only miraculous intervention from God himself."

It however took considerable coaxing before Perrod would finally yield. Finally he consented but reluctantly and the Cardinal himself took the lighted candle and held it high but close enough so that he could see the two little girls. He was looking on Violet and Joice. He then slowly passed from one of the other who did not say anything while he did this, but when he came to Jennie he awoke her up. She alone was not sound asleep like her sisters were. At first she thought it was an apparition and sat right up in bed pulling from her a pillow and a cushion. But when she saw it was the two priests and Angelina Aronau she sobered up, lost her anger and asked:

"What's the matter with us in trouble too here?"

"No," whispered the Bishop. "To tell the truth we were looking for traces of angel possession while you sleep. We looked your sisters over but you awoke."

"How could you tell it in our sleep?" she whispered in return and she smiled sweetly at him. Oh, the Heavenliness of that childish angelic smile. The Bishop and the Cardinal surely evidenced the angel in that for even the sweetest children could not give so heavenly a smile.

"Early enough. I'll tell you and your sisters to morrow. Better go to sleep now for we do not wish to wake up your sisters."

He laid his down playfully and then kissing on her on the forehead the three left the room slowly and quietly and slowly closed the door. Evans was sitting in his big chair near the table waiting and he looked inquiringly at them as they came out.

"Well what did you find out?" the General asked.

"It was hard to tell at because there was no sufficient light. We'll make a better look when it gets to be morning and they are still asleep. I tried by the candle and awoke Jennie. But we did feel strange while we were in there. Didn't you too little girl?"

"I felt sort of good and when they call it like you were in the presence of something you do not like to leave."

The Bishop looked at his wrist watch and found it was only half past Ten. "Who is the head of this house whether you are here or not?" the Bishop asked of General Evans.

"Evans merely with a jerk of his head indicated a big picture hanging on the wall. The Bishop and the Cardinal looked at it and then smiled.

"I know but I mean the human head of this house."

"I suppose I have to admit that, am I right?" asked Evans.

"I would suggest why not destroy that old house and have you little Princesses occupy this place instead. Then we would not neither bother with the Phenomena any more."

"I suppose you are afraid to go into that house again eh?"

"No it is not that. I'm only suggesting that because we do not succeed to morrow night in our efforts. It only happens when it is God's will you know. Humans do nothing without His will because they can't and ain't allowed. For all we know they'd be possessing that place and when your little charges were there they'd have been glad to go for good but probably dissent. They were really afraid of the little girls and no doubt would give anything to get themselves but couldn't help themselves. We know the prayers don't command the demons to go. That is up to Our Blessed Lord if it is His will to order them off instead. If we don't succeed then we must be assigned and let the place go for good."

"Then you mean positively the place really is possessed without doubt?"

Evans demanded.

"Do you doubt the testimony of the little Princesses?"

"I'll tell you what," said Evans. "If you say that place is possessed by evil spirits you try and get that building destroyed?"

"Try and get that building destroyed. Why it's simple. Put up a good battery of cannon and let the building have a broadside of shells."

"Oh I see. And you'll see the evil spirits putting a hook on your planes right then and there. Violet told me it was attempted, by fire and by shooting of cannons and that building still is unharmed. If you think you can do it go ahead."

"No objection then?"

"No," said the Cardinal. "If you wish I'll even mount the cannons for you."

"Oh so you defy me to have it done," said the Cardinal almost scornfully.

"Well I'll show you, come ahead. Say little girl what are you smiling about?"

"Oh now Cardinal that's ridiculous," said Angelina Aronau. "Don't waste your time for it was tried. It was ordered to be done by General Evans. All those who tried to apply fire to the shells were either mystically knocked down by unseen hands or the shells thrown or pulled out of their hands or flung at them."

Artfully with solid shot was tried and the shots were hurled off their course by the unseen power. powers. Then they tried not a gun to hurl big shells. though it was proved absolutely the guns were in good conditions they wouldn't work. The gunners were dumbfounded and didn't know what happened. They examined the casements and got scared. They knew positively they had loaded the guns with high explosive gang-gang shells. When they opened the casements the shells were not there. A phenomena worked on their guns. Even the shells on the carts were gone. You can't destroy the house. Ask General Evans. I saw the whole detail and know. Even the demons have thrown stones at the house when the little girls were in the building. But if you try that you'll get knocked down."

"I never heard of such a thing before," said the Cardinal. "Just for experiment I have a mind to try it."

"No, no please don't try to do it," said Angelina Aronau. "If the guns do go off that big boom will awaken the little girls and they'll think an attack is made upon us. If you wish we'll try it to morrow. But we might do it now."

"If they're fooled they may be offended."

"But if you intend so audaciously to rout the demons out of the building and you say it can only be God's will if they do go, why do you wish to find out if Violet and her sisters are so really angel possessed?" asked General Evans.

"Because if they really are I must have their full co-operation in the work, as work as they are the ones so annoyed by them," said the Cardinal.

"But if you think God may not will it to send the fiends away, how do you expect co-operation from the little girls just because they're angel possessed and such?" said the General.

"Oh sure because of that and what the little girls are. Our Blessed Lord may listen to their pleadings more than our," said the Cardinal. "Little children always can touch His Heart more than us grown ups."

"I believe you are right at that," said Evans. "But suppose it is God's will that my change abdon that house and leave the crazy fiends to themselves."

"We can find that out by whether our gods avail or not. We must show our Faith you know. If they chose to have that building for their headquarters the Princesses have a more right to that place than the fiends have."

"But the fiends were there before they came."

"That doesn't matter."

"Well I guess," said Evans. "I'll go over and have a look at the old place. You two may come with me if you so desire. I'm game. do not need to take any chances of going into the building but in case I do I'll carry this crucifix with me and this bottle of Holy Water. I'll bring you and standing better go to bed. Our interview is over for to night. Keep the little angels in there company."

"The two were glad to obey. Though not scared they did not wish going up in that night into that dreadful place. However Evans and the Bishop didn't know the way to the place as he especially had not known it even existed. So finally though reluctantly he had to charge his mind and ask Angelina Aronau. "Abraham! Amonburg to direct the way to our home but did not need to go in. he however was willing to do so, and in fifteen minutes having gone on he was back they were dimounted at the gate of the house. ynd. Despite that it was so troubled it certainly was a handsome house and made of wood. It was three stories high the attic almost making four. It was about a hundred and fifty feet long and half that in width. The slanting roof was steep and high and it had a chimney at both ends of the same form and height. The front windows were very big and high. There was no forboding appearance of the building neither could they see anything wrong anywhere."

"What's this standing near the gate on the outside?" asked Evans in surprise.

He turned on his big pocket flashlight and saw a sign board standing upright. It read the words in big capital letters of red color:

"WARNING:
THIS HOUSE IS DANGEROUSLY POSSESSED BY EVIL SPIRITS.
ENTER AT YOUR PERIL."

SIGNED VINIANGIL PRINCESSES. 110

"I believe it is best for us not to go in until they are with us," said the general. "If this sign is made by the little girls it is a dread warning. I don't like the way it sounds."

"But you have the crucifix," said Angelina Aronburg. "Yes but the evil spirits can work at a distance," said the general. "They're treacherous. Even the yard is possessed if the house is. See that line of rope stretched there. That is a sign that is all the near-ecuriously seekers have allowed to go in case a phenomena occurs. If it wasn't for the sign and what the little girls told me, I would believe believe that was all hush. But no one can doubt them and they sure didn't dream it. Of course I'm game enough to try it but you see that sign is also a command. No one is allowed to go into that building."

"But you are the guardian and have the say and am over them," said the Bishop.

"I'm in equal rank with them," said Evans. "Why should I disregard that sign. Something may happen that we'll regret. Remember we are not angel possessed good as we are. Every body don't get that you know. And we'd take chances going in when the little girls are not with us. Nothing doing. I do not wish for any phenomena about me when I'm in a closed room of that house. I just came to see the house and this is as far as I go."

"I should say it is as far as you should go."

"They were dreadfully startled for the voice seemed to come as if from the gate, and yet they saw nothing in the strong moon light."

"But Evans did not fear who ever it was for he only said: 'Who ever you are hold your tongue. I'm not asking for your opinion and I'm not afraid to go in. I'm only obeying orders. If you defy me I'll get permission and do my best to rout you out myself.'"

However there came no answer.

"I believe it was one of the guards who are around here to keep any one from going in," said Angelina Aronburg. "No matter who we are the guards wouldn't let us pass the gate without the permission of the Princesses."

"If there is a guard, I don't see any," said Evans looking around closely with the help of his flashlight. "There is surely no guard at the gate. I can see that. But come let us go back to our head quarters. We are out here longer than is necessary. We will have lots to do to morrow."

The four moved away mounted their horses which they left at some distance and rode back toward their room headquarters. They reached their headquarters without any events and then as there was nothing to do they turned in. The Bishop and the Cardinal being given quarters there too. Though the other three still remained asleep the Cardinal and the Bishop got up just before daylight. It was always their rising hour any how about a quarter to five (not five). They decided too to have a look at the little girls while the day light would reveal their faces and then they could tell if there was anything unusual about them. He had been or they had been informed that the little girls were early risers on many occasions but for the reason that the two wished to see them while asleep. Penrod had been warned not to awaken them in case he got up first. On occasion in April (or spill) it got a day light much earlier in the morning and therefore it was pretty light now but not as light as they wished it to be. He hoped to be able to see them soon however for they would soon be up as he knew the little girls were over-anxious for the Masses to begin in the Possessed house. They loved more than anything else to attend and hear Mass, and six Masses wouldn't be enough. The two waited until it was at least six o'clock in the morning when it was light and then slowly they stole their way into the room. To their surprise Penrod was not in bed not even in the room. He had got up early and gone out. He needed to get up early to make ready to fulfill his necessary plans. Violet, and her sisters were still asleep. Some of them were lying on their backs this time but only three. But nevertheless the two could see them very plainly this time especially their faces. The Bishop and the Cardinal did not say anything, even to each other but looked at them quite a while and then softly went out.

At the moment however when they closed the door one of the little girls happened to wake up, and seeing it was day light, and observing the time on the clock got up to call her sisters forth. Bellowed she and they were sleeping over time. Evans had just come into the bigger room as the two stepped out of the Princesses sleeping room.

"Well did you see anything unusual when you were in there? There?" the general asked.

"I am convinced without further investigation," said the Cardinal. "I believe they will be a great help to us. We're not going to wait until night to clear the building. Before we have breakfast the Masses must be sung. They're to be High Masses plain."

CHAPTER 10 TEN.

THE EFFORTS TO ROUT THE EVIL ONES, AND THE RESULTS. "AY (C).":

The entrance of the house was not so difficult as supposed, and even Evans accompanied them. To their joy and surprise the stairs set up in every room for the Masses had not been tampered with, and neither had the guards in those rooms been interfered with or molested, though they stated they did hear plenty of noise and clamor in the hall ways. Evans and Violet and her sisters were fearful however of the evil spirits being able to start something that would prevent the Bishop and Cardinal and the four priests from saying the Masses, but it was evidently through the sprinkling of the Holy Water as they came in that caused nothing to happen that would interfere with even their entrance to the various rooms. Neither did they come any interference when the High Masses began.

The little girls sang beautifully to the Accompaniments of the Mass and for neither them or the Bishops and priests there was no hurry about it either. At the proper time the attendants and violet, and her sisters received their daily Holy Communion, all except Jack Evans. The fact is he couldn't as he had received his at the earlier Mass in the Military Army church at which he attended. For what he needed to do he needed an earlier breakfast.

Penrod said before he went as Altar boy to the Cardinal at the Cardinals request, while some of the other boys boy scouts saw the rest. The whole Mass lasted an hour. Then led by the Cardinal the general Blessing of the evening, and the Mass of the place was added and the Cardinal followed by the Bishop and the priests made the rounds of the room and the yards four times, and even using the smoking incense. All these proceedings took about two hours and a half. This was hoped to stop the phenomena if it was God's will for the sake of at least violet and her sisters. A procession of Boy and Girl scouts followed the Cardinal and Bishop through the yards of the house. Then the Solemn Ceremony ended with the general sprinkling of holy water in every room and in the yard.

After this was over the Cardinal said: "Now we can have our dinner. It lasted so long that we all missed breakfast. Then all of us must remain within the house to see whether the Phenomena stops all right. Where is the Lady of the house?"

"They have gone," said Violet. "They were secured at the Phenomena that they said they wouldn't remain another minute."

"I guess I don't blame them," said General Evans. "To find out how we stand within the building about having our dinner prepared in the kitchen. I can cook it."

That was agreed to and just by the right time dinner was prepared in the dining room (not the room) in the front part of the place and every one took their places and had just the most dinner that General Evans knows how to cook, and nothing happened to interfere with it either. But violet jokingly asked her brother Penrod why he slipped her fork into her waist pocket.

"I didn't put it there," said Penrod and as she looked at him she could see that he was telling the truth and she feared it might after all be a continuation of the phenomena, and that he hoped for the ending of it would be dashed to pieces. She made a remark to the Cardinal about the mysterious placing of the fork in her waist pocket and then he looked mystified. But said nothing but he kept his eye on everything but nothing more happened and they began to believe the fork may have slipped in from the table by a mere accident. They all enjoyed a good dinner and after it was over and Evans was said Penrod decided to wash the dishes and to of the little girls were to dry them. The only place the dishes could be washed was in the kitchen.

"What is the trouble?" said Penrod. "I can't get any water."

"Maybe it's another phenomena," said Jennie looking worried.

"I don't believe so," said Joice. "He had the water turned off since the water phenomena and it has been off ever since. Go Catharine and ask Evans to turn it on."

She did so and as he did not know where it was turned on she showed him the room, and soon the water came on. Penrod had some trouble washing the dishes as he didn't take time to make hot water but finally they were all cleaned and put away neatly. Every thing was all right now so far as no other other phenomena occurred and now violet and her sisters felt quiet as they had nothing to do they decided to remain in the house until the time for Benediction came. Then they would go to bed early and see whether they could sleep in peace. A. J. J. J.

Violet and her sisters themselves donned old clothes and so did Penrod and between them with Angelina A. Cuba helped helping they worked hard that a new moon coming and all the moon and also the Huk making everything sparkling clean again. For that age Violet and her sisters were a very good little women, never lazy and they would do anything for anybody just besides themselves. All during the time they worked nothing occurred, they were allowed to do everything in peace and quiet and often while working they even did a little singing by themselves.

Finally when they were all through with the cleaning, and it was mostly scrubbing the floors on their hands and knees, they washed and cleaned themselves up and waited for Evans to come back again and make up their supper. They decided to have their supper at six and Benediction would be administered in all the rooms at seven forty five. Evans came soon, than expected and made the preparations for supper, and had brought with him a good sized bag of oranges he found Violet and her sisters were always very fond of the fruit....

be cause Violet and he sister were always very fond of chocolate. He also brought chocolate covered raisins because Violet and he sister loved that and especially chocolate but it must be chocolate and nothing else with it. Ordinary soups and other sweet meats and things they were never very fond of like most other child - an are but sweet foods did not suit their taste. The only kind of pie they would eat was Apple. And that not very often. Evans cooked plenty of whole some things for that supper and though it was a little late they all had a good supper nevertheless, and then late followed Benediction at the regular time.

Glad to say however after this the place was never troubled again. The evil spirits had flown..

THE BATTLE OF WISKEY BAY AGAIN AND THE CHRISTIAN FAILURE.....

LANDMELINIAN FLEETS OF WARSHIPS had during the meanwhile in three desperate battles in the Abbeinnian inlands seized the fortifications and destroyed the forts that were there and simultaneously a christian storm of batt le advanced for another time into icy way to capture all the landmelinian ships and to carry the fortifications if possible. As the foolish christian ships approach the landmelinian fleets the landmelinian admiral said: Landmelinian said
"My noble officers and men, our enemies are almost within our grasp and at the gates of doom. Make ready to attack them."
The christian fleet began to spread out like two great wings of some

The gn Glandelinian fleets began to spread out like two great wings of some wild geese and at a distance of three thousand two hundred and fifty yards while the christian ships were already seen in their ridiculous batt le formation more like the scales of a fish on a ship overlapping the other a fine target indeed a fire athe distance between the glandelinian fleets and those of their enemy were shortened to two hundred and two thousand to five hundred yards. In a moment there came a white burst of smoke from the glandelinian ship Concentric, followed a few minutes by a roaring gun fire from every glandelinian vessel and the thunders of the cannons seemed to vibrate about as bus had as the time when the other attacks had been going on when five hundred thousand cannon were in action. At this several of the Angellian battle ships lost the top of their mast. It was a good lively firing but to high and no damage was done. The battle now became general. Angellian vessels began to appear in the distance, and the enemy's ships on the gl d landlin and soon it was surrounded by a fog of smoke and flames. Masses on masses of it rose and then loud explosions and flames were seen leaping out all over the landlinian ship. A shell had been placed in its main powder magazine. The other landlinian ships in the action about four hundred and of them in number within an hour were in general action firing as fast and as well as they knew how but however the fire of the Angellian battle ships as at answered with much better effect. When the conflict had lasted for fully two hours the landlinian prote ted ship circulation had wa wasted much ammunition by had shooting and seeing that it was getting baten it withdrew, and because of its spend failed to escape - but two of the fastest Angellian vessels the Rva and the Deep followed swiftly firing with deadly aim and their shells did great

After a great battle at McHollister once more in which the fierce victorious Manley's armies recrossed the Angelina river but nevertheless during he lost of the frightful masses violent being slightly wounded had been seized some of Federal men and buried up to the neck in sand and left to die alone from raving thirst. She was already scorched by the terrible heat and appalled by her terrible fate she wept and prayed aloud. The hat was terrific indeed worse than ever and seemed to burn her to the very marrow of her bones the sand falling like hot coals. Even her thirst became excruciating. The wind blew and howled ceaselessly hot coals. Even her throat became driving about so slowly but surley the low sand hills.

Here there was no vegetation no shade. The cruel wind seemed to render the un still more scorching and the air was absolutely stifling while the constantly oving sands made a sound like rain as if in pitiless mockery of the unhappy child raving for a drop of water. Water. The very thought of it almost made her demented er swollen tongue hanging out of her mouth. All things looked back though distinct o her in the brilliant sunshine. Water or water, water. "She tried to cry but even the words would not come from her swollen lips and in her insane desire for water he attempted to drink for it with her tongue in the burning soil. Wildly frantically he lapped with her tongue until it was torn and bleeding.

It was a whole week after this when Violet finally awoke as if out of a night are to find he self lying in a comfortable bed in a cool cosy room with six small hite figures sitting beside her. At the other side of the room two kindly men are standing together near a window but it all seemed strange and unreal to her and when she tried to speak her voice was so weak it was scarcely more than a whisper as she murmured;

 "Where am I?"

aint as it was the sound she made reached general 'loro viviania, the other viviania having had his command to ken from him for his refusal to advance, and he came swiftly to her bedside.

"You are safe in a great christian generals headquarters." Violet dear. "He answered ind tenderly; "But you have been very sick and you must be still and not peak just now."

the next day violet being better learned a ll the truth. Kjustas she was lapping the and with her tongue a division of Angellinan soldiers golf across the dannerthappen ed to pass that way and discovering her had rec rescued her in due time and that forward she had been hovering between life and death for a week."

The barbarity the murderous cruelty, and the utter horror which may be called the by-products of this great GLANDOLINIAN WAR-- were any day being more vividly impressed on the consciousness of the American world. Mankind were continually being becoming used to the acts and methods of wholesale slaughter perpetrated by the warring armies of "Lavinia until" deeds that could have aroused the horror and wrath of nations were now passed over by the Glandolinians. It was a mere necessary accompaniment of warfare. But even Lavinia accustomed to wars barbarity turned appalled at the reports of the wanton ravages which with the Christian fugitives had been handled by the oppressive Indolindin Glandolinian hordes and above all others things by the reports of the wholesale sale and massacre of the Christians of southern towns and cities at the hands of the advancing Glandolinians under Federal the human "Tornado" and other Glandolinian generals.

The glaudelinians had killed in the most horrible descriptions already more than three hundred thousand women four hundred thousand men and nearly a million children and made nine million six hundred thousand homeless. It is as though a horde of ferocious demons descended upon christianity slaughtering all they attacked annihilating its towns villages and cities and leaving the whole terror stricken a desolate waste. The massacres had been attended even by all the savagery of the glaudelinian leaders, high uppeled the soldiers aided by main force to deeds of rapine and hellish tortures. There by products of the glaudelo-angelinian war were pre peculiarly horrifying to the humane mind because they had not the scant excuse of helping to deter into the final results. The glaudelo angelinian war could not be settled by the glaudelinian campaign of murder and rapine against the defenseless christian children of both angelinia and galvernia. Yateven in the midst of the rare for slaughter that animated federal armies it would be well for the states of abheleandian cambodia and tripoligonlia and for all christian nations to endeavor earnestly to restrain federal from making any more bloody massacres more savage than ever characterized the stoia or amochers. And was it not necessary for these sister states of angelinia and abheleandian to stand aloof and silent when humanity was thus being outraged for no possibly military needs? Did the pitiful appeal of helpless christian women and children condemned to hellish outrage, slavery or death at the hands of the sanguinary glaudelinians awake in no response from the great hearts of the sister states? Had the states which in eighteen forty one hanged glaudelinia to its knees because of the same horrors existing in galvernia nothing to say of the present TORNADO TORNADO and HELL of hatred and slaughter which the present TORNADO TORNADO and HPLI, of hatred and slaughter which Federal had let loose upon the helpless non-combatants. No and they had been exhausting all their efforts doing something and if it had not been for the Angelina would have been beaten long ago. In a few more days after the Battle of McHollister run six hundred thou. and more in the west had been driven from their homesost of them to die. Aton a point ten thousand children captured by the Grandellians went through horrors and rapine sinful to picture and sinful to relate and because they were christians. Villages and towns with their populations were burned. BARBARICUSINEST IAL? Yes but it was part and not an inconsistent part of the recent cities which had been shelled in the west.

The wreckage of the cities of southern California as stated before had never been so unintermingled with bloody bodies of victims as here in the west. In the lanes outside the city of Catherineia could be seen enormous craters in which many soldiers during battles already past had been buried by falling earth. Here and there only a hoot had protruded. So frightful had been the carnage at the battle of Mc-Whinther Run that thousands had fallen every minute along one small objective line and thousands a minute. The human mind could scarcely grasp the idea, the idea of such slaughter, and the imagination balked at the efforts to picture it. Whole columns of men during the battle had been literally blasted by high explosives, mowed down by machine guns seared with ever liquid flames or cut to pieces with cold steel and shrapnell. One of the most terrific features of the battle of Mc-Whinther run were the numbers of artillery men driven mad by the terrific almost preternatural cannonade. General Manley had declared that during the final last onslaught of his forces they came upon groups huddled around their guns which they made no efforts to serve. Some were dumb deaf and crazed, the teeth of others shattered while the others screamed wildly. The shouts of the Indochinese landmines had mingled with the screams of the tiger infuoa infuriated Angelinians they plunged into the purple river of death in which many on the front contending fons had slatched one another by the necks in a desperate death grip. With an exaggeration during the second battle of McWhirther Ramin a female one of the furious quicksands to become the scene of action would have been found as long of bodies as the sides. During the bombardment of the city of McWhirther a gang-gangfell had struck a small three story orphan asylum and though its volcanic eruption like explosion virtually left no vestige of the tower the sights of the company, the mangled remains of legs, arms, heads, etc., etc., a ghastly and horrible scene, very disgusting and horrible. Sister Mild had face in shame and horror. To violent and her sisters it was indeed a sight. They had seen massacre after massacre of great Indian waves by scores at times, the engines of destruction, the guns and high explosives the huge clandestine armies now deluging the Christian works with horror and slaughter only to go back shattered and with losses of three quarters of their numbers made them sick.

Even when the landolins had won the battle they had indeed made the most ghastly sight the land had ever seen. Every city or town was blood red. Every where as far as eye could reach was blood and mangled bodies of the victims, groans and tears, charred bones and smoking fields the groans curses and weeping of the wounded and the murdered children and the million voiced interplay to the heavens. It was a scene of earthly hell and along the ridges of the back ground thick smoke hung as heavy as a nap pall of death and hell shutting out the light of the sky. All the foreground was strewn with the children corpses stark naked and open and all the network of intensities and broken machinery of war, and in the mist but visible to the horrified little girls is a Christ haloed and silhouetted against the dark scene; his right hand screening his bowed and weeping eyes.

Notwithstanding all this misadventure Federal had not been satisfied unless he should start a blazing hill of fire among the Angelinian jungles. A number of day days had already passed when violet and her sisters being out on a scouting tour noticed far ahead of them what appeared to be a solid wall of approaching smoke smoke clouds. At the same time they saw a snowy stream of flame plunging down a long ridge, till the very sky was covered with ascending mountains of smoke clouds. Violet and her sisters wore clothes were covered with dust. Their hair tangled being loose unheld only by a band. Suddenly violet stole a frowning frightened glance toward the snowy stream of fire and saw that it really was a big sea of flames and that on account of some obstruction in its path had divided into two advancing fire oceans, one part a hissing avalanche toward where they stood, and this was what made the appearance of the wall of smoke far in front of them.

Even from where they were they could feel the heat. A little boy was standing by Violet's side staring innocently into her face as she said in terror terror:

"O, oh lets go away at once; 'I'm afraid that advancing sea of fire will get us."

"Yes I guess we will have to go away," said Joice; "Or we will be overwhelmed and perish."

'Where shall we go if we:-----'

Jennin was interrupted by a soldier who came running up from the direction of the approaching conflagration followed by another who accidently seized his companion roughly as he tripped and fell.

"Come before the fiery sea catches us." Said Violet. And away they went, reeling the christian lines and gic giving the warnings. Federal had started this to cover his horrible crimes, what was what Hanson s. Hansonia had said who was far from the army at this time fighting the flames with the help of thousands of soldiers.

"Dat thut damn fool of a Federal anyway;""It would be a good thing if he was burn ing in hell the old he devil.""

In the meantime general Noro Vivianina had occupied the advancing tornado of war moving his way but a part of Hannsonias army had been hit by the force conflagration and his armies though fighting the flames bravely were slowly but surely driven back by it inch by inch.

Large Abbeinnian and Calvinian forces were now moving down southward the reconquering first moved toward wickey Annula and had also progressed along the region of the Julo Gallio railroad lines. Fresh Glandelinian and Concentinian armies were marching to meet the invaders but no fighting as yet was resulting for the outcome and which was believed to precipitate the crisis looked for. Big Abbeinnian forces were also advancing to the help of general Noro Vivianian who was pushing Huebaum Manley steadily northward and harassing his army cruelly for repay of the horrible damage done. General Vivianian had made an effort to surround Federalismain offender but by fighting he & his pursuers at the terrible battle of Granier Federal had succeeded in drawing away leaving however as prizes in general Noro Vivianian hands, one million prisoners, ammunition baggage supplies and sacrificed lives. Federal being separated from Huebaum Manley destroyed networks of rail, railroad tracks and blow up bridges to check general Noro Vivianian's advance and learning that a force of Calvinianians under Connelly was advancing to intercept him laid everything in waste behind him baffling Hansonian his main pursuer again and again.

It was one night when the little girls out scouting with Evans were again amazed to discover that other forest fire were approaching upon Hansonian army and as they watched the scene there came such an earsplitting roar as if the heavens were aflame, and the little girls saw that they must fly.

"If we stay here much longer we will surely perish." Said Catherine.
"Hark you crashing trees, hark you agonizing cries." Said Daisy. "Not a moment is to be lost if we value our lives."

In a few minutes the little girls were pacing the brilliant and smoke filled woods even then the darkness that covered the heavens increased rapidly so rapidly that it was with a difficulty they could guide their steps.

Already so dense was the reeking atmosphere that they could hardly see each other. At the little girls hastened onward. Onward also whether! The now could not see a step before them the blackness becoming utter; like the darkness of erabus the little girls becoming accompanied with doubt and horror at this sudden and horrible did disaster.

The darkness was now complete.

"Goodness how the darkness is gathering." Gasped Violet clinging to a tree.

At this moment sudden blazes of lurid light pierced the black canopy darting and quivering in many directions, while through the clouds a transparent veil of red light flashed luminously a crimson and burning hue which played and darted coruscations of vivid light and a sheet of lurid glows followed the cloud itself looking like some vast giant with arms outstretched over the burning scene. It was astonishing distant distinct the giant shaped cloud like the other conflagration seeming to be seated on the brow of a small ridge the different shades appearing to form a white robe that swept over the vast breast and limbs, it seemed to gaze forth with a steady face upon the fleeing little Vivianian girls to point with one hand over his plaiting hair and to raise the other toward the higher heavens. It was like the ghost of some huge titan brooding over the beautiful little girls and pitying their sorrow for their past miseries, yet with something of meanness for the future.

3 FED. RAJ. PLACES A SEA OF FIRE BETWEEN HIMSELF AND NON NORO VIVIANIA. THE RESULT. ..

This part of the manuscript my dear readers bears a large portion of the northwestern and western drama of war waged between Noro Vivianian and Huebaum Manley and other Glandelinian and Christian forces under various leaders. Here the Glandelinians try with all their might to drive the Angelinians out of Calvinian but without success despite their victory at Aronburgs run which they won. Here we saw some of the bloodiest battles of the Glandeco-Angelinian war waged simultaneously and successively with Vivianian and Johnston Manley, in the Angelinian against campaigns. These battles as we must bear in mind taking two more entire volumes to fill were many Glandelinian victories terminating into literal massacres in some places.

The bloody battles of Buna Vista, McHolliste and Aronburg Run were some of the deadliest conflicts of the Calvinian campaigns but finally ending with the evacuations of the Angelinian armies from the regions of the southwest the army advancing with relentless fury. These volumes show some of the saddest scenes of the entire war; with the most frightful conflagrations ever imagined, and the threatening downfall of Angelinia with the deformities of their state Calvinian. There are certain Aronburg mysteries relating to the murder of that child, the disappearance of certain pictures lost by Harper which are predicted to cause the downfall of the Christian nation if the pictures are not returned to him within a certain length of time.

Whether such predictions really are true or not there had been signs already as already predicted in the recent chapters. No one can perceive of the violence of the predicted battles between Noro and Huebaum Manley. While general Angelic Vivianian is repelling general Manley's desperate drive on Angelinia against Huebaum Manley's desperate move to take Julo Gallio it with all the available forces he can bring to bear against the advancing forces of Christians under Noro Vivianian. In the battle of Aronburg Run which is the bloodiest contest in the north west and one of the bloodiest battles of the war a tragedy ensues. In the fury of the battle the Huebaum Manley through the means of Federal's desperate onslaughts annihilates Noro Vivianian's right wing which is in command of Hansonian. In trying to rally the lawless and rickety survivors Hansonian receives a wound which proves mortal. Despite all this frightful carnage which makes a greater din than any fighting at Vivianian wickey with the Glandelinian forts and Christian fleets when for hours the safety of the Christian armies trembles in the balance the advance of the foe is at one point firmly checked after terrible insane slaughter but general Huebaum Manley finding that Vivianian is impaired in strength immediately resumes the mighty contest after an hour's lull and soon general Noro Vivianian is routed. Aronburg Run is almost as severe as Big Beppo or Henrett which happened a month later between Whillinsburger Zimmermann and general John Manley but more disastrous in consequences as Noro's right wing was annihilated. It was Tomas Federal and Tamarlane who helped general Raymond Federal to do it but Thomas McWhirther a very superior Christian general by his skill and firmness saves the day though he is finally mortally wounded.

Suddenly like a strange sudden apparition there shot nine meteoric lurid lights which trembled and trembled and were gone. Then along the whole sky shot queer light lightest meteor like now and then as the smoke crackled along the ruffled and dark and now snow leaped fiercely to and fro darting across the vast clouds in wild convulsions and as suddenly bursting into tenfold brilliancy then suddenly vanished. Violet and her sisters halted to rest a moment and glancing back beheld with ineffable dismay and awe frightfullest rolling clouds swiftly rising and expanding for miles overhead in the form of gigantic wings. The surface as was as black as the blackest ink and the horizon line was of strange fiery colors which shifted and moved in its awful hues with every movement time and again becoming frightfully luminous, now of a dull and dying red, then again and again blazed terrifically forth with the most intolerable intolerable glare.

This they knew was the main stretch of the advancing hell of fire. "This is some more of the work of the devil," said Violet horrified at the sight. "Federal must have done this to prevent the advance of Connelly and general 'Horo' Vivianis; I almost can't help from feeling like a hating that child murderer."

The awful roar of the approaching conflagration was echoed back from the distant hills while the sharper and fiercer detonations of distant explosions mingled with the roar of the fire. At the same time in the woods not as yet reached by the little girls heard the universal shrieks of women and children and the cursing of panic stricken men who came rushing past staring at each other dumbly. In an instant more the terrible and inspiring mountain clouds of the great forest fires seemed to roll forward turning to a terrible blackness with fiery redness toward the horizon and which spread over everything. Frightful showers of sparks mingled with a rain of blazing embers and twigs were carried everywhere by the rising hurricane of encircling wind, setting fire to man, trees, bushes and vines far ahead the awful showers flying far and wide. With ear-splitting yells came a seething crowd of men, women and children who were in a frightful panic trampling recklessly over the fallen dashing madly pressing furiously against the others amid prayers, oaths and groans the terror-mad crowds vomiting itself forth from among the trees and shrubbery as if possessed by a cyclone. Many carried household gods and utensils of every description and Violet and her sisters dreaded the approaching crowds and the showers of embers and sparks that fell like a curtain of snow at intervals continued on hastily while darker and larger and mightier spread the horrid clouds above them.

"The forest fire. The forest fire." Resounded from side to side Violet and her sisters knowing of the dangers of this kind of a forest fire and the clouds which advanced darker and darker and cries and trampling rush of the crowds saw that they must escape at all costs.

"We got to get away somehow," said Violet sittingly; "God is forth coming on the wings of the fire elements and the whole region is really doomed. We must escape ere the advancing fires consume us."

"To the lake we must go," said Janine; "If we stay much longer in these woods we will be surrounded by the fire."

The little girls watched the swiftly approaching fire in terror than on they raced discovering to their right something that seemed like fire anywhere as they entered the smoke clouds. Violet who was now in the lead with her sisters her glittering hair streaming like a golden cataract, now to her left another wall of roaring fire checked temporarily by a wide ravine which was incessantly hidden by volumes of smoke rising to a height exceeding two thousand feet. At one point of the wall of fire was loosing some of its fury but at the right far ahead of the little girls thousands of small fire streams appeared while in the same direction smoke clouds poured up in unlimited quantities while strong glowing lights pierced them continually. Hot fumes were rising everywhere and as the little girls progressed on toward the light of the approaching forest fires became brighter and nearer. Strange gases were continually filling the air and through the black clouds of smoke shooting columns of flames extended to a great height, and the amount of the size of the forest fire was immense being the size of Lake Michigan in width and length the volume of which during its progress being continually doubled and advancing upon the war-torn battered cities like an avalanche of fire.

One of the dangerous torrents of fire occupying the width of the great Mississippi river was burning on toward the city of Mado Weldon with an indescribable roar turning away everything that obstructed its course. The other streams of the immense masses fire swelled to an immense volume and the fiery river roaring with turbulent fury and rage swept down in the ridge and into the valley burning many towns and villages in its path.

At the same time another terrible sea of fire burning with swift speed precipitated itself down a sheer fall of seventy feet, while another great column of flame drawn all to the center and contracting its flanks made one tremendous charge and turned its way through the opposing obstructions. Onward still onward progressed the flames the flaming tongues hurling themselves wildly into the air like so many curtains.

Other gigantic streams of fire dashed over more stupendous ravines advancing madly toward the straits of jungles and forests and more by the long streams of moss moss the roaring of the flames or the conflagration being frightful and it was advancing as fast as a tornado itself. As Violet and her sisters continued on their flight strong winds were rising first in squalls which almost smothered them with the driving clouds of smoke. The buffeting of the wind was indescribable the effect being like actual blows of the fist. For ceding onward the little girls came upon a round torrent of flame streams which they tried to burst through but were immediately thrown to the ground by a gust of wind. The furious speed of the fire streams became for miles around a raging hell. The line of flames extending from the Norma, soon to the Julo Chilio rivers and was advancing and burning so furiously that the center was heaped up like a moving mountain of hell fire the glowing waves of flame leaning on every side into the air like great tongues the fiercest fire storm pile swarming over them and driving their forest into the air like showers of fiery spray.

Even great logs and swayed trees came dashing down nearly the little girls taking leaps like pyramids. The depth of the fire flood appeared to be very great with the volume of smoke actually heaped up like a great ridge from which glowing waves thrown into the air in the very fullness of its rushing fury seemed to singe the sides far over them. The flames fairly fairly hissed and roared like cannons as they undulated, seethed, and writhed, a waves of fire tongues seemed to have life of their own and to be animated with dangerous fury. At certain points of a series of fire whirlpools were formed which sucked down flaming trees top foremost in an instant and instantly to vomit them out with every vestige of bark and branches turned away and consumed altogether.

At points where these terrible whirlpools of fire raged the scene was terrific the fire lashing, raging, seething currents of seething flames opposed greater currents, waves of flame fighting wave with hideous uproar. Sometimes an advancing wave was forced into the air by a fierce collision with another from an opposing direction and was broken into masses of roaring tongues which the fire hurricane drove in sheets of fire tongues before it on toward the untouched forest.

The furious waves of fire seemed to toss in every direction and at the same time were forced forward by the irresistible gale.

The forest clouds of smoke as the full fury of the flames reached the unburned portions was wonderful. They seemed mounting to indescribable heights to engulf anything living in the raging abysses of flame. They came wreathing up like exhausted lions from an incubator of den twisting their elms into fantastic shapes that seemed to stretch forth arms to seize the fleeing little girls and all the flames tongues and deafening turmoil and roar. The torrents of fiery tongues that incessantly rose into the air were wonderful to behold and the consciousness of the roar produced corresponding currents of air which beat and buffeted and twirled tremendous as if they were without the power of resistance. Indeed the columns of fiery tongues were drifting and expanding madly in every direction. First a torrent would pour across a ravine another would descend upon a great woods not as yet reached by the flames, the third third came driving across the river in great clouds of flame a fourth with an insidious snail twist moved to consume the bushes and the fire storm of wind flew with such violence that myriads of trees crashed to the ground.

All the while Violet and her sisters were stunned by a demonic cry of sound.

All the white violet and her sisters were stunned by a demoniacal array of sounds. The wind of the fire storm was fairly shrieking, screaming, howling, howling, howling, and roaring in all sorts of different notes while a cover all dominated the deep.

Leading rows of hundreds of thousands of trees as they stretched to the ground revealing the hollow sounds of the approaching conflagration. Between the advancing forest fires to the rear of the little girls great hemlocks and rubber trees with fine branches whose trunks were not blazing like cypresses bent at a most perilous angle and hanging over to their own expected and imminent fall when they turned through. As the little girls tried to run as fast as they tried to rise by the force of the windstorm which increased furiously made slow progress.

If any at all could not hear more plainly the mad furious roaring of the approaching fire and see its further waves of tumultuous flames while far in advance of them along the treacherous there was already a huge extravagant seething stretch of flames while below was a wall of whirling shifting flames which poured across a ravine with a tremendous roar stretching in thick glowing sheets of dazzling brightness way across the open plain forming a horrifying sky of flames. Close to the bank of the Pullaway river of which the violet girls observed in awe was the greatest of the main sea of fire. For here the gross volume of flames of fiery billows formed in one tremendous wall the surface of which was lapped and forward into the air and across the sky the very sky being full of floating clouds and as seething seas of flame. A score of buildings in the city of Oriskany was not only left by the flames and three outlying business districts were threatened with destruction when Glorinda was hemmed in by the great walls of seething flames advancing upon it. The flames vomited furiously it being one of the most spectacular forest fires ever known the heat being terrific so terrific that the fleeing multitudes were seriously handicapped many accidentally getting into the path of the flames of being overcome by smoke. Across the Pullaway river and 1 larger ravines which extended for miles, a descent on destroying all the houses and villages in its path. Flying fragments were blown in the distance of nearly four rods a second while strong detonational explosions occurred at times like the heaviest of cannon that succeeded each other so rapidly as to produce a continuous roar which cut the ground for many miles in every direction in a constant state of tremor. Along the banks of the Emerald the rush of the conflagration was frightful the flames having the appearance of fiery cirrus clouds stretching across the sky like long delicate streaks of fine spray. The rapid billows of fire grew across the conflagration progressed while into the air from a long long ridge rolled bulging purple black smoke in masses of titanic convulsions and frightful tongues of glowing flame far beyond the upper part of the cloud having a wiled light like the color of carbon.

At other parts of the ridge a pack of fat black clouds rolled up stacking them selves upon one another till they resembled a huge pile of round boulders which a gulf of puff of wind would have thrown down upon the unburned portions of the forest. At length the fire hurricane burst loose in greater fury. A series of more violent blasts rained through the swarming mass of trees like projectiles blowing in redoubled fury and coming a screaming tempest while the sky and the woods was covered and filled with a blizzard of flying sparks and embers.

Never before had there been such an uproar of wind and fire as the wooden houses in the town of Zimmerman already ablaze collapsed like cartboards before the fury of the fire hurricane. Whole houses were picked up bodily and dashed into blazing splinters to the ground blocks away carrying with them the bodies of their occupants. Indeed the very heavens seemed ablaze and the sparks began to rain everywhere. Violet and her sisters paying no attention to the dangers of the fire storm continued onward on their hands and knees, and far in front of the panting little girls there hung a yellow and ominous cloud which pattered darker and darker as they progressed onward. This strange coloring seemed to forewarn the little girls of some danger as assuredly smiting them, some danger violent and sudden, in its nature. Also to their right in the glow of the approaching conflagration a thin and ghastly mist which pattered darker and darker spread in waves across the sky. Then suddenly the whole woods and the whole sky seemed suddenly to become of a dazzling brightness, there was an appalling roar and the little girls looking around saw a horrible wall of fire advancing swiftly toward them roaring like artillery. It was only twelve hundred yards away and the little girls saw that they were in danger of being trapped. The little girls turned this way and that seeking escape. The lake they were heading for was far off yet and they feared that they could never reach it and worse of all the fury of the windstorm had delayed them considerably. The upper sky simultaneously was covered with a mass of black clouds to the surprise of the little girls one part of it rising swiftly was funnel shaped which seemed to protrude from a bigger mass in balloon shape. To their aid had the appearance of a spiral cloud of smoke from a newly formed conflagration and it happened to be so all right it being the general sea of fire which was advancing with a roar which can be compared to the noise of scores upon scores of thousands of trains of cars going through a hollow tunnel at the same time.

The little girls saw that there was no escape however for they would never reach the lake in time and the little girls saw the only chance of throwing themselves into a deep ravine which they did and just in time for all at once there was a storm of swirling snapping trees in the air and the fire ocean passed by to their right filling the air with flame and smoke, and at onepoint the little girls witnessed a regular pillar of fire. The storm of fire however fortunately had not swept their way having swept the ravine but the other section of it was coming and the little girls seeing that it was advancing slower continued on their way together toward the lake in a close group when two mysterious forms appeared at them.

Then other forms in shining uniforms were seen approaching on the run the little girls being surprised by the suddenness of this movement and were hardly prepared to resist so strong a force. In the darkness the little girls could not measure the number of their assailants. They tried to keep close to each other hoping thereby to better withstand the anticipated attack Violet striking out bravely with a branch of a tree and a blow on a man who appeared directly before her. Apparently however murder was not the object of the assault for no attempt was made to disable the little girls or cut them. They were seized in rough arms while dexterous hands wound cloths about their faces effectually preventing an outcry while at the same time their arms were securely pinioned. At that moment an automobile dashed up and the men now lifted the helpless children into the waiting motor car which at once dashed madly down a poorly paved road.

Struggle as they might the little girls were unable to release themselves from their bonds and at length they gave up their useless efforts.

Directly the machine was turned into a smooth road but nevertheless the speed was increased and after ten minutes of swift riding a halt was made. Then dragged from their places like so many sacks of grain the child captives felt themselves hoisted to the shoulder shoulder of their abductors. Judging from the sounds they heard they realized they were being taken into some sort of a building and they were awaited with some considerable anxiety some indication of the next development. This did not take long to come. A package was negotiated followed by a journey down many flights of steps. Then the little girls were presently deposited in not too gentle a manner upon a hard floor. Soon footsteps a retreating up the creaking stairway indicated that they were to be left by themselves. Jennie impatient and frantic efforts to free herself from the gag and bonds interrupted by voice full of venom; "You might as well save your wad little girl; as you will need it all before you get out of this." The little girls heard a final familiar voice say: "You seven little girls are no good at getting out of tight places; so go to it lets see if you can get out of this for once. You escaped massacres at St. Norma, slipped away from Manly many times and escaped Federal but you did it only because you had help. This is different. You can not get any one to help you here. You are in the cellar of an old convent that has been abandoned because it is threatened by the advancing forest fires. One side already is a sea of burning snags and on the other two sides only half a mile away is a sea of advancing warping flames. No one can rescue you is in this locality so you will have lots of time to think it over. Now you will never be able to interfere with Federal plans again like you did when you tried to arrest him. Do you understand?"

In despair the little girls listened and listened to their informants he closed a heavy door. This was barred on the outside and then heavy materials were thrown against it. Then silence reigned. For some time the little girls lay listening for sounds that would indicate the presence of others.

"Suddenly a movement showed that one of the little girls was lifting her position. Then there came a sudden snap followed by a violent exhalation of breath which showed that a struggle was taking place, then the tearing of cloth was heard."

"Gracious," gasped Jennie. "But this was a tough job. Did any of my sisters get loose yet?" She continued taking a stumbling step. Quickly she procured a searchlight from an inner pocket and it was the work of a few moments to find and reel in her other sisters. A great stretching or of arms and indrawing of breath followed this act. All were laid in their extensions of gratITUDE to Jennie and wondered at her ability to break loose from the bonds.

"I guess they did not take the trouble to tie me very tight," explained Jennie modestly, but the abrasions on her bleeding wrists spoke eloquently of the heroic struggle she had made. At this moment all heard a crackling noise and Violet gasped: "This house is on fire."

Jennie gave a gasp of astonishment and rushing toward the window she attempted to secure a view of their surroundings but everything was aglare. Driven before a gust of wind a puff of black smoke entered and causing the little girls to step back choking and coughing.

"Can we crawl through that window Joice?" asked Jennie. "No it's too small," she returned spying the window speculatively. "It would be like suicide to try it."

Four clouds of smoke drifted past the window while the crackling of flames grew momentarily louder. Joice was still by the window the smoke filling her eyes. With every breath she drew in great draughts of air smoke laden air until she was nearly choking.

Just as she poked her head through the opening a gust of wind fanning the glowing fire dashed a burst of flame toward the little girl. She jerked herself back but too late to escape the scorching onslaught and badly lacerated one ear. She escaped with the loss of some of her eyebrows and part of her hair.

"How about that side door?" suggested Violet. "Do you suppose we could batter it down. It may not be as solid as it looks."

"Never can tell until you try," hopefully spoke up Joice of winning the blood from her injured ear. "What shall we use as a battering ram? They failed to leave us anything. This floor is mad of hard packed dirt and there are no boards."

"Look at that fire up there," gasped Angelina excitedly. "The ceiling is burning through and it won't be long before it falls!"

Fire now began dropping from several places in the ceiling while the cellar filled with smoke. The crackling of the flames grew louder as the fire spread the little girls coughing and choking from the smoke they were compelled to inhale. Just as a door gave way before their efforts the fire blazed up with redoubled fury the entire ceiling bursting into flames no doubt augmented by the sudden rush of air through the now wide open doorway. The building was doomed. Bursting through the entrance the little girls noticed that the forest fire was only several hundred yards away and ran for it just as the building caved in with a crashing roar.

As the little girls continued on a loud rattle of musket shots greeted them. The little girls halted and saw men dimly outlined against a half smoldering forest sending no shot after shot in their direction and bullets whistled close to them. Highly incensed the little girls drew their own guns which their kidnappers had not taken away from them and fired. Instantly several screams echoed through the night followed by a return volley. A bullet ripped its way through Violet's hair causing her to jump. Then another volume of shots broke out and Angelina gave utterance to a cry of pain.

"Jennie help," she called. "I'm hit."

Jennie sprang to the aid of her sister noting that blood was flowing freely into Angelina's eyes from a gash in her forehead. Willing hands were extended to Angelina and she drew her behind a tree bandaging the wound. As Jennie worked on more shots rang out followed by shot after shot and Jennie received a scratch in the neck. At the same moment Violet saw a cloud of white smoke and then was startled to see hurtling through the air a large black object and which appeared to be approaching where she and her sisters were. Violet paralyzed with terror at the apparent fate of she and her sisters watched the missile until it fell to the ground but a short distance away. Scarcely had it touched the ground when there was a terrific eruption of smoke dirt and rocks and the ground was shaken and rocked by a mighty explosion and dirt fell all around in showers.

Violet and her sisters had clapped their hands to their ears as the missile fell expecting an explosion but did not suffer the painful shock that otherwise would have been felt. Where the shell had landed there was an immense solid cloud of blue smoke hovering above while an awful odor nearly choked the little girls and they turned to flee as another shell was coming. They hurried to run along a passage way of trees half smoking already, but one of the little girls stumbled on an uneven ground and fell. A shout from somewhere around her. Looking backward she could see a revolver leveled in her direction and Jennie lent no time in scrambling to her feet. Just in time she dodged around an angle in the grove while volley after volley came crashing into the back of trees at her side more men having appeared.

Luckily their aim was poor. In a half panic she raced violently like an earthquake. A burst of air from the rear sent the little girls off their feet while their ears were deafened by a terrific blast that shook the entire surroundings. Scrambling to their feet and glancing back they saw a vast yawning pit where once had been the group of pursuing soldiers. A heavy cloud of smoke hung over the scene. Astonished at the narrow margin by which she had escaped the disaster that had overtaken the men Jennie stood for an instant unable to decide what to do. Then her training prompted her to return to find whatever aid might be in her power to such as needed it but search as she might the child could find no indication of living men. Seemingly having been blown to atoms, and not far from her was a crater about one thousand feet wide and several hundred feet deep which had been dug by the high explosive.

As she was about to turn from the scene sick at heart she dashed aside a low growing brush and from an upper branch fell an object. It was part of a man's arm with a revolver still clutched in the hand. Jennie ran at full speed from the spot soon rejoining her sisters who had waited for her. Instantly there was a terrible screaming in the air followed simultaneously by the boom of a distant cannon. Instantly they felt the shock of the bursting of another shell of large proportion.

"Look, look," cried Violet. "It is one of those dreadful gang-gang-gang-shells that exploded. Look at the awful blue smoke." For a moment all eyes were turned in the direction indicated. It was indeed as Violet said. The dreaded passover smoke was there. Again they heard the scream of a shell and this time it exploded the tremor of the ground was greater although detonation was not so loud as in the case of the former shell.

"That hit into something," declared Joice excitedly. "Where are they coming from?" asked Angelina. "Who is shooting them at us?" "Those are the dreaded gandelinian shells," replied Jennie.

Suddenly a piercing scream indicated the passage of another of the giant shells and a roar told that it had landed and exploded. Beyond them to the right there came a great flash of light accompanied by the terrible roar of cannon.

"Where are we?" quivered Violet. "Can you tell?" "I believe it is gandelinians who are trying to place us between two fires to annihilate us," said Joice.

Gradually the din increased as battery after battery was added to the number in action. It seemed that a general bombardment was in progress and now a score of shells landed in among the tree tops and exploding covered the little girls beneath one of the trees with a shower of limbs, leaves and splinters.

THE BATTLE OF DONOHUS RUN.

While this forest fire originated by general Raymond Mc Richards Federal was going on in full away this very same gandelinian general taking advantage of Hanesias failure to advance struck Connolly's army whose lines ran east and west bending back the Abhianian front/ throwing his right flank at again the Abhianian left and slowly crowding the latter back toward Donu Donohus Run. General Dyson stiffened up the Abhianian front by putting one million three hundred thousand men into the narrow angle to hold the furiously attacking gandelinians at bay. The whole Abhianian line did not fall five million five hundred thousand men. Three corps, I Corps and six million six hundred thousand under general lashed a being thrown upon the Glandelinians but they could not hold out even at the tremendous onslaught and three times that bloody day the Abhianians stormed across the plain and made vain attempts to retake the positions from the Glandelinians. One big force of Abhianians got into the woods near the approaching conflagration where they attempted with maddened fury at the enemy for hours in a sea of carnage but they were thrown out. Glandelinian and Abhianian wreckage filling the battered plain and plains and one kind of wreckage could not be distinguished from another. The works were littered with torn equipment, cups broken, rifles, used and unused cartridges and hundreds of thousands of mangled bodies many thousands of which could not be identified. Thousands of dead were found in craters made by kang-gah kang gango kang-gah shells. At the bloody angle serious Abhianian resistance against the Glandelinian onslaught showed horrible slaughter.

Here stood divisions upon divisions which held out for four days against the Glandelinians. The Abhianians here fought with utmost perseverance, divisions dwindling into regiments, regiments into companies and the companies melting away in that storm of death. No one could question the bravery and skill with which the Abhianians fought and faced a death on this beautiful fairy like plain. In the battle torn fields there had grown forget-me-nots, cornflowers, poppies and daisies but now devastation was only left to mark the terrible scenes.

When the Glandelinian artillery got to work it did fearful havoc in the charging Christian lines leaving the myriads of dead under tons of dirt. Time again the Abhianians stormed at the Glandelinians and swept down upon them with a fearful fire men dropping by thousands at every step. The worse execution was done little Glandelinians with machine guns the Abhianians meeting with a blistering fire from guns that were unmistakably the make of Angelinians for these fired three hundred and fifty shots at a crack. But the Abhianians plunged headlessly ahead until utterly overwhelmed, looses then they withdrew in panic.

More than three of four thirds of the Abhianians were dead and the rest retreated toward the main point of Denohuan Run.

Violet attacks on the part of the Abhianians and Galverinians southeast of Arona were repulsed with frightful slaughter and spirited cannonading in the section of Eleanor as well as Uweille lines and Wilens made a terrific din but these three Christian fronts managed to hold their own amid frightful slaughter. The last of the Glandelinian of Glandelinian though successful very heavy on account of a curtain of artillery fire the battle lasting fully seven days before it was finally over. The main assault of the battle batt is occurred on the second day the assault being made by many successive and very dense formations of men followed by immense detachments in column formation. Many of the Glandelinian troops were cut down by infantry, machine gun and artillery fire but more and more came to the assault crushing the Abhianian line cutting their army to pieces and taking thousands of prisoners. The main Christian loss during the battle is or after was considered as about three million two hundred. The Glandelinian losses as they had been mostly on the defensive were less than one million killed and wounded.

Something while it was reported that large Glandelinian armies were concentrating at poles 2 scroller along the He-pollster gun, violet and her sisters had a most trying experience, while being pursued by a large squadron of Glandelinian cavalry. They had reached a wooded country which was supposed to be infested by the enemy and seeing a certain tree decided to climb to the top and secure themselves some refuge from the enemy pursuers.

The thing that appeared to be a large plant stood about thirteen feet high at the most and resembled what is seen in Madagascar a Crinoida parjeana. To violet and her sisters the apparent tree seemed to have a most remarkable appearance. Its trunk which rose to the height of thirteen feet high had a strange barrel like shape covered with what appeared to be a queer mosaic sort of skin or bark looking more like some gigantic pineapple plant than anything else. At the top of this apparent trunk it was between eighteen and thirteen feet in circumference and upon it seemed to be fixed a most remarkable growth very much resembling a huge plate. From the top of this huge looking trunk there seemed to hang eight gigantic leaves of peculiar greenish yellow color. They were of extraordinary size, twenty to thirty feet long, two feet wide where they were hinged to the apparent tree widening to about six feet and finally tapering down to a point as sharp as a needle. They were plentifully strewn with huge venomous looking round cups which were not observed by Violet and her sisters, and inside these cups protruded long horrible looking things like thorns.

These things looking like leaves could not have been less than fifteen inches thick in the centre, and hung down heavily along the trunk their point trailing in the earth. Above these there stretched rigidly and horizontally sixty of strange looking branches about ten to fifteen feet in length. Flatly free underneath the plate-like arrangement there grew a pointing upward half a dozen frail looking stem-like things (would be a better name) that shivered constantly as if agitated by the wind. It seems that the plate-like affair on top of the trunk contained some thick sweet juice as some sweet thick pinkish stuff was running down the side of the trunk. Violet and her sisters becoming now suspicious of the strange looking object were afraid to go nearer the tree but suddenly without warning a storm of yells arose and suddenly springing into sight came the Glandelinian cavalry men rushing upon the poor little girls with unearthly shrieks and outcries. Terrified violet and her sisters shrunk back, and at that the whole crowd of more approaching Glandelinians set in with their yells furiously howling for violet and her sisters to surrender and keep their distance from the tree. For a while violet and her sisters trusting to their little guns resisted, and only getting wounded as a reward for their plucky defense. At last seeing that it was useless to fight any further they turned and faced the tree. For a moment the little girls stood still gathering themselves up for a supreme effort, then quickly they sprang for the tree. Like a monkey they were scrambled up and reaching the top inhaled and panted to get to save them. Seeing that the foe were edging away with a peculiar look of fear and amazement in their faces the little girls feeling queer jumped up, and started to jump down as they did not like the odor of the juice on the top and at first the surprised Glandelinians did not in that dim light notice what caused one of the as they all jumped down to shriek with terror. Suddenly her sisters who had jumped a great distance realized what happened and at first they seemed to be paralysed with horror. The apparent tree seemingly so dead and motionless a moment before had suddenly come to life. The palpi so frail looking had suddenly ceased to quiver, and had coiled themselves about Jennies, head, throat and shoulders, and also her left arm holding her so firmly that all her efforts to free herself remained absolutely useless. Simultaneously the peculiar green branches so short and rigid before began to writhe and coil themselves round and round her body like snakes. Then as the mass struggled with a peculiar noise there arose a horrible sight that her sisters will never forget—the great leaves started to rise, very slowly. Those evil looking cups with the evil looking thorns protruding their full length were now on the inside pointing toward the little victim and closing on her seemingly with the force of a hydraulic press, and as they started to come together tightly there trickled down the trunk a pinkish mixture, while now the Glandelinians themselves who were Guardians and human who had not pursued the children with the intention to murder fought with maddening fury, and almost lost themselves underfoot in their efforts to compel the strange thing to release the imprisoned child.

However a new and most astonishing thing, had happened. There was a swoop of a long light body through the air, a loud r drowning sound which was almost deafening, and the tree was suddenly hurled bodily into the air and thrown down a considerable distance where it had stood, being torn up by the roots. A Being of glomenean creature had seen the occurrence, and had come to her rescue in time. Violet and her sisters never forgot their experience with this kind of man eating tree which really it was.....

During the recent parts of the great war and while the war was still young in its third year of duration there had been many questions on the results of battles and the questions and answers were as follows:-----

I. "What battle ended Manley's three hundred days bloody Pandora Campaign?" The battle of Jennie Turner.

2. What two mighty armies fought at Evangelina Crania or Highburg Landing, and at Norma Roseanna in the first year of the bloody Landoo-Angelinian war? The Calvinians, Angelinians, Domobians, Goncentinians, Abbeannians, and Tripoligonians, against the glandelinians consisting the Gmarians and Mc-Hollesinians.....

3. Why does the frightful battle of Kittens Reicharts, Judge Evans or Big girlknool rank as one of the most important battles of Angelinians entire cause, and as one of the bloodiest battles of the war? It permitted though defeated as they were, the glandelinians to retain their most disastrous defeat throughout the whole eastern theatre of the war, and permitted Angelina to retain control of all the Calvinian and Angelinian rivers, menaced Gloria, and Mc-Whirther, threatened the abrupt fall, fall of Julio Callio and Norma, saved Jennie Turner and Angelina Agathia from capture by the enemy and caused the Landee Linian nation to suffer the first most bloody wreck in the war.

4. For what reason is the first battle of Osmondson considered a most important Angelinian victory? It was the first real halting of the Glandelinian invasion in the west of Angelina, and the crushing of the entire glandelinian cause in that section of the bloody war. It also was a real important victory for the fact that the Shoemannian army suffered almost annihilation in attacking the Heights of Hall Mary."

5. When was the last great campaign of the glandelinians toward Angelina Agathia, or Gloria as it is generally called begun, and when did it end? In May the first year of the war when the glandelinian campaign full of tremendous battles and massacres was shifted from the Southwestern part of Calvernia to the east. It ended in disaster at Big girlknool.

6. Who fought the tremendous battle of Antonieania or Angeline Run and which side was victorious? The Glandelinians fought under Manly the Third and general Vivian was a victorious. This battle is generally called the "Battle of Peppo Angelina the II. The battle raged around Jennie Tury. Hence was first called by that latter name.

7. What Angelina general defeated Manley the Third at Jennie Turner? Zimmerman is considered the main victor but reports are confirmed that general Hanson Vivian fought the entire battle and that general Zimmerman came to his rescue at Sunbeam creek when Hanson the main commander was dangerously wounded.

8. In what part of the war was the battle between Germania Vivian and his father General Robert Vivian fought? The Fourth month of the Glandelinian invasion of Calvernia in the month of June on the 21th 1911.

9. What was the most famous glandelinian naval victory in the Second year of the Landoo Angelinian war?

The victory of the glandelinians over the Angelinians at the battle of Jennie Turner Hill in which the bombardment and roar of cannons was so frequent as to be termed the war of the planets.

10. What is known at the near ending of the First year of the war as the battle of the worlds?

The bloody culmination of the military efforts of the four Glandelinian armies under Raymond Richardson Federal, and the three Manley's; in which which these Glandelinian forces fought against the Christians at Big girlknool and crushed the Christian armies, but in which one of the Manleys through a fault of his own retreated, causing the other Manley to fall back thus enabling the two Vivians to capture the Emporia Heights and the Sacramento Hills. Most of the battle raged around Jennie Kittens Reel Reicharts run but was by the government of the Abbeannians finally termed as the battle of the Big and little girlknools.

These reports were evident and it was enough to encourage the Christians throughoutly. The enemy invasion in the east had already been overthrown and general Vivian and Hanson was already rushing large armies eastward to help in keeping the enemy overthrown. The war itself was raging with scathing fury in the western section of Calvernia, and the scenes were equally as terrific as in the east. Of course the whole world as still more astonished at the violence of the war every day, and fresh news always was a new shock to Abbeannia alone. The reports of the recent two Christmas sorrows was surprising to Abbeannia, and the sorrows of the children of her own had increased Abbeannia embittered feelings against Glandelinia and she longed afresh to revenge the tragedy of 1840. The children of countries who had been more fortunate it was reported had said during the two years over three hundred million poor rogues, and the priests had offered great numbers of Novenas and Masses and other prayers that God would see fit to allow the Christians to force open the fortifications of Mc-Whirther and that the enemy would be immediately crushed. News was slower now than at the beginning of the tremendous war, and only those who would have experienced the sorrow caused by it would have felt just as they did.

Abbeannia felt the same as a dog having the rabies but not yet demented and she decided to push in as hard as possible, and had during the meanwhile builded new fleets of warships, and had forced those nations who had refused her aid on account of favoring Glandelinia to loan their fleets, or go to war with her.

So secretly the Abbeannians was fitting out an immense fleet with which to lay siege to Mc-Whirther. Zimmerman in the meantime was already starting his own movements, and learning that a great force of Glandelinians was concentrating again along the Mc-Hollesster Run with the intention to menace his own advance sent generals Vivian, and Viviananna to crush back Germania Vivian at all costs, and to wrest all points of the Mc-Hollesster Run positions from all of the enemy, and to drive immediately for Francis Atlanta, and strike Julio Callio and Norma Catherine from the rear. So these two Christian generals the servant of the Abbeannian Dragon as Zimmerman was called moved with the speed of a stampede down toward the Mc-Hollesster Run, and barred the advance of general Germania before the wicked traitor and enemy of God knew what was happening.

Other movements was also being made. Zimmerman finding that he had too large an army to move with him simultaneously send this to aid general Hanson Vivian at other quarters, and also advanced the army under general Lucille Francis Hanson to move the other division toward the section of Logan Zoe Rae Run called Mc-Whirther Pillars and to drive back the Glandelinians concentrating there under Mc-Whirther Francis Schmidt. These movements were made separately but almost simultaneously, and indeed all the time the war had raged with a peculiar movement in the west. In many a desperate and most bloody battle the Glandelinian armies had been driven hither and thither, either southward, or northward, but always anew Christian army had thrown themselves in the way and the whole Glandelinian cause in entire Calvernia was really caught in a seething cauldron of hell.

The condition of the Glandelinian situation in Calvernia was indeed indeed the most surprising indeed. At the beginning of the war the enemy were the invaders of Calvernia, and had repulsed every attempt of the Christians to drive them out. Now in the west the Glandelinian cause was smashed down like an eggshell under the foot of a giant, but her armies could not now escape Calvernia though they had tried to. The armies trampled under by Angelina in the east part of Calvernia had south to retreat southward through Angelina, immense armies moving northward under gun Turner and Aronburg Lucille had thrown themselves in the way and crushed the armies and again driving them northward and eastward in panic.

It was now Angelinia who had the swa in her hand. She had thrown three fifths of the armies held in reserve in Angelinia into Calvernia from the south just at the moment the last of the christian armies were standing their ground in the north, and now glandelinia in the East was in a critical situation, and many of the glandelinian generals decided it was now the best thing to abandon the Eastern part of Calvernia and retreat westward which appeared the only open part for them.

While four immensochristian armies was concentrating against the glandelinians along the Mc-Holleston Run Whilliamsburger Zimmermann was already nearing the point he most desired, and already concentrated his main forces along 100 miles of the great Mc-Whirther Run, and moving forward little by little, each section of his army at a time, he had suddenly closed every single access of glandelinia to Mc-Whirther, and the actual siege of Vivian Wickey had begun. Two weeks had passed since his preparations had been made, and daily now the ground for hundreds of miles was continously shaken by a day and night tremendous bombardment as Zimmermann was letting loose all his available guns with the intention of hammering the fortifications down and force them to give in. He had been advised by many to make an abrupt attack upon the fortifications with his whole force at once, but then he did not think it was wise to do so and consulted general Hanson about it who was moving forward to Giese Marie Osborne.

General Hanson's answer was;

"The best way to force thoman point main point is to reduce it by siege and bombardment, and by frequent sallies to capture important points whose capture would only close the sapor of Calvernia most tightly. Virginia Run, and Zannagustopolis, and Logan Zoe Rae run are some of the most important points in front of Vivian Wickey and their capture would soon cause the fortifications of Mc-Whirther to fall. Do not make abrupt assaults upon Mc-Whirther though as it would though successful would cause you too heavy loss, and we do not want to sacrifice too many men just for the sake of a hasty victory. Smashing down the opposition by a continual fire of all your heavy cannons and the sorties I proposed before is the best means...."

General Hanson Vivian.

During this time there happened to be another glandelinian general who like the one early in the war made a wicked and false false boast. He had been retreating before the advance of general Hanson Vivian's left wing without offering a single engagement, and finally finding out that his army outnumbered this division of Angelinians ten to one decided to close in instead of retreating and surrounding it make the whole combined surrender. If this was accomplished general Hanson Vivian would be struck a staggering blow that would put an end of all his attempts to move against the main force near and along the gormas run.

Of course this move had to be made with haste, and so he did so encompassing this christian army in a circle of glandelinian armies. He had even cut off all their supplies for their artillery, and much of their priv provisions also and felt so confident that he declared that not any one in heaven could help the christian army now. He had as it seemed the whole christian army in a trap in which there was no escape at all, and that they would have to surrender. This glandelinian general whose name was Fredrick Shrills declared to Manley;

"Now let God get the christian force out of the trap if he can. If he is so almighty let him show his power. I don't believe he could do it with the help of his whole host in heaven."

Hanson Vivian learned of the use of this glandelinian general and of how he had surrounded one of his main divisions cutting off their supplies without there being any means to obtain anything anywhere. Hanson acted promptly. He moved forward his cavalry as swiftly as possible and advanced his main body under Roswell Buster Johnston to take the surrounding glandelinian army in the rear.

It took about ten days for Roswell Buster Johnston to reach the point directed but he came upon the rear region at night time and prepared for the dash. His scouts predicted to him the situation of the enemy's position, and he decided to do something clever which would obtain for Hanson a large army of prisoners. He sent a message through a Gemi in Gemiian messenger to general Jack Shellackey of the surrounded christians stating thus

General Shellackey;

I have arrived with my forces toward the rear of the enemy who is surrounded you, and Hanson's cavalry is coming fast. I have been advised by Governor Horsch Vivian to strike the enemy in the rear but I see a good chance to place the enemy between three fires, and if you follow out my advice we'll not only rescue you but capture this whole glandelinian army as well. I'm going to form my army into a large fan shape wave and to morrow morning I'm going to descend upon the enemy like the tidal wave descends upon a beach. As soon as you hear the roar of battle no move forward immediately and strike and tear your way through. The cavalry that is approaching will hear the strife as far as they may be, and as come up with a dash. The enemy then will be surrounded instead and we'll either compel them to surrender or make them face annihilation."

Roswell Buster Johnston."

Roswell Buster Johnston did as he planned, and in the morning just as the day was breaking moved a great wave of men forward upon the whole of the enemy's rear. The shock of the collision was terrible. There followed a tremendous battle that at first seemed one-sided. In a close and fury the Angelinian wave for the first part of the struggle was completely outclassed besides overwhelmed. The Angelinian wave appeared to have no chance against the huge and demented divisions of glandelinians who repelled charges furiously and crushed the christians back again and again and roaring like a million lions the waves of glandelinians and christians struggled madly in a sea of fire and smoke but general Jack Lavan and Whilliam Henderson of the glandelinians who were very high superior generals were killed, and the christians though repulsed and banged about a good number of times nevertheless had a good throat hold on the rear of the glandelinian army and any one would have betted their money on the Angelinians. And the Angelinians proved themselves thence lives true to the blood that was in them by holding on, and resuming their fierce assaults until Roswell Buster Johnston brought up the rest of the force and artillery. The Angelinians were beaten back like flails and held on. They were flung back three times all the way to their own positions and still they held on and tore their way once more through the gray lines in a most tremendous charge in double waves. Their waves seemed ground into the earth by the shell storm of the enemy but still they held on and could not be worsted. The force that had been surrounded by the enemy hearing the noise of the conflict also took a hand, and with the arrival of the cavalry kept up the attack and so sadly depleted the glandelinian army that the main glandelinian general in order to save his army from destruction was compelled to offer to surrender and do so. So three days later Roswell Buster Johnston received into his hands over sixty million glandelinians, immense booties and provisions, and many great lords and generals. This occurrence was more than Hanson had expected and he marveled over the greatness of the christian general. This was really the beginning of the fierce battles on the Mc-Holleston Run, and Roswell Buster Johnston after his brilliant victory had joined Vivianiana to help him hold general Germania at bay, and Violet and her sisters were now to see some more thrilling times at this seven days battles.

THE DEADLY FLEET OF THE VIVIAN GIRLS.

FURI U FURIOUS BLOODY MANUEVURS AT MC-HOLLESTER RUN.

THE BREAKING OF THE BATTLE AND THE FEARFUL STORM OF SLAUGHTER AND WORDLY HORROR. A WO WAR OF THE WORLDS ON LAND.

Federal and Tamerline with his hordes of blood thirsty warriors was now approaching the city of Dom nonolues Run i with the avowed intentions of razing it to the ground. There was no prospects of successfully opposing him and the people of the beautiful city awaited his coming as they might await the end of the world. Just imagine the scene outside the city when the dread warrior had kept his threat. Non-combatants put to slaughter and the city burned. On the other hand the Glandelinian armies acres of millions of marauders, on the others crowds of weeping children being cut up and blood drained, and worse things not pleasant to relate.

The same forest fires started by Federal had by the time the Vivian girls had been caught in it burned over eleven million two hundred eighty thousand acres, and cost 3,562 lives, while a branch of the same fire had already burned over eleven million, one hundred and sixty thousand acres with a death list of one thousand, four hundred and eighteen. This fire in its whole path had burned to death for total hundreds of thousands of lives caused annual loss in stock crops, cities and towns and even thousands of children were burned in the terrible scourge which was still raging. Federal by his ruthless destruction of nature itself as to say really deserved the name of "Human tornado" for there was no greater Glandelinian general than him or any that could do all he did.

Violet and her sisters though they had managed to escape the dangerous gang-gang-shells realized that they were still lost in the midst of burning woods. As they approached upon the little girls were literally ground fire also which took hold in the thick humus or vegetable mould that covered the floor of the forest, consisting also of brush fires and young trees feeding on grass ground litter, brush and young trees, while also they were endangered by crown fires which driven through the windswept through the tree tops in streams of fire.

The little girls really did not know what to do. They heartily wished that their friend Jack Evans was with them but wishing could not bring him. They did not know which way to go. The main conflagration was approaching nearer and nearer long rivers of fire and the flames made it almost as light as day. Indeed Violet and her sisters were running deeper and deeper into the danger. Lost in the blazing Galverinian woods with no compass to guide them they felt helpless. Indeed everywhere they turned was thick growth of turpentine trees with branches and leaves so thickly interlocked that the woods if not for the glare of the flames would have been terribly dark. Everything was murky with smoke and a terrific glare was thrown upon the heavens.

"This is terrible," gasped Violet; "I have never had so much hopelessness before." Suddenly she was startled by the report of a musket and Angelina threw up her arms and fell at full length amid the bushes.

"The Glandelinian sharpshooters," cried Violet; "Down sisters or we will all be killed."

They dropped almost as quickly as Violet did and without giving any further thought to their own danger they turned their attention to Angelina only to find her crawling on the ground with a slight scratch on the forehead. Suddenly there came a series of reports and bullets zipped through the bushes where the little girls were but no one was hit. Jennie trying Angelina's wound to stop the bleeding and not the enemy fired again the bullets being more numerous his time whistling through the bushes close to the little girls.

Then again came a perfect volley and Violet left as was hit by a bullet but it only creased the sleeve and did not make a wound. More bullets went zipping through the bushes but now the little girls began to crawl along. Again and again came the crack crack, crack, of scores of muskets and Violet felt the wind of the bullets but was not hit. The Glandelinians as she knew were keeping it up hoping to do some damage but unfortunately a burning gun was setting the leaves and dry bushes on fire and this fire was blazing on the pathway where they had been firing shots and even at that moment it gained strength and headway. And this finally forced them to give up the attempt of an assesting the Vivian girls which they were really trying to do. Then as the little girls continued on they suddenly saw a force of gray coated horsemen led by Cannonia approaching at a gallop.

"They are Glandelinians," said Violet; "We are cornered."

The Glandelinians rode up within a few few yards of where the seven children children stood and reined up their horses. The children met the questioning gaze of the new comers bravely but at the same time wondering how it would end. With a force of mounted Glandelinians in front of them and dragging forest fires behind them the little girls might as well ask themselves which way shall we turn? The Glandelinians saw the little girls and in due time had them within their main lines and ready for trial of which they were not guilty of at all. They were immediately brought before general Federal who immediately sentenced the little girls to death. Early the next morning the little girls were led forth to their doom but fortunately general Wuebaum Manley though a fierce child but a kinder hearted in their behalf and their little lives were spared.

"It is up to general Federal to be wise and even mind your own affairs about the little girls," Manley said; "If they spied when captured then it is probably all right but not when they were captured from your dastardly forest fires which has harassed our armies more than it did the Christians. Here after mind your own business or I will see that some one else will have your command. You are placed in chief commands of the armies here by us Manleys and for your promotion you got to show obedience." And with this he withdrew with his fair prisoners.

"This is probably some of that Meldonia picknells interference I'll be bound," hissed Federal to himself; "I wish the hell he would die curse him."

THE BATTLE OF MC-HOLLESTER RUN A SIX DAYS FRIGHTFUL CARNAGE.

It was on June the 1st of eleven thirteen when general Wuebaum Manley received relieving heaven forces launched sweeping attacks upon general Noro Vivianias to save his left as general Noro Vivianias had threatened it for weeks. The onslaught was terrific and even was falling when Federal striking Hansen's frontal forces a terrible battle managed to force him back, and a large force came upon the flank of general Noro Vivianias right flank attacking his whole two wings on two sides and between two storms of fire at that time his main right wing was rapidly reduced into fragments within eight hours eight million have fallen and captured on both sides combined.

General Montfort sacrificed his whole army in repelling the raps lling Manleys storming attacks and the divisions under general Thomas Evans and general John Evans ran into a line of mines and were all slain with the deaths of the two Christian generals and the probably mortal wounding of their only friend Jack Evans. Montford was killed also and general Noro Handenias, Hansen, Wuebaum and Galenningto were wounded the latter mortally. The Christian total losses on the first day of the great struggle were already considered four million one hundred and thirty two thousand four hundred and sixty six.

After spending their round for a twelve hours in a sea of blood and fire and corpses mangled and even intestines general Vivianias whole right was rolled up with the loss of two great picknells, Mandonia, Bicknell, and Consoe picknell who were mortally wounded in trying to restrain them.

General Wuebaum Furgersonia, Phillip Rinn, George Rinn and Walter Rinn three brothers all on the Christian side were killed and even Walter Shoemannia was killed. General Noro Vivianias center stood its ground near Mc-Hollester Run though both sides made the most desperate and gallant maneuvers even seen in the war.

Shoemannia rushed his light forces to the attack and so fierce was the conflict and the artillery fire that countless terrific explosions fairly and continually pierced the air in a volcano of flame and din and with an ear-splitting and continuous drumming like a roar.

General Cannonia and Darginia crossed the Mc-Hollester Run and tore general Vivianias center with the fury of their attacks but made little progress and Darginia withdrew and Cannonia also then resumed the onslaught with redoubled fury as Shoemannias main line went into action with the full fury of bells roaring din. General Vivianias center was pounded to smithereens by Shoemannias desperate lunges but at night fall they still held and the attacks, as general Vivianias center was reinforced by parts of the main bodies of christians finally ceased leaving a battle field exposed which looked more like some conflagration than than an actual fighting field. During the night general Vivianias withdrew his right and center but his left could not be withdrawn in time and were forced to stand against fiercer attacks the next morning. The left wing made grand success however and despite terrific slaughter pushed on across the Mc-Whirther a roaring screaming battle line fifty miles long driving the Glandelinian columns shattered and mangled before them and capturing several divisions of pravocots on Bernards plains. In the meantime during the night general Noro-vivianias right had escaped Tomas Federal by starting plain and forest fires themselves and so the next morning just a little after the left got into action gave Huebaum Manley battle with main might and main.

So terrific was the battle that the battle of Mc-Hollester Run that orchards were laid in waste by the terrific rain of shells which made many holes large enough to swallow a horse in. The ravages of the battle wrought great havoc worse than than that seen at Mc-Whirther Run. The trampled fields was strewn with the bodies of the thousands of dead and dying, with broken weapons and artillery and the scene was a worse picture than any ever made yet.

Again unfortunately general Vivianias right failed to hold and along the left now there was changes also. Huebaum Manley's right being reinforced by a part of Thomas Federal's columns stood its ground fiercely and threw back the whole christian line at that point after sanguinary fighting smothering and beating great surges front to back, hand then pressing forward themselves over a sea of bodies attacking with such relentless fury that the works captured by the christians were abandoned the Angelinians retreating northward with haste. General Maldonias Bicknell's lines were torn asunder in the onslaught they made but their attacks were also successful and the whole christian line gave way and retreated northward. Along Manley's center the glandelinian artillery firing increased in intensity, expending a great quantity of shells so that the christian works were literally churned up by the high explosive and as all the christian guns from their batteries responded with tenfold fury the din became terrific.

At the same time divisions of Glandelinians charged forward in monstrous waves with valor beyond words of praise and with a passionate courage which swept away all the terrible resistance until heavy reserves came up to check their advance near Mc-Whirther, and almost simultaneously there were separate counter attacks north and west in which thousands of glandelinians facing a furious curtain fire were compelled to surrender to prevent from being all slaughtered.

The Glandelinian battalions from Angelina Run to Mc-Fern Run a length of cannon chain of twenty five miles seemed to continually fire together as if at some signal in the heavens. In the tremendous thousands of salvoes the earth and air shook with a great trembling which never ceased for a single moment for all the battle fury the din seemed to fairly tear the air.

The vast tumult of explosive force pounded with a sledge hammer strokes of some titan, thundering through a deeper monotone, of continual reverberation, while Shoemannias main attacks redoubled and what seemed impossible happened.

The din of the artillery as all the christian batteries became doubly intense so that all the region of the battle field and hundreds of miles from it shook as if there was a severe earthquake and villages and towns were thrown into grave yards from the horrible concussion thousands killed by the falling of their houses.

The fury of it was so intensified that the scolds of the Angelinians quaked at its awful significance. Never before anywhere in the war had there been such a roar of heavy cannons which seemed to have shells enough to blast each opposing line out of the way and indeed over seven hundred thousand cannon of all sizes were thundering.

Federal's main attack began east of Mc-Hollester Run his men being in dead grips with the Angelinians. They advanced steadily over the trenches but their lines were smashed by the christian artillery fire that they crumpled upon only the arrival of Ambrose Fullerton's Tomas Federal's army from annihilation. V battalions and infantry disappeared into a fog of smoke from shells and locs of every kind. They fought behind the veil of death and immense streams of badly wounded told of the horrible casual casualties. Driven divisions of bravemen fought and fell battalions and brigades went into action against Tomas Federal but they couldn't hold and the Angelinians retreated northward. However the battle for the second day was not over as general Vivianias was determined to hold his own at any cost and save Vivianias army from defeat as if possible.

ASIZLING COMFTST.....21

Several more reformations were made by the christians during the evening which soon caused the enemy to give up their headlong attacks but in the next morning during a bloody conflict the Angelinians under general Hansonias Aronlurg clung to their works in the driving rain and pushed Wahlters mangled and crushed division of christians back to the trenches from which they were retreating and the whole were thrown upon the assailants and though Phillis divisions were repulsed during a counter charge the Angelinians however were able to maintain their works though Phillis one of their best and able leaders was severely wounded.

In the meantime meantime Shoemannias made a smashing assault which was backed by a steady succession of sledge hammer drives in double waves but continuously the Angelinians set their big bigges guns in tremendous action more severe than on the second day and blew whole waves, lines and columns into eternity. So terrific was their artillery fire that the city of Angelina Run in the heart of the main action resembled a Grecian city in ruins from the concussion. The Angelinian guns simply swept all barriers away and exactly five thousand shells per minute fell among Shoemannias advancing lines and the wooded regions looked as if some great typhoon had swept its horrible devastation.

Shoemannias however made great success but Huebaum Manley failed to pierce his enemy's lines and suffered heavy losses. Federal in the meantime advanced across a large turned section of woods to repel Hansonias who having recovered from the shock on June the eleventh was moving along the Aronlurg stretch to render aid to general Noro-vivianias. Both armies came together literally on the lined stretches like two Jefferies against two Jack Johnsons, and for a time amid the roaring sea of flame and hell slaughter, Federal was giving Hansonias a good wallowing on two sides when Connelly and ponbus came to Hansonias aid and intervened putting Federal's right wing between two withering fires and took sonking it in good old style. Federal was dismayed at his terrible losses and finding himself pressed back all along the line soon threw his main army into action and ordered general Cannonia to advance to his support. In the flaming hell Tomas Federal was killed and Thomas Federal severely wounded but now his lines though reeling hammering onslaughts were holding their own though they seemed out of lines outlined like some great smoky conflagration.

General MacHollester Johnston held a conference with his officers. "Hansonias right wing," said Nelson pointing in the direction of the carnage, "must be checked at all costs. Cannonia has been ordered to advance but I don't see the sense of it. His army will only be crushed. Look how the christians stare at each other."

"Put something has got to be done," said general Haller, "How about advancing... a force to the right and crush Hansonias right or left flank out of our way?" "That can't be done," said general MacHollester Johnston, "Can't you see how furiously those christians are pressing on. We dare death in his worse form there is but not suicide."

"What can be done then?" "SIS II general Cannon, pointing to the north, he being the main commander under Cannonia; "If we don't do something Norman Federal will be crushed. I'm in for killing, while the killing is good."

"Well, then, strike their main flank and crush it in." Said general Mc-Hoo Hollister.

"That is my say." Said general Fritze, Patrick a young general with a stillish face but devilish disposition; "It is the only way to beat those yelling, howling mad-dogs." "That is the best thing we can do." Said general Mc-Fern as general Cannon with general Godfrey and Nolan agreed; "Here is our main commander now. Let's see his plan."

General Cannonia had been sitting on his horse like a woman but now he mounted in the right way not sitting sideways as before but fully upon his mount and dashed swiftly up to the group of Glandelinian generals.

"Federal is having a hell of a time standing his ground against those yelling demons and you fools standing here conversing." Said Cannonia in a rage; "We are ordered by general Raymond Richardson Federal to advance our main forces and go to his support. So forward it is under any conditions. We are to strike the flank of general Connolly's Abbeianians and crush them."

Many of the officers agreed that this was the right plan and general Dargen coming up at this moment he highest officer in the rank next to Manley came dashing up and shouted;

"Forward boys to your commands! Strike Cannonia as quickly as possible or he will carry all before him."

Soon every commander had their armies in motion. General Dargen was the first to reach the scene of action. The Aronburg stretch of woods which had been a burned region of about forty miles in length was now a sea of dead and wounded of both sides, Cannonia Connolly having fallen wounded and his army razed by Cannonia's flank movement. Cannonia's army continued to press on his lines hurricaning with a storm of fire. All of Federal officers were in this sizzling battle hell striving with utmost fury to stem the retreat there being fifteen ally alternates and these were named being Fairwell, Hollie, Gordon, Schroeder, James O'connor, Gorgeville, Rappah, Ghandgird, Cannon, Jack Johnson, Lanoster, Contemptorian, Setric, Srentilly, Penberton, Hel'jome. Those wounded were Watine, Cannonia, Tomah Bone, Harrie Zimmermann, a Fle head/victorian, Aberdene Schroederine, Connie Schroeder, Kuffmann, Withnough, Ambling, Shri mp Flynn, Brackets, James Cannon, Henderson, Brackets, Pendergast, Grated, Thomas Gordon, Richard rogan, James E Perkins, Migeau, Clinton day, G. and Connolly, Lewis, Hanson Gish, Hanton Jennings, Cannon, Fred Mary, Wab, Shuvan, in, Rolet Kempf, Dansk, Convention, Wall Ricknell, Shu Subunkia all being wounded.

General Mc-Fern met the purple coated friends throwing all his divisions into action but they could not hold and became demoralized. General Dargen came to Mc-Ferns aid but fell dangerously wounded amid the storm of hell. Mc-Fern managed to rally his men at Dargen's support and as his lines were holding against fierce maneuvers and herculean drive he fell mortally wounded. His lines were literally helled and withdrew like a lot of cattle in a wild stampede before a great fire in the plain. General Mc-Haller and Mellion were killed and their armies cut to pieces. General Cannon advanced his big forces to the extreme center and of checked Germans onslaught of hell fury but could not drive his Angelinians back as they let loose a fissure eruption and Cannon and Norman fell together just as Fritze Patrick arrived with cavalry both the officers being only wounded however.

He survived the ocean of destruction without a scratch but he failed to make a second charge and withdrew under heavy shell fire. General Godfrey and Nolan were killed during the slaughter cent-linlin the flank attack and though general Cannonia was wounded he retained his command and rolled up the Abbeianian army crushed and mangled.

Cannonia's heavy losses however began to tell on him and unsupported by the Abbeianians he was soon forced to recoil, Federal driving at him fast and furious. After continuous and desperate drives, Manley began to make abundant success along his lines and general Moro Viviania was threatened with utter defeat. General Cannonia's columns were trapped fighting his left wing fighting in three separate columns which gradually settled down into a steady massacre being like a repetition of of general Grants grinding methods in the Civil War, a test of strength in men, food and ammunition. It was already night and Cannonia made double retaliations without success as the fury of the attack was driven at him over shell turning area, the terrific laughter extending over thirty miles back and twenty miles in width, the attack sweeping upon these solid lines along their exposed front with a fury which no soul could withstand. In the fierce inferno of fire the Glandelinian columns and divisions were melted up but the main line itself was intact and victory for the Glandelinians was once more gained Cannonia's army being once more cut to pieces and routed.

On the fourth day general Viviania again repelled Manley's attack. Who could imagine the fury of the fierce star struggle of Cannonia's lines to surmount those flaming crest on Mc-Hollister's run. His lines first moving steadily forward in perfect order and then the flags high poised high poised and leading checked and broken continually on each successive rise. Under the storm of shells musket tearing, but bayonet and pike fixed ready at the final sweep like a heavy wave crest over the rock like barriers of the purple coats. Then reaching the last slope before and beneath the death delivering lines suddenly illuminated by sheets of flame and in an instant the whole first line sank as if swallowed up in earth, the bright flags quenched in gloom, and only writhing fragments of the second line marked that hide tide, halt of uttermost manhood and supreme endeavor.

Then a swiftback flowing with despairing efforts here and there to hear lack broken myriads of the bodies of the brave glorified by the Baptism of blood and fire. Again and again in the midst of a seething inferno the bold essay was repeated by millions of men in monstrous waves with the same results and the thickening seas of the fallen marked the desperate endeavor.

In these assaults Shoemania lost millions. Shoemania witnessed five mortal charges. General Cannonia's right had cut through the stubborn lines on Viviania's right flank but unsupported had been driven back and there after a brave onset had met a similar fate as elsewhere else elsewhere, and everywhere the air was clouded with horrible explosions. General Viviania however was worried and listened intently for Cannonia's guns. General Moro Viviania despairing of his left and seeing the repulse of Cannonia's heroic valor on the right ordered a general advance. First Henriquest troops then Augustine St. Clares attacked Cannonia's left but met serious resistance. General Rockefeller advanced to their assistance, Chancell's divisions being almost annihilated but Richardson Parsons and Rudolph forced and maintained a position until driven out by superior numbers. Shoemania again attacked Viviania but was repulsed by Miller who crossed the stream and engaged Cannonia again. At the same time a impetuous advance was made by general Viviania on the center the advance being supported by the deadly fire from long range batteries. The result was the gradual withdrawal of the Glandelinians to the Mc-Hollister woods where a terrible struggle ensued. Manley having been reinforced by general Leonia Ricknell's Glandelinians and scores of brigades under command which had just arrived on the field caused a slow withdrawal of Cannonia's center with their losses of their generals Madison and Jackson he himself having been severely wounded. The twelve divisions of Concentinians and Abbeianians under Darger and Scholadar had crossed the Mc-Hollister Run on the battle night by pontoon bridges and now moved forward to support general Viviania who gave direct orders in an ambulance. At the first divisions of Concentinians and Abbeianians advanced it found Viviania's men slowly retreating. After two hours of murderous fighting the first division was established across Aronburg's plain where they unfortunately ran into an ambush of forty Glandelinian brigades on their front and flank and right with the result of the practically annihilation of the divisions.

The Abbeianians fell backward by this the general Viviania's army had been forced with twenty one divisions and one hundred corps so badly crippled as to be out of action for the rest of the battle. General Dodd crossed his cavalry of Concentinians and placing his batteries on the ridge infiltrated the grav columns on his immediate front, and also gave support to Richardson on the left. Grogg stormed Huebman Manley's line but was unsuccessful and his attack was followed by Augustine's army with the same result. A part of general Moro Viviania's divisions tried to flank the Christians but engaged the extreme right and though subjected to a severe cross fire from the Angelinian artillery drove them back to Mc-Whither Run where he was checked by the army of Cokery which arrived at a very timely moment and crushed the Glandelinian assailants at this point. Shoemania's divisions which had followed encountered Sedwick's divisions occupying what was known afterwards as hells plains.... Tiff nys Aronburg divisions crossed the Mc-Holleston Run and moved onward extending his lines to the left the enemy at this point making a most determined and spirited assault upon his Angelinians occupying the high ground the main attack being made on the central grand division of Vivian's left. Forunately the right grand division where the Shoemans and Hoeman were attacking, seemed to mass a strong force but which was now shattered by an inflating artillery fire of twenty batteries and as their line gave way before the assault Shoemans wheeled to the right and flanked and infiltrated the troops which had so tenaciously held Hells plain. Three hundred thousand prisoners were captured for hundred stands of tattered and riven colors as well as important ground and the key to the position. The hell plain was literally covered with wreckage of guns, artillery, the foliage, and packed with dead and wounded of both sides. The cause of this disaster was a mystery.

In the meantime rumors came that Hoynes and Nero having recovered from their injuries sustained during the battle of Mc-Whirther Run and securing immense forces of Ab-leanians and Calverinians had been advancing to general Vivian's rescue. Hoynes army though in advance of Nero was very far off yet but general Vivian's army consisting the right grand division of Vivian's was receding swiftly toward him and he saw a chance to strike a blow.

In the meantime Hanson's army was in a crippled condition and was by Federal Hanson did not know what to do. The only thing left to do was to make another stand and this he did the Ab-leanians being the first to be hurled upon by the Federal following armies. The result was a terrible sanguinary struggle the worse ever raging between the two forces thus far during the battle. After two hours the Ab-leanian army was crushed to pieces by Federal's terrific onslaught and force into a rout. Federal's lines attacked with the utmost frenzy driving the Ab-leanians before them like frightened sheep. Hanson's left went into action against Federal's screaming hordes of gray coated fiends and the slaughter became terrible the Glandelinians pursuing across the Anna Aronburg plains like a seething storm of hell's legions.

Gravcoats went down in hundreds of thousands and the survivors who hurled themselves upon the lines in purple. The plains of Annie Aronburg became a vast morgue of cut up bodies and debris of every description the gray lines being torn by a tumult of horrid explosions, tempests of canister and storms of minnie. The onslaught was terrific but by uttermost determination and stubborn fury Hanson's left held against overwhelming odds, hurling back the tempest of gray coats time and again.

"That's it boys," said Hanson again and again; "Give them yelling demons hell. Go at them a pell mell."

In the meantime the center engaged Hanson's center the conflict becoming general all along the line. For many hours it continued with extreme fury and violence extending along the right and with final success for the enemy.

Fierce fighting on the grounds of Andean Run.

Hoynes in the meantime came upon a big force of Glandelinians with his left grand division under Cracken and struck against Break-in-the-neck's Glandelinian columns on the grounds of Aronburg of Andean Run forcing them back with great loss and Break-in-the-neck wounded severely....

Hoynes pressed on steadily across the body strewn fields carrying all before him until checked by new forces which showed terrible and titanic resistance for many hours. The Glandelinians again had the advantage and Hoynes' right wing was defeated Cracken having fallen being killed. Reinforcements sent to the right wing however reformed this section of the Christian line which soon regained the ground they had lost amid a terrible storm of slaughter and demoralization thus closing the action of the fourth day. During the night the enemy made a withdrawal but damaged scores of towns and villages and dared the Christian hosts to cross the Mc-Holleston Run river and resume the conflict. During the period the sister and her sisters who had been prisoners among the Glandelinians for days managed to escape in the merle but had a duce of a time getting away and had to be rescued by hundreds of Angelinians. The Glandelinian armies after damaging so many cities and towns by their big guns intently watched the movements of the Christian armies which had been advancing during the early part of the night to avenge this unspeakable horror. The whole Glandelinian army which was falling back on the north side of the great Mc-Holleston Run river stretching along its shore for a hundred miles and the Christians were on the south shore their encampment stretching along for a distance of one hundred and fifteen miles. The eastern ends of the Christian armies were at Catherine Heights just across the river from Big Bethel.....

THE CHRISTIANS CROSS THE RIVER, WHILE FEDERAL AT ACKS HANSONIA AT MC-HOLLESTON RUN ONCE MORE. THE CARNAGE GOES ON IN GENERAL FURY.

General Dargin and Cammillian had made their way up the river a distance of two or three miles when they saw a large force of Angelinians at work along the edge of the stream and out on the river. It was a clear moonlight night and it was possible to see what was going on with tolerable distinctness and the two great great Glandelinian generals saw that there were thousands of Angelinians soldiers out in the stream in boats. The two Glandelinian generals saw plainly that the Angelinians commanded by a pretty little girl were making pontoon bridges using boats as foundations and placing long planks on them.

In this way a number of bridges could be constructed as easily in one night by keeping as many men at work as there was room for.

"General Gabeau Manley must know of this at the earliest possible moment of all," said Dargin. At this instant there was a rush of many footsteps and thirty six dark forms appeared and made an attack on the two generals.

"Angelinians," exclaimed Cammillian; "Give it to them." The two generals laid about them so lustily with their sabres that they brought their assailants to a sudden stop cutting down five of the purple coats. The rest drew pistols however and one called out lustily; "Surrender or we will riddle you with our bullets you Federal bastards."

Quick as a flash the two Glandelinian generals fired their pistols and dropped four of the purple coats, and then they leaped behind trees and just as this was accomplished there came the crack, crack, of weapon weapons as bullets whistled past the trees behind of which the two generals had taken refuge. But this was a game that two could play at and Dargin and Cammillian drew their other pistols and fired shots again with effect for two more of the Angelinians fell either dead or wounded. Other Angelinians were now coming and fearing that they could not hope to defeat the party Dargin said to Cammillian; "Come we must get away from here."

Then he darted away Cammillian keeping close at his heels. There were a couple of pistol shots fired by the Angelinians but none took effect and fearing that they were to lose their prey after all the purple coats started out in pursuit the leader calling out in a loud commanding voice; "Stop you rascally Federal bastards, or we will fill you full of lead."

But the two Glandelinian generals did not obey. "ST O," "ST O," again called out the voice angrily; "For the last time I warn you to stop."

The Angelinian leader might have spared himself the exertion of yelling for it would have taken more than words to stop the two Glandelinian generals. The Angelinians seemed to realize this and when he saw the Glandelinians keep right on he gave an order. The next moment a deafening roar rang out the Angelinians having fired a volley at the Glandelinian generals. Two or three bullets fell close around them but luckily the two were not hit. They on continued to run on with all their might their lips pressed grimly together and a look of determination in their eyes. Crack, crack, went the rifles again but the bullets did not hit the two Glendelinian generals and the next instant they were among the trees and were safe. Away they darted through the timber while there came yells of rage and excitement and then the crack of cracking of underbrush came to their hearing. On the two generals dashed and presently they could not hear any sounds to indicate that they were being pursued. They had succeeded in shaking their pursuers.

They soon reached Manley's position and having passing the sentinel Dargin alone made his way toward Manley's headquarters. The great general was in bed but the orderly awoke him and told him who wished to see him and what he said.

"I will get up right away and see what he has to say," said general Huebner Manley. Dargin did not have long to wait for in ten minutes the general showed himself.

"Well general Dargin I'm glad to see you," he said; "What is the news?" Have you discovered anything of interest?"

"Yes your excellency. I believe general Vivian is going to cross the river by means of pontoon bridges."

"You don't say," said Manley in surprise; "Where are those bridges being thrown across?"

"About three miles from here."

General Manley paced the floor for a few moments in silence looking down and pondering intently. Presently he paused and then said:

"This is a serious matter. He said as though I have half speaking to himself and to Dargin at the same time; 'I shall have to call a council and decide upon our course of action.'"

He summoned the orderly.

"Call all the general officers by telegraph," he ordered.

The orderly bowed.

"Tell them by telegraph that I wish them to report here at their earliest convenience and that matters of great importance are to be discussed."

"Yes your excellency." And then the orderly withdrew. Ten minutes passed and then a score of the general officers put in an appearance. One after another they came until all were there and then general Manley after pacing up and down the room for a minute told them the news.

"And now the question is," he said in conclusion; "What is to be done?"

The Glendelinian generals were surprised and alarmed except a few.

"So the christians are building bridges and are going to come across eh?" said someone.

"Well let them come," said Cannonier.

"That is just the question," said general Manley pacing up and down again; "Whether or not shall we let them come. We can strike them a blow as they cross."

"We could strike them a blow as they attempt to cross and make them give up," said Bicknell.

"But would that advise," asked general Raymond Richardson Federal.

"Why would it not be wise?"

"Well I'll tell you. To my way of thinking it will be a good move to let general Vivian's army cross the river."

"Why so?" from general Manley.

"Well it will give us a chance at them, not chance which we can get."

"Well it will give us a chance which we cannot hope to get as long as they remain on the other side of the river."

"Yes but it surely will give them a good chance at us and a good one too."

(Objected general Adair-de-parbe.

"But we have an unassailable position here on the heights and along the river also," said Federal.

"You think we could hold this against general Vivian's great host then?" asked Manley.

"Yes even more. We can ever thrust those christians down on level ground." Was general confident reply.

Many of the Glendelinian generals shook their heads doubtfully.

"I'm not so sure about that general Federal," said Dargin.

"Nor I," from Cannonier.

"Well I'm sure of it," declared Federal.

General Manley was thoughtful.

"I think we could hold our positions by stern resistance," he said; "But I don't know about whipping the enemy on level ground with their army green deal larger than ours."

"That is true to us I realize," said Federal; "But we have the best possible position and we can watch the enemy, and when we see a chance to strike them we can do it, and then if they try to get back at us we will be able to hit them as easily enough."

The other Glendelinian generals were not so sure about it. Some favored letting the Anglinians come across, but others were against it. There was quite a long discussion and after discussing for four hours and then it was decided to let the Anglinians come across the river. The idea was that as long as general Vivian's army was on the south side of the river there would be no chance to strike him a blow for revenge of their failure of the fourth day of the battle, but if he was on the north side of the stream they would have opportunity right he found to strike him severe blows.

It was believed that the Glendelinian position was unassailable and that this would make it a safe thing to permit the christian armies to come across the stream and take up the position on the north side of the river. It was believed that the christians would be able to strike the christians but to let them come.

"We will not attend to their case after they have passed across," said Federal.

"Said Federal."

The next morning the Anglinians were crossing the bridges in a column.

General Vivian's idea was to get a strong force across the river to hold Manley in check and as Manley had intended to do the same thing to cross a part of his force and take the christian positions on the heights on his left.

Vivian had ordered Hannonia to remain behind with his whole force and watch the stream of soldiers crossing the bridges was continuous and unbroken save where at intervals where horses dragging cannon along and wagons loaded with provisions and ammunition.

WHEN

GENERAL VIVIAN'S FORCES CROSSED THE RIVER GENERAL HANNONIA IS STRUCK BY FEDERAL.

The morning when the christians were crossing the bridges was clear and bright and while the christians under Vivian were crossing the river Hannonia was making concentration. Violet and her sisters had selected a point from which they could have a good view of the country having climbed a good sized tree to watch the christian forces across the river, and then turned their eyes in the direction in which the enemy under Federal would naturally be looked for.

The brave little girls more reckless now on account of the loss of their best friends and the severely wounded wounding of Jack Evans was in the tree tops from four o'clock in the morning until eight and soon to their surprise saw moving gray columns and the flash of steel among the trees. The little girls watched eagerly for an hour and soon realized that the force was advancing through the timber having recrossed the river along Hannonia's front.

Violet and her sisters descended and hastened back to the christian lines encountering Federal and his forces. He had discovered the same situation and the two general Hannonia's headquarters and were soon in the commanders' private room.

"What is the matter?" asked Hannonia saying them curiously; "Discovered something?"

"Yes it seems as if Federal's whole force is advancing, the big gray columns are stealing through the timber and believe they intend to turn our left flank and come around toward our rear."

General Hannonia summoned his orderly and told him to summon the members of his staff who were on hand and then the matter was laid before them.

The affair was discussed earnestly. Some were for remaining right where they were and not advancing to meet the enemy but to await until they were attacked by Bicknell's was eager to go down and engage them and he was supported by some of the officers in the view of the matter that he took.

Along Hellertons lines the struggle went was fearful and dreading, that he would be overwhelmed he sent for aid. Logan being in the same danger could give no aid, and his brother general James, open was wounded, and no aid could come from his division which had been withdrawn with the loss of their general. Ben Logan, General Pennington's sent reinforcements for general Hellerton and Logan who killed their ground amid heavy slaughter. Hellertons assailants were now held at bay, but, open still met the fierce attack and his line being broken Tony Sengine and Feldwin reinforced him. Federal moving from Sherman's left advanced toward general Sengine's lines and now hell seemed to break loose with fierce fury.

The christian line under general Partick Nelson had already been annihilated and himself killed in coming to the rescue and Jennington also coming to the rescue fell wounded but the arrival of more reinforcements rolled up general Henry Conventions right grad division back to the christian lines from where they had been driven in panic by the "Lundelians" but convento convention was wounded, Mc-Holtester Reg was killed and general Manufacture was mortal'y wounded, wounded, wounded, wounded. General Pembers lines was also fiercely engaged with Adele-de-parte and by holding their ground like fiends of general Federal failed to sweep general windermere arm back.

The christian divisions under general's Pellertán, Paldán and Sanguine had also been reinforced and their they held their ground satiorly. Themovements

Q An unsuccessful attempt was made to turn Goodnows left flank. In the fiery battle conflagration Goodnow was killed and Bernard wounded mortally. These two divisions receiving staggering blows recoiled the divisions under Bernard Dunn and William void were overlapped and the two leaders fell mortally wounded. Rodoul also fell mortally wounded.

While this Landelien attack was in progress the other portions of Federal lines made one last determined effort to center the battle and flood it along the entire line and one portion of the Landelien column was broken and swept to pieces with the wounding of four brigadier generals Fragnard, Kalkile, Charles, and Bruce Hanson.

General Adolfo-de-garza's brigades of the first main line were cut to pieces, one of his main divisions was annihilated and he himself seriously wounded twice.

Lundberg drew back out of the inferno and the divisions of plandelinian's counter charge by general Jone of Angelonie were also crushed to pieces by a heavy cannon fire. Pearson, Jennings, and Johnson Angelonie were killed and finally their columns were compelled to withdraw. General Everington whose division was also engaged in standing their ground was also killed, but Pyrobores rushed to the assistance of these stricken christian columns and rallied them but he himself was killed. The Plandelinian made great fortunes here and there during their general attack on general Hanson and the christians had also suffered the loss of many generals. General William Wright left center was turned and rolled but despite all the fierce and desperate onslaughts general Hanson's line seemed to hold. Along the center Hanson had rallied his divisions by one thirty and here the struggle was bloody indeed. General McWhorter, Bud Fisher and McHolister Henning were mortally wounded, general Leo Henryson, Costelloe himself was killed and also John Accountants, while Biglow Sandfords and Bernard Shaw were also mortally wounded. Nicholas Glandlin was wounded, Leander Dunner killed, their division of purple coats being annihilated. Daniel Curran's purple line gave the Federal serious resistance and only recoiled when overwhelmed and trod on down. Indeed Hanson's whole line for all that morning had given Federal and Picknell a hot reception and with the help of Cornsue Hubbard Dickrell repelled a simultaneous attack which was made along the three wings of his Christian lines almost at the same time. The Klandelinians by making a bold and determined assault succeeded in occupying the works between Marco Cellio and Jennie Nichols where hundreds of thousands were slaughtered within fifteen minutes amid this blaze of storming hell. This most fierce and bloody fighting raged for hours and though general Hanson held his second line of works a whole line was in danger of being rolled up and displaced. Any temporary advantages had been gained by the enemy but Hanson, Hubbard, Picknell aided and succeeded a part of the main line but could not drive the assailants back and the being reinforced by General Hubbard Dickrell who brought up all his available forces and a screaming rushing carnage of balls with all its fires and for the ghastly damnation seemed to break loose. Both Hubards were wounded. It happened that reports came in that these two Hubards were mortally wounded with Hanson's aid and though these reports were false the whole Christian line gave way the Klandelinians pressing them hard. Hanson's army was also forced to retreat and Hanson's right and center had also withdrawn after both sides had charged back and forth in endless succession. It was now ten o'clock and the Christians seemed in danger of being beaten. In fact it now proved to be that Hanson's was severely wounded but the wounds did not prove to be mortal in any way.

GENERAL VIVIANIA TO THE RESCUE. THE RESULT AND HORRORS.....

General Phelan's Christians themselves in stead of being on the defensive had counter attacked but met a crushing repulse and he himself was severely wounded but in spite of his wounds retained his command. General Julian and Julian's badly repulsed the Klandelinian attack along their point of the line and in quick succession Hanson and Bernard Cannon of Kindermans center and right received the oncoming seas of human beings crushing their columns first to fragments and then almost annihilating them with a fierce gun fire but Sanguine suffering from intolerable losses was also compelled to withdraw. At the same time general Federal continued his general attack with frightful violence sweeping away and annihilating Millers right grand divisions and Eladors extreme right and center were also annihilated and these two leaders killed. Hanson's whole center had also been forced but Thomas Jennings and Norton's came to its aid and caused the withdrawal of the Klandelinian center.

The left grand divisions of Hanson's army also rallied but the right and center was hard pressed for a mile until rescued by the main line of Angelinian batteries which made a redoubled roar as ten thousand five hundred and sixty cannon let loose an avalanche of hell and damnation upon the Klandelinian columns and nearly three hundred thousand were mowed down in a few minutes. General Kindermans whole center was forced was now forced with murderous losses but he still held his right and left together which continued their resistance with amazing fury.

Benlign's right was rolled up and crumpled to pieces but his center and left held like a army of murderers and Federal was again wounded, this time in the left hand. Benlign met the fierce onslaughts but all suffered horrible decimation while the survivors were being hard pressed. The Klandelinians however made an annihilating fire along their left and suffered awful losses. General Sanguine made a furious counter onslaught but met a bloody repulse and withdrew only to resume the defense with unrelenting fury. General Federal had captured one of the Angelinian batteries and Sanguine and Benlign led four desperate charges to retake it only to meet decimation each time. A final counter attack was in progress however and hundreds of thousands of purple coats and gray went down. The main attack was repulsed however the whole Christian line being pressed back with terrific slaughter greater slaughter ever seen before and even Cedarline was scarcely more terrible. The scenes of carnage had but few parallels in the annals of warfare. General Hanson's whole line being swept as a tornado would the corn, being fairly decimated. Unmolested surviving columns were forced to withdraw. The right wing was driven back and broken simultaneously and destruction was holding wide its jaws to crush the Christian armies to a few divisions. For four more horrible hours Federal massed his victorious and exultant columns and hurled them as successfully upon general Hanson's remaining positions with dare-devil reckless desperation that in the moment of expected triumph lavishes oceans of blood and ages of life to make the final victory.

The divisions under Major general Sparring held its ground from first to last amid the tempest of confusion, and hellish inferno of shells, cannons and musket flashes, which made a scene as if the end of the world was approaching and the deluge of fiery damnation and death pouring upon them in torrents, completely run over by more than twenty entire divisions that had been shattered to fragments by the shock on the right and front, itself still stood as firm as a rocky wall a very break water against the tide of ruin, then by two by seven times saw the solid divisions in the hellish glare of shells, and musket discharges discharging the air, round and break up within short pistols range of its bayonets and fire from the horrible daunting slaughter. On this field whole Christian armies were baptized in blood. With one third of his thirty six hundred thousand men lying dead or mangled and bleeding on the ground they fought on. Federal himself himself with withdrawn in horror being horrified the first time in his life, yet he did not give up. But to again throw his forces forward only to again experience horrible slaughter. In the fury of the oncoming headlong attack the Christian center was broken and thereby threatened to carry all before them and sweep around the flanks leading to McHol.

But in the meantime large divisions of general Nero Vivianias army were recrossing the bridges and the first of these were hurled upon the victor's victory to flush the Klandelinians who were driven back in confusion. Federal's main columns met up the furious attack with unabated fury though mating meeting with frightful destruction of divisions. While all this was going on general Vivianias sent orders to all his officers to withdraw across the river and reinforce general Hanson whose army was still withdrawing at many notions.

In the meantime general Coyne who had kept out of the engagement thus far concentrated his whole army toward McHolister and Zinnerman and by morning of the sixth day redoubled the terrible carnage by opening a counter attack upon Federal's exultant center. Accountants division whose leader wounded as he was still retained his command and was forced back by Henryson Nero across the tracks of the Pandora Railroad lines but received heavy reinforcements as Manley's forces were crossing at another point, and Federal's columns having rallied Nero's columns were forced to withdraw but the main attack was soon resumed the Angelinians being desperately determined to regain the ground they had lost during the last day and during the action of the night.

The second assault was repulsed however and Federal himself again assumed the offensive directing a murderous assault. Federal's whole center advanced but seeing that he was failing to force the Christian center, his right again threw his right against the Christian left. The Christian left was assailed by overwhelming numbers but stood firm, but a part of the left wing of the Christian line had been broken pressed clean out of their position with heavy loss. Gallion Cannon came to its aid but the line could not rally as their leader general Henry Dargwin had fallen mortally wounded. The divisions were then heavily reinforced and the fury of the battle was redoubled. Such furious concentration was made by the Angelinians that soon the Klandelinians saw their center and left were forced to withdraw. General Denmark pressed after them but encountered an annihilating cannon fire from the heights and was forced to recoil.

A series of desperate and determined attacks were made upon Federal's line but each time the Christians were repulsed and again was compelled to resume the defensive. Yet the Angelinians were able to repel every assault made by the enemy and held the field amid all the frightful slaughter. Federal in the meantime resumed a series of bloody onslaughts on the Christian right but without success, and meeting a third wound but still retaining his command and in order to Inspire his right wing threw his whole center forward and behind the slaughter was something frightful. The Alandelinian center was repulsed by the Christian line. However, the Christian line was driven back by the Alandelinian center. The frightful loss.

Federal's main divisions recoiled but the Christian line struck the Christian flank and kept it in a demoralized condition until Federal desperately rallied the center and drove the whole battle line back to their own position amid another hail of slaughter. Federal soon resumed the offensive and the Christian right was attacked with incredible fury. This attack was dominated by a counter charge of the Alandelinians, with terrible slaughter. Making an irresistible charge, the enemy managed to carry the Christian works but Alandelinian came to. However, aid and all the enemy's strength was spent and the Christian line was in a demoralized condition.

The attack was fiercest along the center the chief object of the enemy being to capture the line of artillery. This was successful but Federal was undaunted as heavy reinforcements were coming up to his aid and sustained his positions against a most desperate attack on his center. The first line of works were carried by the Angelinians and fierce attempts were made by Federal to retake them. Accountants men agreed to recover his line of works however though at awful loss but met frightful and decided determination in trying to carry Alandelinian works. Every one of Federal's attack attacks had resulted in crushing repulses and the loss of some more works.

Bladerlinia pursued his assailants driving them in confusion. Federal's right wing had also given away with the loss of their leader Mc-Hollister, Johnston who was severely wounded. The Christians had retaken most of the works though they had lost over a million men inside of an hour. General Leona, McHeldon, Pikes, Picknell had been withdrawn south of the heights the heights being followed hard by the Alandelinians who were bound to capture the heights the carnage still as using its most ghastly forms. The Angelinians advancing themselves still at other points forced the battle line at Grand Unionlandia and drove the Alandelinians to a hill and from it to another which they belabored and assaulted.

The Alandelinians being forced from this recoiled into a gully. Another hill was assaulted simultaneously the Angelinians carrying it amid the loudest thunder of guns ever heard before. Before the Angelinians capturing trench after trench. However the main position on the heights could not be carried by the Angelinians as he had not not enough men having lost too heavily in the other engagements.

A fierce attack was made on the Alandelinian right by General Frank-in-the-right but Federal with heavy reinforcements once more sent men to the rescue. Federal's problem was not to cut off a part of the Christian army as it had been his first intention the evening before but to execute the greater part of his army from its precarious position into which it had fallen. In other words the superior numbers of the Angelinians were aiming to execute the same movement against Federal's army, and cut off his escape as if with a knife. Already a Angelinian cavalry force of eight million was in the rear of Federal's right wing, the new force of Christians having recrossed that way. A cavalry of Alandelinians which had been sent to burn the bridges on the river could not arrive in time to check General Vivian's counter advance and the Alandelinians had to abandon their works in front of the Christian line while a portion pressed in the rear and the right were cut-off and captured. Seven times Federal's divisions charged but the demonstration met with heavy losses. The assailants broke through at one point but were driven back. It was already eight o'clock on the fifth day and still the battle raged and seemed to gain steadily in its utmost fury.

FEDERAL SURROUNDED FIGHTS AS HE NEVER FOUGHT BEFORE.

In the meantime General Vivian's army concentrated toward Jennie Jennie where a pun under heavy shell fire and learning that Hansonian had been wounded three times ordered General Baldwin's main force forward and these descended upon the enemy in a fierce attack and by overlapping Picknell's right in a thunderous sea of slaughter smashed and Picknell's right grand divisions all to pieces but General Federal marched a large force around Baldwin's flank, and General Vivian had to open a spasmodic artillery fire with one thousand guns to save Baldwin's forces from annihilation.

Federal threw heavy forces upon Pl Baldwin's army forcing him back toward the main line which he reached after five desperate struggles with the enemy. During the terrible bombardment Hansonian's guns were silenced Hansonian's lines being on new hills and incurred the fire of the Shoenannian main line of batteries. Hansonian then made a concentration but was puzzled as to the movements of the enemy not knowing whether they were retreating or whether Manley was coming to the rescue of Federal. General Nero was in the meantime ordered by General Vivian to move across the field with his divisions and to attack the enemy's left at once.

At the same time Mc-Hollister had forced his point despite terrific opposition but the left grand division of the Christian line was threatened and overlapped. Mc-Hollister crossed established his lines on the enemy's left and flanked his position. General Jennings led his forces to the right of Picknell's and a cooperating aided Baldwin's attack which was advancing on the center. General Barnhardt's massed his infantry supports in the gully on the left of Picknell's columns while Nero advanced to the attack deciding once more to turn the Alandelinian flank and destroy their only exit of escape.

General Vivian had issued orders that these attacks at all points now should be simultaneous and not successive as he did not want Federal to get away. Mc-Hollister, Mc-Hollister and Jennings soon became generally engaged and for two hours the carnage continued with ten fold fury, extending fifty miles in a terrible ear-splitting roar of firing, and then the Alandelinians began to give way retreating up the heights the Christians following and flinging themselves upon Federal's lines. They were badly smitten, and decimated however and hurled swiftly back for half the distance they had won.

However they were not driven into a panic and did not retreat swiftly all the way for closing up their shattered lines they came slowly away a regiment was nine hundred and ten men had been, a brigade hardly a regiment or a fraction of a brigade where a division had been. They had met at the heights fresh troops of Alandelinians who crushed and smote and bent their line and smothered it to fragments. In fifteen minutes the fortunes of the day seemed to have changed.

It was the enemy who was now advancing pouring down from the heights in seemingly endless swarms sweeping through the fields under heavy gun fire from which their latter comrades had just fled.

Hansonian sent in his largest brigades to meet them but they could not do the work and threatened annihilation withdrew. Hansonian called for others. He could not take it from his right because it would be in danger of annihilation if weakened and his center itself was threatened with annihilation. General Vivian gave him his best brigades which stood firm despite the loss of their leader General Henard and caused a second withdrawal of the enemy. Jennings' divisions vainly endeavored four times to advance and exhausted by the effort and their appalling losses fell back. Baldwin's divisions went to their relief but in an hour his divisions were crushed to fragments and driven back with Baldwin killed.

The left nevertheless was too much extended to be turned by the Angelinians and was too strong to be broken. Hansonian tried three times but at first could not even advance, but held his ground while General James and George Ring silenced a chain of Alandelinian batteries which for a hour had poured a storm of exploding gang-gang-shells on their central line. Hansonian left though heavily engaged was able to take care of itself his right had become impregnable and he also had ten brigades of troops still fresh and his center was a second time victorious. So Hansonian and Kindernine managed to advance.

Tony Sengulines fresh Ahysinkilanna Ahysinkilanna troops moved forward at once the batteries in the center advancing the whole right wing was called upon and General Hansonian himself went forward. Almost a storm of preternatural carnage followed fairly blasting the earth. Kindernine fell severely wounded but Hansonian survived amid the hailstorm of bullets, whistlers, shells and high explosives. The whole of Mc-Hollister's command was broken by a storm of exploding gang-gang-shells but with his right still untouched, and with the fresh brigades just above all with the advance of the whole central line he managed to hold his ground though the carnage had already become a screaming horror. The division under Mc-Hollister suffered suffering unmerciful punishment and badly smitten by heavy fire of obdurate war in a stampede and threw Kindernine's army which was already badly smitten into uncontrollable confusion.

The Alandelinians received reinforcements and the struggle along the center increased increased in a fury beyond describing. To extend his own front as far as possible

Hansonia ordered Hero to move by the left flank. This was attempted by in the face of an oncoming hail of gunfire and Hero was three times severely wounded, his whole line of seven million men shot to pieces and annihilated. His adjutant general Coffe tried to rally and reform the troops but was mortally wounded. Other general officers tried to rally Hero and Mc-Hollister's lines but they were frightfully cut up and could not stand these officers not about seven generals by the names of Cooper, Randallina and his brother Henry Randallina, a "little" textile, Evaston, Darling, and "Iviania" were wounded amid the dreadful carnage. The whole of Hero's division was crushed and headquarters of their officers of all rank were down. Hero's division had went into action with eight hundred generals and seven million million men.

Twenty generals were stunned by the concussion of the battles and a score unnamed were killed and twenty unnamed were wounded and 999,566 men were the only remains that could be collected of this splendid division. Mc-Hollister himself was killed, their hundreds of colors were shot to pieces all their color guards and sergeants were killed or wounded and the scene was like a forest fire. General Hubbard Miller who took command of the divisions after Mc-Hollister had been killed exerted himself to the utmost to restore order but failed and was himself shot down a bullet piercing his brain. Hansonia ordered the split crippled lines to be reformed and sent many large divisions to stem the tide of disaster but the test was too severe under such an annihilating fire.

General Hansonia himself attempted to arrest the disorder but to little purpose and he and his sixteen horses were shot from under him and an orderly who was about to help him on another horse when he and the horse when down and fell together by a bursting shrapnell.

It was impossible to hold the position so Hansonia withdrew the division to the rear and once more the field was abandoned to the enemy. The assault on Ricknell Bicknell's right and center was something fearful but he held his ground firmly. General Luckwick was severely wounded, while gallantly leading a division and lieutenant generals Fallon, Miller, and Thomas "Colon" fell mortally wounded. Generals Beppo and Calsoe were wounded, while "Pohl" was killed at the head of his division and general Thomas Zimmermann was mortally wounded firstly a storm of shot then a killed by a bursting shrapnell.

Hansonias troops were greatly exhausted and had lost heavily but nevertheless "Hoyne's" division were still fresh. Forty thousand guns were still playing vigorously in the center making a tremendous salvo of cannonading heard from three hundred miles very plainly and so fierce was the cannonading that it seemed as if the ammunition for many of the christian batteries would be exhausted and several divisions were compelled to retire. All that had been gained for two times in the front had now been lost. The enemy's batteries were now advancing and mad, sad, and sad work.

Hansonia despite the critical situation believed that he could still hold his own and come out probably with a color flying but that another advance just now would be committing suicide. The enemy however seemed too exhausted exhausted to attack at this crisis and this enabled heavy reinforcements from general "Ivianias" who was still recrossing the river to arrive to Hansonias aid. Hoyne received fresh troops and formed on the left great love commanding one division which he sent forward along the river banks toward Mc-Whirther's glands in possession of the enemy, while general Beppo, Leopold was ordered to retake the fields which all that morning had been so hotly contested. Three million went forward on the run sweeping like an avalanche through the fields and fell upon the long woodland closed them in and held them against great odds though the firing there seemed like the earthshattering roar of millions of cannons going on.

HANSONIA'S ADVANCE.

The field and its ghastly harvest remained with them. Several times it had been lost and won and amid tremendous hell of slaughter. The two wings of Ricknell's army was driven back and though the Angelinian brigades were infiltrated by the "landelinian" batteries they held amid the maelstrom of cannon.

230
Hansonia had at this very outset thrown his columns so far into the heart of the enemy's line under Federal that he was compelled to throw threaten Hansonias flank to secure the center and Hansonia was revealed but held his ground. Finally changes came at fifteen minutes after ten. Hansonia had managed to advance his batteries over the breadth of the fields in front supporting them with his heavy divisions and brigades of infantry and attacking with the most greatest energy the "landelinian" batteries. His movement was a bloody success the christian batteries maintaining their new ground under a deluge of destruction. For many hours Hansonia had been fighting with various fortunes but for a time final success. Tony Sanguine came up to join in this decisive attack but at this time the "landelinians" were transferring a large number of divisions to their right to meet the attack of Hansonia and Sanguine was forced to defend himself against heavy odds.

Hansonia broke the enemy's line along his front at ten thirty five and advanced slowly up the heights his batteries in the rear covering to some extent the movements of his division divisions. A desperate fight was going on on his flank his right while the "landelinian" batteries were in full play and became very annoying, while heavy columns of "landelinians" were advancing along the roads and over the hills in the direction of Ricknell's army.

Hansonia advanced with great rapidity and the most determined vigor up the heights in front, on top of which the "landelinians" had maintained their most dangerous batteries. About the same time the batteries seemed to open in all directions with great greater activity than ever sounding like the roar of legions of cannon instead of the number there were really there. The fights in the gaps were in full progress the batteries along the christian line breaking in continuous action like a hellish avalanche of din and horse horror, Ricknell's lines seemed on fire and every hill top ridge and wood along the whole line was created and veiled in smoke as from some great forest conflagration and the din was now doubly terrific and enough to stun the multitudes charging up those fiery blood soaked sides of the hills where the streaming avalanche of hell and damnation seemed to roar down in fiery cataclysms of hellish destruction and annihilation of the christian armies. And Hansonias artillery opened from the new position failed to control and silence the enemy's batteries but air batteries and Hansonias succeeded in carrying the heights but lost three million men on one withering discharge of musketry and galling line guns along the "landelinian" front.

HANSONIA IS DRIVEN BACK AGAIN.

But it was doubtful if he could hold it. The "landelinian" columns which had been moving to the left increased their pace steadily while the guns on the hills not carried hammered Hansonias lines with relentless fury pouring a curtain of fire which threatened the annihilation of very nature besides his crushed lines. In another minute a long grey line appeared at the base and moving swiftly up but so many columns were decimated at every step that the "landelinians" thought twice before they dashed into those hostile columns. There was a slow halt the right of the line made a withdrawal and staggered but the rest stood firm until reinforced. Then Hansonia was outnumbered and flanked compelled to abandon the heights he took so bravely. His position was no longer one of attack. He defended himself with unflinching firmness but was constantly forced to sent in an appeal for help as he was now hard pressed. General "Ivianias" saw this however and plied his main batteries on the advancing enemy who halted instead of pushing on.

The "landelinians" were so reinforced by Maldonia, Ricknell however and Hansonias fell back taking a stand on Mc-Hollister ridge. Federal's army had succeeded in withdrawing from the trap by his desperate battle just predicted. Toward the south end Ricknell was at first successful but Frederick Parsons' artillery decimated his columns and the survivors were driven hurriedly back, while at the same time Archie's Snatch of "Ivianias" left left found himself in terrible difficulties for his flank was turned. General Howards on the christian side was wounded but general "Harico" Glance who succeeded him was reinforced by dragons divisions at eleven o'clock and these attacked the "landelinians" on the "Ivianias" flank with all the fury they could assume but seeing the purple lines riven by big gaps from the fire of Hansonias artillery they poured through crushing the whole line to fragments and driving the survivors toward Zimmermann's sea of dead and wounded exposed after this success.

In unfortunate development left the christian right exposed near Erminian creek and Vansonia commanding there was forced in his turn to withdraw his main left grand division leaving once more the field to the enemy whose line seventy miles long had at this time been storming with fire. The half of general Vanleys army was crossing the river but did not arrive until this retreat was under way. General smash-in-the-heads main army was still on the other side and Vanley receiving information that the main christian line still held storming and storming with fire was worried. At this moment general Raymond Richardson Federal receiving heavy reinforcements advanced to carry the Salumata works which was gaurded by tired demoralized troops. Large christian divisions arrived to take their places however and the firing along this line seemed like the wing of death to the enemy, but finally supported by a seavere artillery fire the Mandeliniens carried the works and the Angelinians fell back to the shelter of their batteries which seemed to blow the enemy's ridges to pieces; with the storm of gang-gang-shells and shrapnell. Simultaneous was the attack on the Apple Orchids. This christian line from creeks gains meadows and across plains was stormed with murderous fury and amid the horrible carnage it held everywhere except in the vicinity of the headquarters of which Moyne had been driven from by a stor storm of shells and high explosives.

Here the divisions under Rudolph Resuendeheld were driven back but as Hairbreadth Perry the Mandeliniens leader was severely wounded the Mandeliniens were unable to hold it. Hodens position at the right of Federal division was also carried but the christian concentration and reinf reinforcements at that point was increased to such an extent that the Mandeliniens divisions shattered to pieces by the christian fire was forced to fall back.

Divisions of Federal's ninth corps had taken up a position at a southwest point of Vansonia's lines but the retreat of Vansonia's Christian column did not make a regular gap as he was desirous the christian artillery fairly pounded the Mandeliniens who had only succeeded in driving the Angelinians into a position which was advantageous of defense for the Angelinians and Federal having failed to turn either flank made a concentrated assault upon Vansonia's center which also stormed with fire. Vansonia's whole line was now in danger of being carried. Federal renewed the fierce attacks and tried to silence the christian batteries. He thinned the christian line at this point and kept it thin by threatening the flanks but he could not silence the christian batteries.

Large upon charge was made upon the christian center. More than ten thousand five hundred guns opened upon Vansonia's divisions ten miles long cutting it to fragments and assisted by infantry of general Gratic who came to the support of Vansonia's divisions the Mandeliniens were again driven back. The Mandeliniens batteries kept up an annihilating fire upon the christian cannon which numbered back in titan threes until all the hulls for a hundred miles long echoed with the din. The artillery duel roared like a million explosions popping in hundreds per second, the artillery duel continuing for half an hour then eight million

Mandeliniens moved across an open plain in the form of serpentine wedges and for all the distance of a score of miles the Mandeliniens were shadowed by the trailing streams of death and destruction and three generals Dummer, Je main and Corpin fell in quick succession the whole three being killed.

The moment they scaled the works the fourth general Adelsberger he Adels-de-garbs Castellioe was killed. The whole gray line was broken into fragments and recoiled. Federal unsupported by the expected corps had fallen the heavy hand of fate. Ricknell now advanced with his batteries to cover the reformation of his shattered columns. General Vansonia decided the battle once more began another advance with nearly one quarter of his boy force. This advance was terrific and though torn ones of hell seemed to sweep their lines to pieces they could not be checked. Onward pressed the Angelinians until they were one hundred yards from the gray lines.

First first Federal's left let out a hail of fire then the center and right. The Angelinians halted and blazed back in such an uproar that it seemed as if the ground was blown up in some mighty eruptions. The whole left was now struggling in the battle. The hellstorm soon spread to the center and soon along each hostile front the uproar seemed to be at its height the volleys blazing and rolling with the uproar of a mighty line of volcanoes in eruptions, as thick as the sand around sound when an insatiable torrent of rocks pelt the cities roofs simultaneously, as thick as the fire, as we saw when the incandescent lightning amid the uproar of a of a titanic typhoon frizzed the wind clouds. At this moment some of the Mandeliniens battalions became silent as they were felled. Three more Mandeliniens leaders had fallen this time wounded being Part Castellioe, Castellioe and Stanley. and now all the Mandeliniens divisions were furiously engaged. The conflict was tremendous but soon a large part of the Federal's center was forced and the fate of victory hung upon a soldiers thread. However Federal restored the broken line and the christian right wing being crushed to fragments withdrew from the line of assault the whole christian line giving way. Federal advanced after the christians in a sea of smoke puering persuing pursuing the Angelinians toward Zimmermann and Mc-Holter where hawes checked by the ear-splitting crash of a line of deadly mines and by general Vivianias concentrated artillery storm.

SOME MIGHTY CONFLICT!

THE FIERCEST PARTS OF THE BATTLE AT MC-HOLTER HILL.

NEVERT BELIEVE. Federal's left continued to press on and made a fierce and determined attack upon Ricknell's line now under Henry Phelan and which continued with unabated fury. In the meantime general Volcanias divisions sent out on an inspection encountered the full force of the enemy at Sanford plains and were routed with the loss of three quarters of the brigade. General Call saw this and notified general Pansie Evans who went to the rescue with his forces. Volcanias main division was soon in the action and checked the enemy along his front but Phelan was being worsted. General Jennings Hanson at this moment brought his forces into action and held his ground against twenty fierce attacks until general Germania Canso came to his aid. Germania's terrific artillery artillery temporarily checked the furious onrush of the enemy but the other forces were coming to the rescue and the attacks of Germania Vivianias became so fierce that Germania Canso feared that his christian division would meet annihilation. The struggle was fearful but the arrival of heropiles divisions came to his relief and had he not done so the whole christian line along this point would have been crushed to fragments. The main body of the enemy under Canso Ricknell made a movement to place the christians between two fires but after frightful carnage they were repulsed the Angelinians holding their ground like spartans. Fowler himself met the Mandeliniens with all his fury and though Germania left wing of Mandeliniens was rolled up with frightful loss, it took many terrific assaults before the enemy could reestablish this part of their crushed line.

General Vivianias began to send heavy reinforcements to Germania's aid checking the enemy's advance. Bernard suffered first from petty attacks which became general and terrific and so fierce that Wallenton had to come to his aid and relieved the greatest greatest force of the enemy's attack. Bernard's right wing was overpowered and if it had not been for Pateman's corps who arrived, serious consequences would have followed. Pateman checked the enemy and drove them back in great confusion. Germania's right wing also checked the enemy and threw them back with tremendous loss. Federal's whole force was advancing however and the battle became extremely fierce, Germania's whole line being now forced back but after an hour of harder fighting general Vivianias threw more heavy forces to the rescue and though Germania Vansonia on the side of the Mandeliniens was killed the Mandeliniens attack did not abate. In the meantime general Vansonia was also heavily reinforced and was again assuming the offensive attacking Federal's center with all the fury he could command assuming breaking the left wing at all points. The Mandeliniens fought with the most frightful fury, Vansonia's divisions being thrown across St. Clara's plains and fairly hewed their way through the enemy's lines which being crushed to fragments began to yield to their bound. Federal's left grand division was also driven out of their position as they had been flanked and reduced to a mere handful. The spolia on the christian side was killed.

Simultaneously while this was going on seven million Mandeliniens crossing the river made an attempt to strike the christian flank but without success though the christian general by the name of Kennen E. Stratrock was killed. The enemy continued to advance under a heavy cannon fire

An ocean storm casting all its wreckage of its violence upon the shore, tossing the fragments hither and thither in a relentless sowing of destruction, crashing and breaking the victims of its wrath, with forces marbled and fierced from primitive of pain could alone be comparable to the pitiful pitiless crash of men in deadly grapple for the mastery of those fated positions. Three thousand more cannon now barked to check Maldonia's reckless impetuous advance and ploughed hundreds of avenues in his main double lines....

General Vivian's Bat'erie as an opened upon the assailants attack attacking Hanson's divisions left grand division and several several times strategic points in the fields were occupied alternately by the graycoats but finally in the full fury of the bloody fury of the contest remains lines returned to the ground to become again furiously engaged there in the flanking movements that were taking place with the enemy or with an enemy as badly confused and crippled as ever could be in the now-raging inferno of the whole line of battle....

Maldonia was now wounded and Ambrose Fuller driving his columns back at naked Sanguine positions and the words itself resembled a fiery hell, the Mandelins falling in scores of thousands. Ambrose Fuller amid all this fiery uproar of an ear earthly inferno forced the blazing Christian lines at four thirty but Hanson's sent heavy divisions to the aid of poor Sanguine and forced the Mandelins columns to withdraw once more..... So terrible had been the roar of artillery and musketry that all through the bloody day many legions of cannon seemed to be in action.... Ambrose Fuller's attack had been repulsed with the great greatest destruction ever happening to a division but Maldonia's division was making new forces upon Hanson's whose frontal columns in turn, making a counter charge met with such frightful decimation that it seemed useless to contend with the repulsive and lines under general Shampoo which were hurled upon his line though his forces had cut them up considerably.

1,300 center-meter guns were opened on Ricknell's right and left wings but reaching reaching the right of the line after a rally Ambrose Fuller directed the rear columns to close up and maintain the lines and soon Sanguine on Hanson's left was hard pressed. In the meantime Manley having crossed heavy forces over the pontoon bridges all day long now led more than six million men against general Vivian's central grand division and amid stupid carnage also drove it back when general Sanguine's division advanced heavy reinforcements to the rescue and threatened the Mandelins columns with annihilation though the assailants had managed to push general Aberdeen McWhirther's lines from the main line with their leader wounded.

Manley could not make much progress just now his first grand division being already badly cut up and mangled. General Corns' Vivian made titanic efforts to retake the positions abandoned by McWhirther but as every assault met with frightful decimation, Baldwin with the aid of a terrific artillery fire made an attempt to reinforce the works but he himself was severely wounded and his force also half annihilated met heavy reinforcements of the enemy who pressed on capturing Baldwin's entire line of cannon and intrenchments. For two hours already Hanson's left had been hard pressed and fierce attempts were made by Ambrose Fuller to rout Hanson's from his strong position but was unsuccessful though Sanguine's whole line was cut up and shattered in fact his whole line was falling back. During those two hours he had withstood a simultaneous attack all along his line but now it was a series of desperate engagements and this enabled Hanson's to move some of his unengaged troops to the main point of attack and now the assailants met with more serious resistance. Adele-de-garbes though wounded several times during the battle would not leave his command and these he brought to their assistance Ambrose Fuller's right grand division was almost annihilated while Ricknell, Cannonian Johnson and McWhirther's Aberdennia forcing and maintaining a position near the McWhirther's plains captured a strong Christian battery. Scrambling the death-strawn plains at eight P.M. P.M. surged around to the west and went into fierce action against the Christian right. The result was the gradual withdrawal of Christians to the woods west of McWhirther's where a terrible struggle raged. Ricknell's columns having been reinforced caused a swift withdrawal of Moyn's line also but in the excruciating carnage he lost his best horse and received a wound in the hand.

Adele-de-garbes left grand division entering the woods was repelled so fiercely by twenty Abbeismann brigades that the divisions were reduced to fragments.

and Adele-de-garbes whole army fell back badly crippled but were not rallied and reinforced. Federal in the meantime made a most spirited and determined assault upon the Christian center but fortune favored the center where Ambrose's main columns were attacking and where they seemed to have massed a strong force had been shattered by a serious storm of fire from three thousand guns and as their whole line gave way before Federal's headlong assault it was quickly discovered that by wheeling to the left they could flank and infiltrate the troops who so tenaciously held McWhirther's plains.

The attempt failed with damming slaughter, but nevertheless despite all this frightful carnage assault followed assault, and only was abandoned when three million three-hundred thousand had been mowed down or captured prisoners.

His knell himself continued to storm the Christian line along his front and though unsuccessful made another only with the same horrible result and ten brigades were wiped out in a curtain of artillery fire which carried all before it like an avalanche of hell fire. Simultaneously Hanson's right after the most cruel sanguinary fighting was flanked. Richard Ricknell on the Christian side being killed but on the left and right the Mandelins divisions met with such frightful decimation that the survivors were horridly horrified.

Despite this the right held but the left and center recoiled, the series of desperate stands made by the Christians being fully marked by great winds of dead and dying miles long. Ricknell's main line continued to sweep to the attack rallied the left and center and in the pandemoniums of close fighting Jimmie Logan's batteries were carried with the death of their commander but Henry McWhirther's chain of deadly artillery landed a 11 approaches to McWhirther's plains and Ricknell himself found himself in the midst of a roaring inferno.

Never in all the war had there been such carnage and general Hanson and Richard Ricknell on the Christian side were seriously wounded, in a maze of exploding shells but the Angelins receiving heavy reinforcements annihilated their flankers and fairly crushed Ricknell's lines which held firmly on however till the arrival of some more of Federal's main columns who alone during terrific fighting managed to make some impression on the Christian lines though Federal was struck a terrible blow by McWhirther's heavy infantry columns. McWhirther had already fallen and also Jennings and McWhirther whose batteries were captured and amid whole wholesale slaughter.

Sanguine himself fell wounded and his army was still hard pressed. The exultant Mandelins pressed on but met a gallant fire from Aberdennia and Greathart's lines which roared like a hundred billion can on if believed. Ambrose Fuller's divisions gave way gradually and he was also wounded making indeed the loss of Christian generals very heavy.

One of Greathart's main grand divisions was being withdrawn to cover one million seven hundred thousand still stood fast though their leader finally fell wounded. Bernard Cannon rallied James Castellion's lines thus preventing a panic. In the meantime general Phelan had made a stand near the 'Arcecellion' lines and general Pennington got to his works in time to change change front and oppose Federal who was advancing large forces across Jennings river and in the frightful carnage fell mortally wounded.

The river banks were occupied but Pennington's men fell back. Federal's whole column was making the most fierce attack ever seen on Hanson's as extreme center which gave way many times already but was rallied by more fresh troops the Angelins making a furious and stoic stubborn stand. General Hanson's relieved reinforcements which was thrown upon the left grand division of Federal's army with tremendous fury, and in the furious fighting that raged both sides seemed threatened with annihilation or destruction....

General Hanson's reestablished his broken and shattered lines and withdrew slowly, the left grand division of Sanguine's army now under Henrique St. Clara being rolled up but Hanson's main line still held falling to give way and during the frightful carnage Henrique St. Clara was severely wounded.... Hanson's main line still held despite every effort of the enemy to dislodge him. One section of the attack fell with the greatest force upon Hanson's center under 'Edon Maldonia' which was overlanded and rolled up with the death of Sander, and general Sander also was killed as his forces and Federal's encountered an annihilating fire from 'Leo Castellion's' batteries the Mandelins however for some strange reason withdrawing in confusion. Directing a continuous murderous fire of many batteries Federal rallied the disordered troops and moved obliquely to the left to meet the right of the retreating Mandeliniens. Federal with new forces tried to lead assaults against the roaring christian batteries but despite his efforts the Mandeliniens were temporarily checked in their sweeping advance by Ag Augustines batteries and it was three hours afterward before they could move forward again. It was already five o'clock in the night and Hanson's divisions supported by Aquatin and Agu Augustines flashing guns rallied and made a stubborn stand. General Federal having at last rallied his disordered troops led them forward to stop Augustine's batteries in front while he sent large forces to storm the flank defended by Molanne divisions. After incredible carnage the battery was carried and Augustine was borne from this as some of his artillery was mortally wounded. A few minutes later the batteries were retaken however while whole divisions were thrown upon Ambrose's flank with hellish fury.

General also came to the aid of the christians but was himself wounded and brought from the scene of carnage in a critical condition. Lockness made an attempt to flank Maldonia's right but he himself was dangerously wounded and his army of christians cut to pieces.

Also from the main christian columns Nicknell was met with cruel resistance and his whole assaulting line was threatened with annihilation. Ambrose Fuller tried to aid Nicknell but failed on account of the arrival of christian reinforcements and learning that General's divisions army was requiring large portions lost recently notified General Huebner that the battle seemed lost.

Nicknell's surviving columns were already hard pressed but he had long before received reinforcements and he again and again met the Mandeliniens with cold steel. Manley saw the furious advance upon his batteries and realized that it was impossible to check them unless Hanson's was sent back from his batteries crushed and broken lines which had taken defense now in a battle of battle smitten words. Many millions of Mandeliniens were sent to meet the assaults and found ants advancing in the batteries being led by Logan and Weber but these two christian generals had long before been killed, while Hanson's main line was thrown back across Hanson's front.

Though Hanson's was reinforced Federal's columns on the left being in danger of annihilation withdrew their leader being mortally wounded. Federal's whole line tried to advance but could not on account of heavy columns trying to retake the heights lost so long ago. The assaults on the heights were terrific and over four hundred thousand were slain. For a part of the heights was carried. In the meantime the struggle still continued along the long stretch of woods which Hanson's had taken and which he was now bound to hold for if the enemy recaptured it Manley would be enabled to regain the heights. After making many unsuccessful assaults Nicknell, Ambrose, and Hanson's withdrew from the heights the Mandeliniens pressing them hard.

Federal's army had lost

5,973,897 in killed wounded and missing in the full duration of his actions in the six six days battle already even past. The other generals had lost more than seven to eight or nine million eight hundred and seventy three thousand three hundred and thirty one.

Manley seeing the situation started one of the most terrific artillery duels ever seen since the war began.

THE MOST TERRIFIC OF THE NIGHT

The artillery duel began along the unoccupied portions of the heights and increased until the whole scene of infantry action was dominated by a sea of earth rending explosions. At the same time three or four big columns of infantry led by smash-in-the-head made a terrific assault upon Ambrose's batteries but was repulsed with terrific loss a part of his division being driven across the plain which was inflamed by general's divisions howitzers and sentinels. General Hanson's divisions rallied a part of the main columns and stood his ground against the Mandeliniens at attack but their leader being killed the Mandeliniens badly cut up withdrew a second time. As more artillery was brought into action the infantry again pressed forward to the attack moved by the left flank and against the christian line under General's Federal.

This column however being threatened with annihilation was compelled to recoil. The artillery duel continuing with the surefire of titans the Mandeliniens general's led another infantry assault but was again repulsed with frightful losses. Nicknell being inflamed by the Mandeliniens' cannon was also forced to withdraw to better cover. Learning of a general movement made by the enemy general's divisions ordered all his batteries into action and soon the entire scene of great guns was in a titanic uproar. An hour later Manley was rejoining with all his guns but could not silence the christian batteries. One million two hundred thousand Mandeliniens advanced to silence the christian batteries but came into collision with a part of Hanson's main line and though they succeeded in forcing a part they could progress no further and Hanson's was massing his columns drove them back badly cut up and destroyed. In the meantime Nicknell's army had been caught between August's divisions and the McWhirther plains and the war of hell and its duration seemed once more to rage here.

While heavy reinforcements were coming to Nicknell's aid General Hanson's learned that Federal's main army was striking for the great Catherine heights intending to retake it at all costs. A most fierce attack fell upon Nicknell's left flanking the heights once more into a blazing smoking inferno. After hard fighting the enemy but won Nicknell's left while the McWhirther line became like flaming fountains. A part of Federal's columns was charging General's advanced batteries near a wheatfield while the flanking force was pressing on the heights all rolling toward Hanson's lines in tumultuous masses sweeping up the heights. Hanson held against a fierce front and flank attack for a whole hour the carnage being terrific.

Nicknell's left and right was broken and seeing the enemy sweeping for the heights Hanson's sent Richardson's brigade and sent him to the heights which he did. Meanwhile the tremendous blow of Robert's brigade column struck the right of Hanson's brigade driving it in confusion. Hanson under a hot storm of fire managed to rally his right grand division and in that agonizing moment Richardson's brigade arrived and sprang into that frightful turmoil.

At this moment the flankers reached the top and the two lines met and broke and mingled in the titanic shock. The edge of the mighty death struggle swayed to and fro, with seemingly wild whirlpools and eddies of masses. Robert's and Hanson's McWhirther's charge however was repulsed though Hanson's lines had almost been crushed to fragments. The enemy rallied however and gathered in force but Hanson's knowing his weakness made a counter charge but met a crushing repulse though he managed to inflict frightful slaughter. Hanson's left being utterly overwhelmed was hard pressed, the other Mandeliniens divisions rallied and Hanson's again took defense and when his line ran out of ammunition Hanson made a right wheel the left wing of the christian line swung first. The advancing foe stopped, tried to make a stand but the frenzied bayonets pressing through every space forced a constant withdrawal to the rear. General's divisions having fallen, Robert's took command and withdrew the Mandeliniens toward Federal's main line who held the christian line at bay. Hanson withdrew his columns back to the heights which he had held so firmly against overwhelming odds.

Federal's reinforcements caused the assault to be resumed. The third onset almost succeeded, for Hanson's line was almost crushed. The struggle still raged in the McWhirther lanes and Federal's offensive advance of Manley's main army threatened to crush Hanson's left. Hanson's left and the fifth corps coming to the Mandeliniens' aid under Hallen could not hold. The formation of the battle line had broadened to that of a large and long fan with the foe pressing both flanks, and fearing that he would be caught as in a vice Hanson's fell back. Nicknell still held though his entire line was saved by the Mandeliniens' cannon. Hanson's seeing the situation ordered Nicknell to fall back but he refused seeing that it was too late as he must now fight to the end. The whole of the McWhirther lanes were the worse slaughter pen ever witnessed by the christian generals before. Nicknell's thousands of guns were utterly overwhelmed and outnumbered but his whole line strove with seemingly mortal in immortal valor against all the uneven odds in a hell furnace of devastation fire and smoke. However after hard fighting for three hours the brave Mandeliniens suffering heavy losses were forced to withdraw and Nicknell's established his line.

However, Butler had steadily been advancing sixteen million men against the towering heights and now the foremost of these a host made a frightful assault the left ran left range. For some time Hanson's purple lines held but the assault was so overwhelming that the Christian columns were crushed to fragments and forced to withdraw in the slightest confusion ever seen in actual warfare. The Mandelins pursuing them pouring seemingly from everywhere. Threatened with being surrounded Hanson's division retreated in a perfect stampede and even when rescued by reinforcements could not be rallied.

Robin Kinderburg rushed to the rescue of the rest on the heights and amid that inferno of death and destruction the advance of the enemy was temporarily checked. At the same time this occurred Hanson's also was attacked with incredible fury and though both opposing forces were torn asunder amid the crash of hell the Mandelins receiving fresh troops steadily forced a part of Hanson's position.

Hanson's whole line was being struck cruel and unmerciful blows. His left grand division being hard pressed and threatened with annihilation. Hanson's appealed for help which arrived under General Mc-Cabe. His arrival prevented the enemy from penetrating any further and Hanson's managed to rally his left grand division the latter now raging with indescribable fury. Mc-Cabe, Hoynes and Hanson's now held the enemy at bay and so fierce was the conflict that it seemed as if the whole world was one rampage. The enemy along Hoynes' front being frightfully decimated. However, Hanson's was also successful but the enemy still held the heights and indeed by the time Hanson's and the armies who tried to retake them met with frightful destruction.

But the success of Hanson's was short it being only another temporary check of the enemy. Other parts of Hanson's main divisions advanced amid fearful slaughter. Hoynes' whole left was cut up but reinforcements arrived and Hoynes continued to make his desperate stand. Federal's men pressed on striking Hanson's blazing lines with tremendous fury and carrying all before him along his right flank a carnage more horrible than on the day before. Hanson's main line threatened to be cut in two but soon their headlong advance was staggered and crushed by Hoynes' reinforcing Abilene divisions and concentrated the Mandelins being badly smitten and forced to recoil even the other points abandoned by Hanson had been retaken. Mc-Cabe was hard pressed however and Hamilton ready to be sent to his aid and his Angelians met Federal's amid carnage which was beautiful to behold for hell's infernal regions.

Ready decimated Estrabrooks three million Mandelins forcing a part to withdraw. The main gray line pressed on however and attacked so fiercely and smothered such blood-curdling yells that Roswell Mc-Mollers' main left grand division was cut to pieces and annihilated, while Reedy threatened with annihilation also had to withdraw. Roswell Mc-Moller was seriously wounded and Reedy was killed. General Jackson's Evanson took Reedy's command but also fell dead. Richardson's line strong line also relieved the front of the fierce attack but could no longer stand before the enemy's fierce attack and were compelled to fall back.

Hoynes receiving immense reinforcements made desperate attempts to reform his army which had been cut up receiving a sledge hammer blow and succeeded as nine million one hundred and seventy thousand men were defending the heights and holding on like grim death amid all this unusual carnage. Hanson's himself was hard pressed and sent an appeal for help while Hoynes' line being crushed to pieces recoiled in a panic. Picknow's army covered Hanson's retreat and prevented the Mandelins from flanking him. Danger losing more than three quarters of his division was swept back clean from the heights. Along Hanson's front the enemy was checked and a large division of Mandelins tried to overwhelm his lines but was annihilated. Antonio Sanguine the brother of the wounded Sanguine moved down from August ridge to danger's rescue and held the enemy at bay for sometime, then he himself was hard pressed and his remaining columns were threatened with annihilation. Sanguine held his ground then he himself was overwhelmed and himself in danger of annihilation.

Picknow able to hold his ground informed General Hanson's that Sanguine's army was cut to pieces and in danger of being surrounded and that Hanson's lines threatened with annihilation was forced to withdraw. General Hanson's seeing Sanguine's danger massed all his available batteries upon the enemy but could not check them. Hamilton, Rosling, and Imleside swelled Sanguine's lines with heavy reinforcements but scores of their divisions were crushed to fragments and could not hold firm.

Sanguine held against three million horsemen, though he was wounded and but Hanson's lines were pierced and cut to pieces at one point and he himself severely wounded. A good thing too. At this moment Reedy's purple lines came to Hanson's support and the carnage was increased with redoubled fury. Hanson's left was crushed to fragments and driven in and Reedy receiving three wounds was borne from the field in a very critical condition. Prime thereafter opposing the enemy for an hour was forced back but by the arrival of Sanguine he got out of hell's slaughter but could not check the onslaught of the enemy. Hanson's for hours had been struck a cruel blow and punished severely but he met the herculean charge with indescribable ferocity though his lines were suffering terribly in losses. Diver was wounded pitifully, Puskak, Rachine, Maine, Broadine, and Benton were killed in this frightful massed, general Accountine was severely wounded, and in a bad condition, general Cleveland was killed and Abner though painfully wounded was able to retain command of these Christians having been at one time.

Hanson's lines supported by the divisions under Jackson's Evans were forced the latter being crushed to fragments. Beverly's army had been annihilated, also Washington's and Sanguine's and Grants and all of these generals also being severely wounded and one hundred and fifty other generals were borne from the field wounded and fifty others killed. Baird fell, then Ben L. Aign and Warner being mortally wounded. Hanson's whole right was hard pressed and threatened with destruction while Alfred Costello's army was almost crushed to pieces by the foe. Hanson's whole columns however were steadily receiving reinforcements from Virginia but the enemy still outnumbered them and so the situation only remained the same and there was not the slightest pause in the million can-on like roar of the terrific firing.

Hyde had suffered the fiercest punishment though he had been able to revenge his spanking. He stood for four hours against a fearful onslaught though his left and right had been crushed amid a sea of fire and destructive damnation. Hyde would have lost his position had he not been reinforced.

By such serious resistance the enemy's whole line was jarred wildly and August Jennings striking at their left threw them into instant confusion enabling Hyde to carry all before him. Hanson's left made a clean sweep of his desperate assailants cutting the main columns and sending the survivors fleeing for dear life.

Every Christian column swooped down upon the enemy's breaking their line all to pieces. The Mandelins now seemed to be making a wholesale success at the whole of Hanson's main assaulting column had not been there yet to contend with and these now arrived and struck Hanson's front with seemingly immortal fury and though suffering terrible destruction they carried all before them in a furnace of musketry firing then driving them up the heights their whole line crushed and mangled capturing an angle of works, Federal striking Hanson's left simultaneously a withering blow decimating his lines and carrying all before him but by the help of his terrible can chain of cannon which raked the gray front the whole length and called it frightfully, Hanson's managed to rally his shattered left and press back the assailant's starting in the path of one of the Mandelins' columns and threatening it with annihilation. Notwithstanding all this whole sale slaughter and carnage Federal's main columns continued the frightful assault with immortal fury and Hanson's in order to check them endeavored to entreat new lines of artillery but the battery could not be brought up quick enough and when it was brought up it could not hold and threatened with destruction withdrew.

Hanson's main line held its ground with a fury of which no language could describe and Federal's left wing having only crushed itself against the Christian right was compelled to recoil but the main line was still advancing though Federal's left had retired a short distance. But they had rapidly recovered from the shock and resumed their headlong attack with redoubled fury, but their whole line was mangled by a horrible fire and forced to withdraw again. Since the beginning Hanson's line had stood its ground amid the horrible carnage along four in the morning of the seventh day until nine o'clock. Seas of dead and wounded lay everywhere on the battle field. General Underbecker tried to carry the heights but their lines got a rough handling and even a spanking and choking like a mare trot and sent flying with only a handful of survivors many hundreds of thousands having been captured the other out of the way of flight. However Federal main army aided by Connelly was continually thrown upon Vansonia's army, the left being again forced losing all the ground it had won and indeed the whole Christian army was now almost high exhausted by the blows of the desperate Federal columns. The Angelinians in the two main wings though fighting like wild bulls when cornered realized that Federal indeed was a real human cyclone but however receiving five million more men the Angelinians were again successful and checked Federal almost crushing his columns to pieces and giving him another slight wound. Connelly's army it self was in a situation like a helpless child being shocked to death and fell fast at the same time, so had nothing else to do but lay down its army arms, throw itself humbly down before Vansonia and beg for its----- indeed five million Angelinian troops surrendering without firing another shot to the reception it had received though after surrendering Connelly had committed suicide.

Ambrose Fuller's Gladiators still advanced however ascended the ridge, and attacked the Christians with the fury of a roaring avalanche of demons. For a time they threatened to force the Christian lines but so much reinforcements concentrated upon the assailants that the carnage became a horror between heaven and earth. The gray line at several points began to give way but Federal having far greater numbers rallied his shattered frontal columns and rolled up wackentires. Murderous slaughter now ensued and wholesale losses. Vansonia's whole left grand division was forced to withdraw but Federal's brother on the Christian side lost hundreds of thousands whole lines a mile long dissolving away as he was forced to yield. Yet as the assault continued the carnage increased with redoubled fury. Vansonia's line still striving with the utmost fury to also drive Gladiators back. Although Vansonia's men had held their position for two hours more against Vansonia's onslaughts and the Angelinian columns would have carried all before them and crush Vansonia's line had not General Vivian continually sent reinforcements. But this favorable circumstance did not entirely exempt the strong Christian line from being time and again swept and torn to pieces by the enemy's irresistible assault. The general attack on the Christian side alone could not hold however and had been driven back crushed and broken. Adele-de-garde continued to attack Vansonia's lines with Federal and Vansonia and for a time Adele-de-garde's army was again threatened with destruction, so fierce was the Christian resistance while at one point they were checked.

On both sides there was a woeiful losses in officers and men. Along Vansonia's whole front for forty nine miles in extent the attack had for all this time since it started in general during the night been pressed with furious desperation and General Vivian's having seen General Vansonia's plight had hurried forward division after division to his support and now he longed and yearned for a lull in the fur firing for the very din of it was almost driving him crazy from worry and had to have something placed tightly in his ears to shut out the awful sound of hellish slaughter and battles tumultuous pandemonium of roaring cannons and musketry while everywhere was a sea of smoke and flame. Jennings' column could not withstand the fierce onslaught of the enemy along his front and had to withdraw withdraw most of his men almost going insane and maddened and horrified from the din and from the scenes of slaughter.

The most fierce and bloodiest and longest attack in the war was going on bravely lines had been out like a knife and he himself lost his hearing and was even blinded for life by the din and wounded in the barrier.

There was nothing cheerful along the whole of Vansonia's front at all, and ever since he started his bloody notion hairbreadth Harry had continued his hammering assault against the Christian lines under Rudolph's assistance the carnage being too frightful to witness, the right and center of Rudolph's lines having now been rolled up and crushed and crushed to fragments in a furnace of flame and din which at the same time Jackson's right wing was overlapped by a tumult of graycoats but his whole line still stood firmly which prevented it from being rolled up and checked the enemy's advance though thousands upon thousands were driven mad by the din while other lawless helplessness and writhing with frenzied horror and burrowing their heads in the earth to try and shut out the hellish din of a cannons which seemed to blast the whole left line with a screaming sea of death and bloody scenes. Evans was wounded three times Jackson was killed but their forces still held in ignorance of the fall of their leaders. In the meantime the carnage still continued along the Vansonia line by Vansonia's Christian

The disposition along Vansonia's left became untenable and it was soon rolled up and driven back in confusion with the death of their leader James Connelly. The center also gave way the wounding of their leader Corbionia while the Angelinians under Rudolph Rudolph Estrabrook had it out in fine style with his right. The foe extended his line as to overlap the Christian right under Vansonia, frustrated an attempt to turn their flank and driving Gladiators back troops back with the wounding of their leader overlapped the right or Vansonia's wing and drove them back attacking Vansonia's main line with the utmost determination but without success. Vansonia's right wing was fiercely engaged and so was Pickens' right wing who continued to contend against Vansonia's amid a furious volcano of flame and din. He continued his fierce onslaughts upon Vansonia but could not make further progress and General Sparr repulsed his assailants and drove him back pell-mell, while fierce attempts were made to force Vansonia's lines but the assailants along this point only met annihilation for their pains. General Jennings was now jeap jeopardized but Schroder came to his aid and managed to check the enemy though he fell severely and dangerously wounded.

Vansonia's lines were indeed attacked with the most determined fury ever seen before for as quick as the varied attacking lines would be cut and thrown up into great confusion other lines would go to it like calm and raging maddened fury causing the battle to rage all the time with the same utmost and steady and indescribable fury without a slight lull or pause in the deafening, asplittling din of thousands upon thousands of cannons and musketry the firing line extending fully one hundred miles long.

The attacks of the enemy had been utmost ferocious the bloody action also extending along Vivian's line the Angelinians falling in thousands of multitudes but their attacks had ceased not and now it was already ten o'clock in the morning and the battle had slowed not the slightest abatement. At the critical moment when the Angelinians were about to force a part of Vivian's lines to pieces amid the most frightful hail of carnage fresh troops arrived from the left of Vansonia's blazing lines and the enemy at this time was staggered by a withering curtain storm of double-shotted canister, shells, high explosives and missiles of all kinds the cannons of the Christians being loaded and fired as fast as men could work. However the enemy continued the assault with the same ruthless fury and Vansonia's central division was rolled up, displaced and forced back, by the heavy losses. However a long line of works resembling a lunatic was assaulted again and again without success.

Simultaneously Constable Mc-Hollister and Wallis Mc-Hollister his brother met a tremendous attack but with the help of log barricades repelled their assailants with success rolling the Angelinian columns back and shattered in many places. During the continuation of the furious onset upon Vansonia's lines a part of the assaulting line poured past his extreme right but encountered a deadly fire from a line of cannon and were forced to withdraw. Estrabrook then led a fierce assault upon the cannons but met a complete and devastating repulse, encountering the fire of Henriques' batteries, also Vansonia's assailants withdrew from his front. The attack along the whole of Vansonia's front was still very steady but the Angelinian cannon fairly pounded them though assault after assault was made by General Brooks while Estrabrook's receiving reinforcements resumed the assault upon the cannons with greater fury though his whole front line was withered by the Christian cannon fire. Estrabrook's Schroder assaulted Henriques' batteries but even at the beginning of the charge he fell mortally wounded. Major General August Brackemads desperate efforts simultaneously to carry Henriques' left chain of cannon but he himself was wounded amid the dreadful carnage. Another general Estrabrook tried it but without success and he got his abdomen cut open by a shell and revealed a horrible sight indeed.

Many fierce assaults were made upon the batteries but of no avail and having lost Vansonia Mc-Hollister's lines the Gladiators became discouraged though the assault never receded.

Though Vansonia was able to repel the furious assault of his assailants assailants by the aid of General Vivian's front main columns which arrived the assault of the enemy on the batteries continued with unabated fury, but however the Gladiators were failing to take the batteries and only met with the most frightful decimation. General Boge Angelinian columns rushing across Mc-Hollister's plains were banged inside out after fierce and preternatural slaughter. General Maldonia Estrabrook had led this fierce assault and now he was sorely pressed by the Angelinians though he strove with might and main to stand his ground against the

and a tremendous odds. The assaults of the christians coming from a le-whirther line was no fierce however that Ketrabrock was again forced to give way and was scattered like chaff he himself being mortally wounded. On the heights the conflict still raged. Manonias was now again contacted by many landelinian batteries which swept his lines from left to right and goodness and gracious how they did pitch death and destruction into his lines. The fearful artillery fire continued all the while his lines were assaulted by the enemy column after column of Manley's men having advanced to the attack and never before was the landelinians seen to fight with such fearful fury and thousands of battle flags on both sides were torn to rags by the pitiless storm of bullets. A very murderous fire had continually been poured into their very faces as it very but nothing had or could as it seemed stop them. At ten thirty o'clock the pressure along Manonias center became greater and greater until at last all those defenders at least the first line of battle were hurled down the slope broken and discomfited the landelinians now being unable to see anything from a sea of powder smoke were unable to follow as they would be closed in by the main columns, which in spite of every effort the other forces failed to carry, although at four points they had several times charged up to and over the positions. General Bert along had lost nine hundred thousand as his advancing landelinian column had been infiltrated and he himself had been wounded and his horse disabled by a shell. He left of Bartlett or Gully column had all the while been also fiercely engaged while nearly at the same time several divisions with artillery others with infantry had kept up a storming of hill of firing.

In another hour the battle along the whole of Manonias front had ended to grow to its full strength and the line of fire became like the murder of hell. Simultaneous to all this a titanic conflict had raged along general Viviana left where in one single hour ten million men were put out of action by the crippling of their forces one million five hundred thousand having been slain and as Marc Johnston brought half of his force into action the whole column of landelinians made a furious counter assault to repel them all them and so many reinforcements were concentrated upon the angelinians that they had to give more serious resistance mowing down a hundred thousand landelinians within the space of a mile.

The Angelinians held against these overwhelming numbers both sides surging thir to and for. Maldonias left wing was hard pressed and his whole line was forced to give way after fiercer fighting while the main intirecolumn of Antonio Genguine hastened to his aid and covered his retreat until he could rally what was left and sent them to the rear holding the enemy at bay.

The whole of Federals whole entire army was now in full action the fury of the firing having redoubled with ten fold violence along their whole line of both sides the entire battle being now in full sway and despite the furious redoubled of Forts Federal yet could not make any impression on Acknells firm line itself and the whole center under Ade-ede-garhe was crushed to fragments.

However it appeared that Acknells could no longer hold against such overwhelming odds and was forced to make a complete withdrawal the Angelinians retreating for a mile before receiving heavy reinforcements. Here Picknell again moved forward and met Federal with his fury the losses in killed on his side being more than four hundred thousand. In the meantime or at simultaneously Mc-Whirther's lines were incessantly shelled by three thousand guns and ext Federal extending his wings with reinforcements redoubled the fury of the attack still more crushing many a christian column. Weldon Cannon simultaneously secured the brunt of the heaviest onslaught of his time which he repulsed by making a counter charge and crushing his enemy to fragments. Many other great onslaughts had been made upon the christian line under Weldon Cannon but only with the same fatal result.

Manonias and Moynes continually repulsed fierce onslaughts made upon other sections of their lines at during the fiercest frightful carnage Moynes himself was severely wounded and borne from the field and a good part of his line was in confusion as it was fairly shot to pieces. Heavy attempts were now made to force the christian position under Moynes by battery fire but the Angelinians with their guns swelled the cannonading to a ware warfare of titans and repelled the fierce attack. Walthorn Jennings Pe-ings Jennings who also held against fierce attacks was overwhelmed and forced to the bay himself being severely wounded. Wilmer covered his retreat until he was surrounded until Castellion was seen up checked thousands of Manley's men and held the enemy at bay. Fresh landelinian columns were rushing to the attack the fierce landelinian front swarming upon Manonias line was incessantly battered by a wall of musketry fire, the frightful carnage and battle and assaults continuing and frightful and horrible duration. The enemy forced landelinian lines forward making an al avalanche like assault but were soon driven back. The main attack upon John Acknells line was pressed with fierce determination and his right was crushed. Mc-Whirther held firmly however but his entire right was hard pressed and the center threatened with annihilation. Manonias whose left was again hard pressed, appealed again for help and general Viviana sent Acknells Penligan and Castellion Picknell to Manonias support.

Adelades Glanalinians one million in number swarmed over Manonias works and drove the christians back but Hampton came to Manonias aid and though the both could stay the assault inflicted the enemy with intolerable loss. Manley all this time had been gathering Shoemmas whole force and now they began throwing upon Manonias besides the others already assaulting, increasing the frightful slaughter. Finding that his entire line of batteries was telling fearfully upon Federals Federal left Manonias rallied the parts of his columns in confusion, and as his whole line still held their original position though suffering terribly from the frequent charges of shells thrown upon them frustrated a vigorous effort to turn his left by massing fresh forces against the landelinians at that point almost annihilating the daring columns of flankers. Manonias left was continually hammered by the fearful onslaught which never stopped one moment and by the storming fire of the enemy's batteries. August August Augustine whole line of batteries batteries came the landelinian cc, columns making the scene a field of blood and hell.

Federal saw indeed that he could not a "once any if further and now fought with the utmost almost fury of desperation.

The battle had now wavered back and forth again and soon August Augustine was forced to withdraw as Federal had the advantage in position. Federal mistook this as a retreat and ordered a charge but Weldon Picknell exacting titans and Weldon also had long before this stationed his artillery and opened a fire which nothing human could stand against. However though threatened with frightful annihilation Federal's main line stormed Manonias with incredible fury, while along Manley's left and Viviana's right the battle waged with more terrible fury. Every column moving against the massive christian line was met with frightful decimation and continually faced a long line of howling screaming roaring fire, column after column being literally mowed down.

However a part of Federal's right and center of his main right wing had drawn back from the works they had captured revealing a ghastly sea of lead and dying. All of Manley's line itself was aflame and so was Manonias, and Viviana's the assailants meeting a fire continually from an unbelievable number of christian cannon which decimated every brigade that came within range.

Manonias line had stood so long so long that his whole purple line was badly torn to pieces but fortunately the enemy was still held at bay. Manley concentrated as fierce an assault upon general Viviana as ever he could and amid the stupendous carnage Manonias whole army was also decimated and broke into wild confusion. Picknell sent six million five hundred thousand men to the rescue and these were thrown upon the exultant landelinians a but could not reverse the tide of battle and in the spur to have six million fall in one hour on both sides combined, the shadow of hellish carnage hanging overall like a typhoon cloud.

The battle still raged itself with greater violence for the Mc-Whirther plains and the landelinians were successful for a time but now one million three hundred thousand angelinians after a terrific counter charge crushed the foe amid a baptism of fire and blood one million having fallen on the enemy side the whole conflict fairly given up to a slaughter and outrage. Fierce attempts attempts were made to carry the Mc-Whirther works which almost succeeded but the death of general Cain caused a frightful repulse. The second onslaught was made by general Gregory which was almost successful but met frightful results in the end.

Gregory, J. J. Gregory and Farrell had almost fore forced their way when the whole line fell dead and a piece of the line was killed. The enthusiasm of their men that they fought until reinforcements drove them back. About the summit of the mountain fought his way up to the very works and which would certainly have been captured had not the attack from the opposite quarter been stopped by the deaths of Gregory, J. J. Gregory and Farrell. General Donaldson repulsed his assailants with the support of heavy cannons. Hardraff's attack was more determined. His death caused the attack to cease but six assaults more were made and each time met with frightful slaughter and all along the line the storm of shell and shrapnel fell ever increasing a tremendous clattering thunderous salvoes. Simultaneous simultaneously a new Mandelini attack every began a fire concentratedly upon the McWhirther plins. The whole platoon was the scene of one of the most violent bombardments of any battle ever witnessed before and explosively fell incessantly all about the Christian lines. The fire increased rapidly and soon volleys of projectiles of every description fell on the Christian infantry lines which never wavered and the Christian artillery kept replied the Mandelini fire and assaults increasing and now all the shells fell on the Christian trenches and already the parapets were being shot away. It was like being in the midst of a hail of rain fire the noise being more deafening than before, the air being shaken and thousands of gas generators of earth flew in every direction, and yet now no one wavered though from the terrible onslaughts going on the whole Christian line was almost untenable.

Despite the volleys of the Christian artillery the Mandelini increased the number of their explosive shells and soon the howitzers joined in. The Angellians decided had to use all their courage to stay the Mandelini assault itself despite their gang-gang-gang shells which came snorting from every side and burst with a formidable noise covering the Angellians with smoke and earth. There was already the destruction of one quarter of Manson's whole command since the battle began and the Angellian troops were showing that they would rather die than retreat and the Angellians knowing that the reserves were close at hand waited confidently to throw them against the continual Mandelini assault.

The Angellian machine guns continued continually moved forward the Mandelini columns and an uninterrupted rifle and other cannons fire continually shook the earth forming columns of smoke and flame the Mandelini still assaulting like an insupportable wave of the sea the hundreds of thousands upon hundreds of thousands of the Mandelini were falling over each other, but as the foremost men disappeared more monstrous multitudes appeared to take their places.

The attacking waves reached the trenches many times during the long and bloody assault terrible hand to hand fighting continuing throughout the whole battle and many times during the unadmonished pause-moments of every run of men and horses it was impossible to distinguish friend or foe. The Angellians were now a slowly falling back disputing every foot of ground against overwhelming odds. Meanwhile the reserves began to advance and a barrier of fire of gang-gang-shells which left heavy bluish smoke. The region of hell had to be passed at any price and the men plunged through the smoke clouds only to meet a new barrier of fire only a few yards beyond.

The day was almost over though nearly one quarter of the advanced force dropped and the survivors face to face with the line of battle seemed to be anguished in a furnace of fire. The Angellians who were attacked were still retiring pursued by the yet fiercer assaults. Then before the yelling Mandelini knew what happened the Angellian reserves were upon them.

ANDREW NEW YORK IN THE DEER HILL BATTLE BATTLE, GREAT THE BATTLE THAN EVER AND THE BATTLE AT THE BATTLE, FIGHTING AND FIGHTING BATTLE.

The Mandelini tried for a moment to resist, they tried to hold their ground defending every ditch and stump but soon their line wavered and their units fled. Then all began to retire while at the same time the Angellian sent a firing line behind the Mandelini troops still attacking to prevent the savor of their reserves and succeeded admirably. Shells every second fell by hundreds on the enemy's assaulting lines and every where great clouds of dirt, chests abdomens, intestines, heads, legs and arms flew in the air. The Angellians were now advancing elbow to elbow under a hurricane of shells of every caliber and gang-gang-gang's and rifle and machine gun fire axes did anything that was to be expected. The Angellians now began to drive their assailants back by their counter charge but it was soon seen that it was impossible to maintain this advance because of a curtain of fire maintained by the Mandelini artillery as well as violent rifle fire. They held for firmly the points between the two and toward twelve o'clock the Mandelini line slowly abandoned the rest of the trenches they had captured but now their whole line stormed with a general fire that was exceedingly terrible and killed everything in smoke. In one of the captured trenches an unusual scene was exposed and if it was of a dead Mandelini.

He was standing stiffly upright with a dreadful smile on his face as the advancing Angellian soldiers passed by him and he lastly waving aside and running on after giving the dead man a single look. He had a bullet hole in his head which was not visible until the advancing Angellians were quite close to him. During the momentary great forces of Mandelini in a general advance came to reinforce. Another woman smiling his already badly killed arm as if that they were as good as new. Federal also received reinforcements under Tamarline and Lybourne and the Mandelini hosts was again threatening to be successful their forces now pressing upon the Christians in great waves. Robert Vivianus also came up with reinforcements but the Mandelini forces seemed to be outnumbering the Christians a good deal now. General Vivianus' left wing extended along the Angellian River region his center across a goodly part of the McWhirther run and his right across the McWhirther run. It was evidently the battle of McWhirther run was the fiercest fiercest conflict ever seen for over six days in duration and the losses on both sides had been immensely swollen by the greatest and most an hour of battle.

Manson had managed to push across the McWhirther Run and reestablished his lines on general Vivianus left confronting Federal and Tamarline who were now was storming in his furious assault and the general front which showed such great valor at Crowley Run now moved up with his forces toward Aronburg heights. General Vivianus' reinforcements reinforced general Vivianus' center and established lines of artillery along the edge of Gretchels plains facing the main line of Shue's main army and threatening to cut it to pieces. The scenes of carnage now became extensive and resembled hell with shells whirling down. The enemy was now assaulting the Christian line with almost preternatural fury and though suffering heavy loss still forced a part of the Christian lines on the main center and rolled up toward Aronburg right wing and forcing the whole line with terrible slaughter. The whole center was attacked with such a stubborn fury the left grand division of the assault was being reduced to nothing. For an hour more the center held against the terrific onslaught and forced the withdrawal of the enemy but at another terrific loss in general's lines, Tamarline, Stanton, McWhirther and McWhirther were killed while in general's lines, James Federal, Sherman Hanson, Edward Manson, and Fallon were severely wounded. In the meantime in a sea of smoke and fire Manson had pushed across McWhirther Run, and Federal's point the ground of. If only they were... The enemy were rushing on with their back spread, while the other monstrous column was just arriving from the opposite direction to repel them. General Vivian looking his senses arrange forward toward the house and would have plunged in among the frenzied enemy but a dozen hands seized him.

"For the love of Mike general are you crazy!" Shouted one of his officers.

"You can't get there now sir!" Shouted Henrique dashing up.

"The Vivian girls, the Vivian girls," General Vivian is shrieking. "They are in there in that burning house!"

Sorrowful victims the men held him while the Angellians ran fought the landellians in frenzy and never before was there such a tumult of bayonets, men flaring stabbing each other shooting each other madly at point blank and making a terrible noise during the pandemonium of hand to hand fighting.

"The soldiers are the only ones who are able to do something," said Henrique. "See they are already unloading the line of artillery I brought up!"

"One hundred thousand dollars to the man who takes them out," he screamed. The surges of purple coats were bent back time and again by furious onslaughts flying sparks and gushes of smoke, but not with fewer despair the Angellians again and again with a might and main but fell in scores of thousands while flames now rushed from every window. The Angellians were doing what they could but it seemed as if the children were doomed. Death seemed to wait for anyone foolish enough to rush the enemy. Again general Vivian sank to his knees. In the women it he realized the limitation of human power only something more than human, some time divine could help them now. Then now the christianian column had been torn to fragments in their repeated bloody onrushes to save the children and they were being worsted despite the thundering roar of one hundred guns along this point.

"Oh God," he cried. "If Thou wilt; Help me. Thou who Art a merciful God I ask Thee in the Name of Jesus Crucified to bring them safely out of danger."

He covered his eyes with his hands a creature appealing with all the strength of his nature to the Divinity. It was a supreme moment and in the moment there was a stunning ear-splitting crash of musketry to the right followed by a deafening appalling roar all along the line then there came a more cheer louder about which men went up from the Angellians for the enemy had fallen back heavy reinforcements having decided upon their flank the Angellians driving them farther back amid the rush of flames and smoke. Then came another cry which forced him to his feet a yell which echoed and resounded was taken up again and again in a frenzy of joy for rolling staggering black covered out of the doorway falling smoke black as night stumbled the six little girls into the hands of the soldiers who rushed forward to receive them. They had been rescued in a timely moment for now the enemy had rallied and was now renewing the onslaught with redoubled fury.

Timeliness advance was discovered by Wrede who seeing the battle numbers of the enemy hastily prepared to fall back but unfortunately was not quick enough and was forced to stand against a herculean attack. He stood his ground against terrible odds then his right was overwhelmed crushed and broken from the side the enemy capturing in many hundreds of thousands of prisoners within a few minutes.

Wrede seeing that he was worsted by the black battle devils he called them and knowing his danger sent an appeal for aid but none could come in time to ward off a serious disaster and Wrede's whole line was torn to shreds and forced to retire from the field a badly beaten army and their commander mortally wounded.

This was general Wrede and general Wrede himself was badly wounded and his aide general Hennington killed. Federal main attack in the main maritime on Hanson's line was on ingreater fury, though at some points Hanson had managed to make a counter advance and this enraged Federal who was bound to win at all costs continued met Hanson's advance with terrific fury.

Hanson's battle line had narrowed down to fifty miles and the fury of the firing now became so extremely fierce and deadly that Federal became alarmed as to the safety of his armies. He had ordered all his available artillery upon the Angellians which in due time had checked their advance, irresistible advance but did not hurt them back and counter charges made by the landellians met with horrible destruction. Hanson's right in danger from the enemy's fire which made an appearance like a raging forest fire from their terrible discharge of musketry and cannon had made a withdrawal and Federal from his observation stations saw this and taking advantage there heavy forces upon the left-hand right wing. The result was an unmitigated only with the slaughter of two quarters of the enemy's battalions. Federal was not discouraged and as the conflict became extremely fierce on these still more heavier forces and now the right wing had to withdraw before overwhelming numbers of the Angellians. General Hanson's center stood its ground under a terrible extensive volume of flame and din resounding the assaults time and again but they could not hold against the yelling demons and withdrew the enemy following and causing heavy losses. However to force the main sections of the line seemed just as impossible as before though general Hanson was now several wounded.

Along general Vivian's main center the struggle was just as terrific.

Henrique advanced his main forces to check Shoenman and in their murderous carnage on the McWhirther plains he fell riddled by bullets but nevertheless was only several wounded. Hanson's McWhirther succeeded him and was shot to death, and general Evans who took command of the already badly and torn and mangled division was mortally wounded. Shoenman's army led by Centackrascoop crossed the lines though their line was honey combed by shot and shell and drove the Angellians of Henrique's force back pell-mell. General Lawson's divisions coming to the rescue fell into an ambuscade and fought the slaughter. General Vivian's main center held its ground and soon recaptured the region of the turned headquarters where the slaughter of both sides was extremely ghastly to behold. A frightful cannonading of a hundred thousand guns was opened along the extreme line which fairly shook the earth while the Angellians under Ambrose Fuller redoubled the fury of their attack just as Centackrascoop fell mortally wounded in the midst of a scorching withering storm of fire. Centackrascoop's divisions already shattered by the extreme fire broke into confusion and if it had not been for the arrival of a part of Ambrose Fuller's troops they would have retreated in remarkable confusion.

Shells were hurling by hundred hundreds per minute everywhere but Ambrose Fuller rallied them and then he with them and his own force crashed upon the Angellians. The attack of such monstrous force redoubled the fury of the battle. Ambrose's right and center struck like a wedge against the left grand division of Vivian's center and the struggle was now at its highest fury and the fiercest all along the line roared like a trillion cannon and seemed to defy heaven and earth and those in heavy heaven with the very din. Though their lines were becoming terribly thin the Angellians held their own mowing the assailants down in frightful numbers.

The attack in vain.

Time and again whole columns fairly melted away but at last Ambrose Fuller was once more compelled to recede an after forming his own sea of blood and dead and wounded.

The other so grand divisions could not be forced either or along this point he christianian position gained by winds of battle was unassailable. Ambrose however was bound to carry this point at all cost and launched several assaults with the aid of a curtain of artillery fire but it served of no use as the christianian assailants were mowed down by many multitudes with the loss of many leaders.

Amio Ambrose tried to blast the battle with his heavy guns of howitzers but received such a spanonadic reply that again he was baffled and the general having twenty five horses shot under him launched a general assault in two direction which he lead himself. This movement was terrific and overlapped as they were on two sides of the line the Angellians even then failed to give way and Fuller believed from the fury of the resistance that he was really entering the very hell itself instead of clashing against the christianian line and losing two other horses and somewhat seriously wounded himself he had to abandon the assault for the moment.

General Hanson's divisions had been ordered to advance against the enemy south of Amio Aronburg but learned that the Angellians to prevent the successful advance of the christianian had fairly placed a sea of musketry and cannon fire in front of themselves the battle fairly setting fire to the stretch of woods and the destroy ing legion of battle's domination in the shape of a wide sea of smoke was driving forward and indeed the battle along the entire line seemed at its highest fire.

Fury and such heavy losses were inflicted that the christianian did not know when to withdraw or recede. But general Gule had orders to advance under any circumstances no order upon unhindered by the serious opposition the christianian of the christianian line the red battle hor or and slaughter typified by blind force.

He swept forward. Indeed Gunn felt helpless before the power of the Angalindian fire. His force was and even though the forest fire, he did not want to let the fire win. The wind of the approaching typhoon, or black the Angalindian fire itself.

Many of the brave Christian generals who fought the Angalindian fire, were killed. The fire was so hot and so fast that it was impossible to fight it. The fire was so hot and so fast that it was impossible to fight it. The fire was so hot and so fast that it was impossible to fight it.

clatter of musket balls used in cleaning out guns and filling of chain traces they started forward into the jaws of death.

Hundreds of thousands of the Angalindians pressed forward and thousands around their leader to learn the plan of the great onslaught. The fire was so hot and so fast that it was impossible to fight it. The fire was so hot and so fast that it was impossible to fight it. The fire was so hot and so fast that it was impossible to fight it.

"The Angalindians did it before. They carried our left and set our wounded stretched on fire with their battle frenzy and we must land on an and drive them back under any circumstances. It's our orders."

"The Angalindians did it. They fired the woods to keep us back." Bitterness of the Angalindians against their foes and the destroyers they piloted into the green wilderness by their furious gun fire was fired anew by the spreading of the report. Gun picked the leaders just as the unlighted guns broke out in a ear-splitting crash and sent them in commands of divisions. The road ways offered the best point of attack and working on each side of the base the fighters could cut the enemy's main center and then attempt to turn it back on both flanks. Thirty miles wide was the straggling scene of carnage at this point and the road beatled it almost at the middle. Gunn's orders to advance in double line sent the army in motion down the grade just as the enemy drum-drum fire broke out anew. First went the brigades, then the infantry drag one and the rest supported by their own artillery heavier and heavier drawing the line of fire thicker and thicker grew the smoke. A roaring as of water in steep rapids assumed a deeper tone minute by minute and then a hand in the road brought a part of the advancing enemy in sight. The fire itself had started in a forest of conifers and the sparks from rubbing branches had lodged the blaze high up amid the inflammable tops of the trees as well as the brush smaller vines and between the feet of the plants. They were burning in a man or as if some one had set millions of Christmas trees in a hundred rows without cotton batting and strings of popcorn, substitute dry pine needles for all the space, between with here and there a long thicket of grassy scrub brush and then fired it. Fighting against the enemy in this was indeed very critical.

Stiff line blast of cannon fire, the myriads of bursting shells, and the high tongue of flame shooting up from the flaming ground while skeletons of flaming transverse as a slow torus torch had completed the diameter of the low sweeping fire by lifting the red tar or to the to the waiting tinder two hundred feet above.

Once the fire had gone up where it catches the full sweep of the wind it travels leagues to the miles of the one below.

Gunn threw out all his lines of offense to the right and left as soon as possible a quarter of a mile back from the firing line. While the main line crowded with the enemy thousands of other men with a shovel pick and axe took and ice held themselves to the task of throwing the fire back so as to make it advance on the enemy and set themselves to cutting a wide path through the undergrowth and across the advances of the flames. Here the hunters would wait with the wet shovels to attack the fire enemy when his head should be brought in by the hastily cleared timber wait in rolling smoke and flame to turn back the red tide against the oncoming enemy columns by trail a light scouting party managed to cut across the advance of the blaze to its distant right flank, there to select a stand the wide expanse of green brush with no mattress of pine needles for the fire to run on could balk the forward sweep of the flames; from the turn a line to back fire could turn the right flank and snuff out all that end of advancing destruction and make it go at the enemy as the fire was their only chance of winning and the fire they trusted to win for them at this point.

Literally ten thousand thousand men were fighting thirty miles of fire. So heavy was the fur of smoke of lob the brilliant conflagration that the afternoon sun was entirely obscured while so hot was the furnace like blast from the near fire that men's faces and bare arms were baked red. Hundreds of the men worked like mad fighting for seconds. A score of axe blades bit and were not at tough too roots and the thick tufts of young spruce. Hoes and shovels were frantically at the pine needles mattingly at it and separating it to a dead line across which the conflagration should not advance. Smoke filled the workers' lungs and they gasped under the drive of supreme effort. Sacks were soaked in barrels through up and men plunged their heads down to their shoulders into the scolding depths. Gunn leading the firing line itself against the desperate Angalindian assaults rode back and forth along the line every time he worked among the fire fighters encouraging pausing to take a shoveler every time he worked among the fire fighters himself and with five minutes feverish work demonstrating where its greatest use lay.

The fire came up to the wounded toilers had scratched through the woods, men fought desperately with it at arms length, blackened dervises, they who failed their arms untiringly, whirling and prancing between the sword stabs of red tongues of flame. Wet sacks caught glowing coals and flung them on bare backs, white tenders came and went like ammunition passers in a trench under machine gun spray. Far head throats buried corpses at the darting arrows of flame which leaped the dead line and fastened too cried up spruce fashers beyond.

The fire came up to the dead through the woods, wavered jumped it in a dozen places and went roaring on.

"Get your back down, everybody this way. This fire has jumped the ditch."

"It has crossed." "Water quick I'm all a flame." Some one cried. Men sobbed in weakness and impotent anger but moved back under the direction of their leaders and began to throw stones against the fire enemy while the redoubled roar of musketry and cannon told that the Angalindians were still pressing forward.

"We will catch the fire right at this corner." Said one leader to a group of sneezing volunteers; "And it can't do a thing." Another was heard to say.

"When it comes up rush it low along this line and don't raise too many sparks with your backs."

The soldiers over to the burn had back fired it to a whisper: "Yelled Gunn: 'Come on now men we will smash the fire the other way and drive it forward toward our assaults. They made the fire and they are to keep it for their own use if they want it badly and." And he laughed. The general battles and blackened to a leader rallied the beaten volunteers and set them on a new line which held on until driven back by the fierce heat and the charring gratoasts while broke a part of the Christian line. Violet and her sisters in the meantime standing in Panosia's headquarters was interrupted by a telegraph which started madly. Then a telegraph telephone bell rang and as Violet clapped the receiver to her ear there came from far off a thin voice shaken by hysteria of great excitement.

"Is this general Panosia?"

"No this is one of the Vivian girls." Answered Violet.

"At right little Vivian girls this is general Butler Aronburg. Enemy can't progress any longer against his lines for the whole line is falling back before general advance of Christian reinforcements. And there are four general forest fires moving your way from the rear."

Violet her hand and voice unsteady shot a quiver sharp and incisive. "Over the main stretch of wood woods south of Mc south of Mc-Holleston Bug Run and the enemy retreating lines are about a mile apart and are moving forward toward the north about the same time and are hard pressed by the Christians. The conflagration itself it a great great one but it is not threatening our lines any. I saw fierce attacks and have been riding as fast as God would let me to the nearest available station. Yes little girl strong lines of Christian but is fierce carrying the main line of victory toward our armies are now moving westward toward the left." "Tell general Panosia right away."

Violet gave instructions and then rang off and notified Panosia for several minutes the great general waited his eyes straining through the near orders to catch the Glandelinian fire, but was pointing the sky southward. It was the sound of the cannon of the Glandelinian line, continued battle in a dazzling red glow. The operator of the mountain exchange and put in a call for all the general officers to start a hasty advance of their firing line. An hour passed and the great general stood by the telephone sending throughout all the Glandelinian lines of the battle region his orders for a general advance against the enemy's lines. Every general heard it amid the roar of battle with joy and excitement. They general remounted their horses to catch the summons out of the dark. They came over all the barriers of the high places and after then the destroying legions of battle and flames sped the orders.

At this moment there was a general from many generals for out from a creeping arch of fire and musketry discharges along the Christian lines in the right section leaped and wavered many little flags of Christians and Glandelinian alike, their clothing smoked amid the terrific carnage and hand and soon appeared fresh lines of guns with men sitting on the carriage the point of the cannons standing out in smart blisters and these guns stopped with noisy explosions. General Aronburg, Aronburg and fifteen other generals had smelt their way through a part of the fire with a fresh battery of artillery and the nearest smoke of musketry fire surrounded at its midlewrithed and twisted at each end and the whirling smoke canopy dimmed the stars while everything seemed dyed red.

More! More! More! Now and now had now put their extreme armies in at this point against the concentrated attack of the enemy and despite of the inevitable accidents of account of the conflagrations the Angelinian front held its own and now with his sixteen million Abdeandians made an attempt to turn Vanley's right and during a conflagration of firing of cannons and musketry he succeeded in crushing two great divisions of Glandelinians at once and their splendid initiative was followed by Vanley's right wing being completely turned and it was forced to retreat across the Mc-Hollister Run pursued by the full blast of the conflagration of Christian musketry. General Liviania himself ordered a simultaneous advance and though the Glandelinians placed hundreds of thousands of men with the highest guns to try and check the flood of Angelinians it was of no use. The Angelinians pressing onward and backed by the conflagration and that which proved a friend instead of an enemy had secured a good grip on the wooded regions once held by the enemy that is the wooded regions of Mc-Hollister Run and the main stretch of the Aronburg and Kauffmann woodlands which a conflagration of Christian musketry fire was steadily advancing against a similar Glandelinian fire.

The enemy knew that should the Angelinians ever get a further grip of grasp of this region it would be to the complete destruction of one of their main wings and as they knew that the conflagration of Christian musketry was advancing at a terrific rate they strove to hold them back but scores of their generals fell in the mud maddened maddened carnage and from their slaughter the Glandelinians were appalled and disheartened and wished for a respite in the horrible struggle. The main fight against the Glandelinians was on the Mc-Hollister Run and Aronburg creek tanks and for a time some more success was made by the enemy on the Mc-Hollister Run as the Christians failed to advance in the face of a annihilating fire but it seemed that nothing human could stop the Christian advance now which was still making an inferno of slaughter.

During the height of the terrible slaughter general while general Liviania's army was pressing forward in the furnace of battle fire and horror the Vivian girls following them in their excitement of wish to see the victory and how it progressed were in constant minute danger of a horrible death and though the commanders had advised them to go back from the firing line they had refused saying that they will take care of themselves. During the advance they had a narrow escape from their lives captured by a gang-gang-shall thrown by some great Glandelinian krump run from the main Glandelinian batteries, and even by the soldiers many times it was seen that many a Glandelinian sharpshooter had pointed his gun at the little girls in nearly every region among the trees along the front but failed to find the mark, and even Glandelinians had been seen skulking around like human vultures waiting for a feast of blood.

It had already been learned also that the little girls would gladly relinquish all the honors and glories of their positions if it were possible for them to be back in their own quiet country out of the region of such terrible war. At every sound of the explosion of exploding explosions they would start in fear and excitement and here in that time fail to express a cry of terror when ever they would see the gray column of smoke press forward and against the advancing Christians for they knew that the battle was now seemed yet lost for along the main right in winning far off the enemy had carried all before them even now and that along here only was there success.

Everything seemed to terrify them of over the threatening fate of the Christian line should the enemy reform to counter charge for nowhere did they themselves seem to be safe now. The little girls during the advance had been guarded continually by hundreds of soldiers but they believed and others too that Glandelinians were possessed of such devilish ingenuity and desperate courage that all precautions against them should they succeed in counter charging again would be in vain.

General Liviania many times had believed himself that he himself was more likely to be blown to pieces than to die in his bed and to confirm his statement during the final advance a gang-gang-shall treacherously made in the shape of a little girl was hurled at him barely missing him and exploding among his body wounding twenty horses and five hundred men and a wounding one thousand eight hundred and eighty others while the dress of the little girl was heavily splashed with blood and mangled pieces pieces pieces of flesh from the victims of the high explosive which poured a hole in the ground five hundred yards wide and three hundred feet deep.

However at ten thirty that night the sound of battle had suddenly ceased and such a silence followed that the survivors of the great battle felt as if they were to fly into space and go to pieces.

Christian losses in the battle were two million in killed and wounded while the losses of the enemy exceeded seven million nine hundred thousand and in killed and wounded. The terrible battle had raged seven days and luckily it was that it had come out as a great Christian victory.

THE BURNING OF ANGELO (ARAGAT PA (SALVERINIA))

Three days had passed since the battle of Mc-Hollister Run and despite their most energetic exertions the whole woods of Aronburg Run reached by the other main forest fires already predicted had already become a parching sea of flames and smoke and hundreds, even thousands of soldiers gave up their lines in trying to stay the red path of destruction. General Liviania's whole army though victorious in the battle of Mc-Hollister Run was now retreating before the great conflagration, his flanks being seriously harassed by the forest fires. The conflagration had set a firm foothold on the entire stretch of woods of the Mc-Hollister Run and even a part of the Aronburg Run regions and driven forward by a stiff easterly wind was increasing with the roar of artillery burning all before it.

Notwithstanding the fact that the stretch of Aronburg had been struck last, it was the first of have been entirely crossed though legions of men fought desperately against its surging waves of flame, until they dropped by hundreds. It was hotter and more dangerous work to stand against this ocean of fire than it was to meet the fiercest onslaught of Federal men. The heat could be felt at its worse at the distance of three miles and the sky seemed to be filled with flames from Aronburg Run. The conflagration advanced as fast as the wind could force it ahead the tree tops flaring like a sea of huge torches torched made by some titan king. General Aronburg had directed the work against the flames on Aronburg Run his men having tried every means imaginable to check its progress, had mined the trees to earth by the thousand, made wide ditches, fought the flames with wide buckets, and harnessed it, but were not successful, and one thousand two hundred and twenty two men had perished from being trapped, or had dropped dead from the fierce heat, which literally roasted them at even the distance of many yards.

The conflagration untopped by any one progressed forward for a great space and burned its way through the small Galverinian town of Angelina gathias, and fortunately it happened right at the proper moment that a heavy rainstorm approaching from the west, burst over the land, and had it not been for this, the whole region would have been wiped out...

CHAPTER FOURTEEN.

A JOURNEY TO THE CHRISTIAN LINE.....

THE CLOUDS GATHER, THE DEAD FLY OUT BUT STAY.....

"I don't know what to say my dear-est because of the situation!"

"Why surely indeed Henry, you are not thinking for a moment of letting him go when the war is getting so bad?"

"Well I don't know what to say, but at times I am certainly thinking of it though I have not yet at all made up my mind. There are advantages and disadvantages at such times but he'd be safer as a boy scout in the Christian army than always at home. We'll have to move from this town as it is warned of the approach of General Tamerlines Glandelinian army. Of course we're foreigners but if we're Christians then the Glandelinians don't respect any one."

"But Hubby it is such a long way to general Viviania where's Christian army and to go among those boy and girl scouts and live and serve among them it would be hard for our youngest son as their discipline because they're all so very perfectly good may be a too severe for him. And yet it is said that they too at times do such dreadful things to the Glandelinians, but of course if he could be accepted into their ranks he would be all right, and as I have heard you say foreigners getting in there is so much red tape, and they pass all sorts of military laws, and too hold their little queens as some of the most greatest little nannies in the world. If you can get him there it would be good but the danger of meeting so many Glandelinian scout patrols on the way."

"Well those Glandelinian devils won't eat him my dear. And too his would be well trained and what is good news the Military Assembly usually conducted by the Princesses, or the Abbessian National Assembly or what ever it ought to be called has certainly been passing laws increasing the protection of the Vivian Girl Princesses and all their child scout followers, and increasing many of the rights and privileges of them all, and you must remember that if it had not been for all those Christian boy and girl scouts the condition of the vast body of the Christian nation of Abbessia would have been terrible. Every Christian army has about a million child scouts and even they turn in rescued child slaves into scouts too as an addition. The Abbessian cause is a very holy one their foes is very wicked and indeed now in the light of slavery ever known throughout the world were ever such masses of children more enslaved than child slavery by the Glandelinians. And the Christians will their freedom and if possible the conversion of Glandelinia, or her destruction if she won't amend. We have need be surprised therefore if against such wicked Glandelinians even child scouts will push matters to an excess, they have a right to. And with their aid the Christian nation will be able to maintain itself, and the child scout divisions can have a sort of constitutional government of their own in their armies. This is all the more reason why our son James should be going out there. You don't suppose that the child scouts will reject him because he is a foreigner if he can prove he is good. Why he told me there are foreigners in the ranks. No James will be safe among them as a boy scout much more safer than he will be here. As to the distance it's nothing like so far as if he went to the Angelina Agathia city for example. I don't see any chance of the enemy setting the whole country on fire here and yet it is dangerous for us to remain. This is a war that is having the eyes of the world watching everything in grave anxiety and fright. Glandelinia is dangerous. His school reports is always the same conduct fearful, progress in study unusually rapid--which means as I take it that he is going rapidly along. That's it isn't it James?"

"Yes father I think so. You see every body cannot be at the top of the form."

"That is very true observation boy. It is also if there are a hundred boys in the class, a great number of fathers have to be disappointed. Still of course one would like to be the father who is not disappointed and it seems fortunately I am one of them."

"I stick head to my work" the boy said "but there are lots of other boys too like me who seem to know the right words with out taking any trouble about it. It comes to them in Abbessia I suppose and to me it seems catching. Boy and girls in school here in Abbessia are so good, was astonished for finding it was a school. Boys never tease girls and hold them as very scared. When I first came to school and didn't know any better I did not to tease girls, but they're so forgiving, so kind and charitable that I could do it here."

"I have heard a lot of them," said James excitedly. "Oh please accept the offer, I should like it of all things, and even if I do ever get into trouble with the Glandelinian soldier-y I can any how be a good little hero when I get back."

are planning to join him with the Dantonina next. But public opinion in all Calve d'nia is much disturbed over the situation. In the National Assembly at Angelina Aethia, which is the same as our American Senate there is a great spirit of apprehension over the recent fierce Landelina resistance to the various christian a r i armies and because of Christian defendants and some thing like a big disaster to the Christ ian side had already been accomplished, and the civilian a r l s are again in peril even within their own lines, and every road road two that christian

"I don't see it could make any differences." James repeated "and you see sir when I go into the boy scout troop I'm joining the army and there is war and I know and the father would be a great deal more anxious."

to them and help them to seize the enemy move. "You have stated a good idea my boy, and through that plan it would not make much difference, and as you are a good shot, and know how to fence and have back riding, the chances is no more that it need no influence our decision. But be careful and not impudent my boy. The Glendallians are a danger to you and you got to keep your eyes open. Well then James I am to consider that your decision is in favor of accepting this appointment."

And so Miss Andrews was informed by her husband that after talking it over with James he had finally concluded that the proposed arrangement would really be an excellent one and that it would be a great pity to let such an opportunity slip. The good lady was for a time tearful in her feelings that James would be in danger as he had read so much about the preternatural fury of Lancelotian soldiery, of which in three days it was a case of and national opinion that Lancelotian soldiery was winning the war every where, but she was not in the habit of disputing her husband's will, and when the letter of acceptance had been sent off by military secretary wires less she busied herself in preparing James' clothes for his long absence.

"With the prince?" she asked in great astonishment.

"Yes indeed, don't you remember seeing that letter Mablelena. Most foreigners are not much loved in Abbeinnish because many foreigners have shown bad reputations, but they do like Ameri Americans and therefore has no reason to be ashamed of his Nationality, and he will draw the loving and friendly attention of every one if he really behaves as well there as he did in school. He doesn't know his high position and I don't want him to know until he gets to there and receives the surprise. That Prince's good little sisters are in sorry need of a AIDS de camp special and he'll fit the position beautifully. He'll be a little scared of those angel possessed little girls at first because of their celestial like appearance but he'll get used to that."

"You will see much that is holy among the boys and girl scouts that is beyond your imagination, and perhaps a good deal too that will win you their ways, and as to them James my son, and it will be better for you to copy their ways, Abba's man I know you never criticize or give a hostile opinion about things Abba's man say, and that in fact you pine because all American is not that way I can rest easy, Take things as they come, and do as all the Abba's man boys and girls do, you see there is no difference in comparison between boys and girls."

and don't worry as to the religious and Abissinian customs except that they are more holy and beautiful than any saint's ever heard of, fall in with the ways of those around you, and adopt if you can the annually polite and courteous manner which is general among the Abissinians, and in which I ~~met~~ ^{met} any they are far ahead of any polite nation known. If you at all questioned you will of course give your opinion

Frankly and modestly it is the independence of thought among American boys and men which has so much attracted the attention and approval of the Vivian Glandelinians and their themselves. As a natural and as simply as the Abbissian boy and girl accoutrements, giving you self no airs, and you'll never see none on the parts of the lads and girls you are with, the other brother Penrod says you'll be treated as their equal, put upon the other hand do not even be on the look out for small slights for you'll never experience any, and you'll never hear any idle talk to any thing for when either I need not tell you to be always straight forward, honest and true to those qualities you possess as much as an Abbissian does as you've caught their strange good news from them. Above all things you'll never need to use your fists at any body, even though fighting comes naturally to even Abbissian boys, but if you're good and on their side they won't even have as much as a cross word, but above all things do not restrain any tendency to use your fists against any foreign boys who may be crazy enough to try and start something, and do not say even the slightest bad word—it is considered as brutal and degrading as a big one—dressing of the boy and girl scout troop is a deadly insult to God and their Nation and would never be forgiven. And what ever the trouble with the enemy you do not back out, abstain from sparing any Glandelinian soldier as boy and girl scouts do not give them any quarter under every justified reasons. Should you find that in any way your position is made intolerable by the Glandelinians, you will of course appeal to the Prince, or his beautifully good sisters, and you will obtain all the redress that can be made possible. I trust there will be no reason for complaints at all and that you will find your position an exceedingly pleasant one as soon as you become accustomed to it, but should occasion arise bear my words in mind."

Jim James promised to follow his father's advice implicitly but in his own mind he wondered what he would do if he encountered Glandelinian soldiery, however if he was going to be a boy scout even if not in uniform while on the way he supposed that he should under the circumstances do the same as boy scouts what ever that might be and he examined his rifle and his pistols carefully. As soon as the train was fairly past the city and out of it he continued his thoughts, until seven hours later the train entered the station of Turner Creek Town. Dr Andrews had requested the conductor to allow one of his porters to show James the way to La Polama Hotel. James had pulled himself together a little as the train entered the town, and was starting at the man in Christian uniform, when a man touched him on the shoulder.

"Now my dear brave lad the conductor tells me I am to show you the way to your hotel. God bless you for going to the service of the boy scouts for the noblest cause you ever took part with and I am proud of you my lad, which is your box."

James pointed out his satchel, the man threw it on his shoulder, and James with a feeling of joyful bewilderment followed him down the tracks toward the main station platform. Here he was accosted by an officer who asked him for his past port toward the Christian lines. James fumbled in his breast pocket for the document which his father had obtained for him from the Prince by mail duly vided by violet, and he waited notifying that James Ad Andrews aged nine, hair brown, height a little over four feet, eyes gray, nose short, mouth large, was about to join the Vivianite troop in the service of the Vivian Glandelinians. The officer glanced it over, and then returned it to James with a polite bow, which James managed to return just as perfectly.

"What a handsomely uniformed man that officer was." He muttered to himself as he followed his guide. "I wonder if I'll be attired like that? Well, I suppose I mustn't get high hatted about it if I go even when I get accustomed to it." The hotel, La Polama, was close at hand. In reply to the man's question the land lord said that the boy scout leader was within. The porter put down the satchel, pocketed the coin James made him accept with a "Good luck and God's blessings" young boy scout officer, went outside, turned and politely followed the land lord. The latter mounted a flight of stairs, knocked at a door and opened it.

"A young American boy desires to see you Master Starling." He said and James entered. A taller boy than himself, whose popo-tons at once surprised James to utter astonishment as to the tallness and stoutness of the Abbissian boys, was seated at the table at which he was writing.

"Master Andrews?" he said interrogatively. "I am glad to see you."

James surprised Starling by showing he understood the Abbissian language.

"That's all right," he said nodding. "How do you do, Master Starling?"

The taller boy bowed; James bowed, and then they looked at each other. There was nothing more to say. A smile stole over James' face, and broke into a frank laugh. The Abbissian boy smiled, put his hand on James' shoulder and said:

"A brave foreign boy. I like Americans." and James knew they were friends.

Walter Starling's face bore an expression of sunny good temper and holiness. Though a boy he was a half-inch taller with long curls, he had a soldier's bearing, his complexion was tanned, and though handsome of face he looked a tough military fighter and strong his eye brows were black and bushy. After a pause he said:

"Are you hungry?"

"You mean I'll eat anything?" James asked. "Yes I will if there is any thing fit to eat around here. I left by the Glandelinians if they didn't clean out as the skunk does. I begin to feel as hungry as a hunter and no wonder for I am as hollow as a drum."

Starling took his hat, opened the door, and bowed for James to precede him. Jim James at first hesitated he didn't like to impose on a boy scout leader when he had money to buy food himself but knowing it would be a polite way to do as he was told, returned the bow and went out. The boy scout leader put his hand on his shoulder and they went down stairs together and took their seats on in the salon, where his companion gave an order and in two or three minutes a bowl of chicken broth was placed before each of them. It fully answered James' idea as to the same mess of old fashioned good flavoured American chicken soup with pieces of chicken meat in it. But he was astonished at the piece of bread nearly a yard long placed on the table. Starling cut a piece off and handed it to him. He broke a portion of it and then started to eat and when he tasted even that good looking chicken soup he found it was even much nicer and better tasting than it looked.

"It is certainly much better than I thought it was." He thought to himself. "Anyhow despite the war bread seems plentiful and though it is the size unusual it is the same make of yeast bread we have over in the United States but nicer and richer. So there is no fear of my starving. He followed his friend's example and made his way steadily through a number of dishes not at all new or strange to him.

"This is the best slice of roast beef I've ever eaten, and it surely is worth the price of it, some of the dishes seem better than others."

Walter Starling offered him a small goblet of wine, which he tasted but shook his head for he did not like sour wine, but Starling told him the wine could do him good for the journey, and if it was too sour to pour some sugar into it and sweeten it. James did so and found it tasted better. Conversation soon began and James soon learned the Abbissian for knife, fork, spoon plate and various other articles which though he could speak much Abbissian he still was ignorant of, and felt that he was fairly well on the way toward talking Abbissian better than ever. After the meal was over Walter and James rose and both said the grace after meals, and then Walter put on his cap, and signed James to accompany him. (not here) They strolled through the small town, went down to the river quays, and looked at the many different boats, James was feeling more at home now, and asked the Abbissian name for every thing he saw, repeating the word over and over again to himself until he felt sure that he should remember it and then asking the name of some fresh object. The next morning when they started on their journey back for the confines of the main Christian lines, and arrived there at night after thirty six hours of travel. James was struck with the roads, which were far better tended and much more cleaner and kept than even the best of roads in America. Trees were peculiar in many instances and the leaves of many smaller trees when observed at a distance gave the trees the same of mish-rooms and for sets of pine trees the appearance of gigantic palms. At this part the extreme flatness of the country did not surprise him for he had seen many such in America, and build ings in the villages were of the same form but had high slanting beautifully colored roofs, and the variety of the church towers were excellent and imposing, and he saw much more to admire during the journey than he even could have expected.

"If it's all like this," he thought to himself. "I don't see how the enemy could be so wretched and devastating. Of the Christian lines he saw little because of the darkness. They were able to enter easily because Starling showed the passport to the picket and then the sentry. A blue bloused soldier carried his satchel what seemed to James a long distance from the place where the conveyance stopped. The broad company of streets were quiet and deserted, and enormous tall colored tents with sides yellow and the tops looking black at night stood on each side of the company street in a straight row and to James surprise were as high and big as Circus Tents. Only they did not have that shape.

"Here we are at last!" His guide said as he halted before a large and massive gate way surrounded by a coat of arms with supporters carved in stone work. Beyond was a big wooden house. He rang at the bell, which was opened by a aide de camp in livery uniform, who bowed profoundly upon seeing Starling and then followed with a military salute. Passing through the doorway James found himself in a spacious hall decorated with armor and beautifully made religious pictures. As he crossed the threshold Walter Starling took his hand and shook it heartily saying:

"welcome."

James understood the action; and nodded saying "I think I shall get on capitally if they are all as jolly as you are."

"Then they both laughed and Starling said; "You'll like us all when you know us."

James looked around wondering trying to think what was coming next.

Walter went out after Walter Starling told James to be seated and then to what surprised him was gone for nearly two hours. "I'm very sorry," said Starling politely, as he returned, "To have kept you waiting so long, but this is the head quarters of the princesses and I expected them to be here, but they are all away at their main head quarters with general Jack Evans. We shall stay a day or two to rest our selves here after our journey, and then start to join them."

He led James into a great salon magnificently furnished, pointed to the chairs and looking glasses and other articles of furniture, all swathed up in coverings and the lad understood at once that the Princesses and the brothers were away at the main part of the Christian lines. This was a sort of disappointment to him even though he was getting on capitally with Walter Starling for he desired to meet with the little girls who were said to be angelic, unpossessed and so pretty. A meal was speedily served in a small and comfortably furnished apartment, and James decided that the food even here in a camp was really nice, and that there was no fear of his falling away in flesh.

Walter Starling pressed him to try the wine again, and this he found to be a vast improvement upon the vintage he had tasted in the hotel in the town.

After breakfast the next morning which consisted of pancakes and oat meal and milk as you'll not find coffee in the army here not even for men they started for a walk, and James was delighted with the beauty of the tents for what in the night appeared to be black tops of the tents was really purple, the sides yellow and the upper trimmings red and which he could not but help acknowledging were vastly superior to anything he had ever seen in the American army.

Then he was taken to a quartermaster's store, Prince Penrod having commissioned his guide to carry out Dr. Andrews' request in this matter. Walter looked interestedly at James as he entered the quartermaster's store as if to ask if he understood why he was taken there. James nodded for indeed he was glad to see that no time was to be lost for he was desirous of becoming a boy scout as soon as possible. He had passed quite a number of boy scouts and girl scouts gorgeously uniformed, who all had saluted him and Starling.

"They sure do look as good they they as they are!" James thought as he looked at the boy and girl scouts he met. It would be better when I can mingle in with them especially if one is allowed to fight the enemy. "It was the same with a feeling of satisfaction that he turned into the quartermaster's store. The sergeant came up saluting, he didn't bow, Starling gave some orders and the sergeant produced various sorts of uniforms and other materials for James inspection. The lad shook his head, and turned to his guide, and pointing to the goods asked him to choose the things which were most suitable for him; Starling understood the appeal and ordered four suits of uniforms. Two of these were for ordinary wear, another was James' conclusion for the evening, and the fourth for ceremonial occasions. The coats of lavender color were cut long but very open in front and were fastened scanty to button, the waist coats were long and embroidered, a white and simple handkerchief went around the throat and was tied loosely with long ends edged with yellow lace falling in front, knee breeches with yellow stockings and red shoes with bun buckles completed the uniform custom. James looked on with a smile of admiration and burst into a hearty laugh of enjoyment when the uniforms were fixed upon for the idea of himself dressed out in these seemed to him magnificent in the extreme.

"How they would admire me at home," he thought to himself "if they could see me in one of these uniforms. The girls would give me no peace until they had had satisfied their curiosity. And wouldn't there be an uproar of admiration if I were to turn up in them in the school. Every body would be saluting me in cluding Sister Mary Ann. I'll surely prove I'm worthy of wearing them. I'll show these Glandell Jones some American ways and that is rougher than Angellman or Abbotman."

James was then measured. When this was done he took out his purse, which contained fifty six paces, for his father had thought it probable that the uniforms he would wear would cost more than they would else where outside the army, and he wished him to have a good store of pocket money until he had received the first instalment of his pay. Starling however shook his head and smilingly motioned up to him to put up his purse saying "Your uniforms are free. You only pay for them if you intend to keep them when part of the army."

when his companion took him into another shop (a flop shop) and pointing to his own uniform which indicated that James would wear a quite some linen of this kind to be worn when in full dress uniform. James signified that his friend should order what was necessary, and half a dozen shirts with deep cuffs at the wrist and waist and at the breast were ordered. This brought the shopping to an end. In leaving the store they passed many boy and girl scouts and soldiers too all who nodded and saluted respectfully. They remained three days in this part of the Christian encampments, at the end of which time James clothes were delivered. The following morning an elegant carriage to the surprise of James with the arms of Emperor Vivian emblazoned upon it came up to the gate, and they started. The horses were swift ones, and James who had no idea how far they were going, thought the journey was about to be a very long one. He thought they would leave the Christian lines but not so they went down the company street, and two miles out they changed horses at a post station where a crowd of soldiers had gathered, their own returning from whence they came, and after this had a lay at each station, and traveled at a space or pace which seemed to James to be extraordinary rapid. He wondered exceedingly how extensive was the Christian encampments. They seemed never to have an end. The extensive mass of this camp was proved when they traveled for three days sleeping twice at night in a camp tent provided for them at the stopping places. The third day the appearance of the encampment altogether changed, and the tents were higher, and as they went through the company streets nothing but a crowd of boy and girl scouts were passing up or down the company street many looking at the carriages and saluting to Starling but looking curiously at James and nodding however with evident friendliness at him.

As evening approached Walter Starling pointed to a building standing on a rising ground within the encampment still some miles away and said "That is the main headquarters."

It was dark before the excellent carriage drove up to the headquarters. However the approach had been seen, for an escort of boy and girl scouts appeared with torches and led them toward the broad steps. Walter Starling put his hand encouragingly on James' shoulder and led him up the steps. In order to proceed to the main hall, when a door opened and a very classically dressed boy came forward and Walter Starling stood at attention and saluted.

"Prince Penrod my dear friend," Walter then said with a bow "This is the young gentleman you charged me to bring to you as the aide de camp of your sisters."

"Aide de camp to his sisters," James thought with surprise and couldn't say another word until Prince Penrod said;

"I am glad to see you, and I hope you will make yourself as happy and comfortable here as possible."

James was still too doubtfounded at what he had heard to say anything yet but he felt the tone of kindness and courtesy with which they were spoken.... He could however only bow, for although in the eight days he had spent with Walter Starling he had never heard anything of what he was going to do really when he came to the Christian camps.

"And you Walter Penrod," said "You have made a good safe journey I hope. I thank you much for the trouble you have taken. I like the boys looks; what do you think of him?"

"I like him very much," Walter said. "He is a new type to me, and a very pleasant and pleasant one. I think he will make a good companion and a good aide de camp for your darling sisters..."

Penrod then led the way into a great drawing room room and taking James handed him up to a little girl seated on a couch.

"This is our young English and American friend Joie. Of course he is at large at present but Walter Starling reports well of him and I am ready like his hand face."

The little girl held out her hand, which James instead of bending over and kissing, as she had expected shook heartily. For an instant only a look of intense surprise passed across her very pretty face, then she smiled sweetly and said "Good evening!"

"We are glad to see you. It is very good of you to come so far to us. When you know us well enough you'll be happy with us here. But don't stare at me like that my friend. I'm not an angel."

Just then two other little girls still pretty about your age and nearly the same size came in and stopped as they saw the strange boy.

"These are my younger sisters Daisy and Bertie Vivian, the will I am sure do all in their power to make you comfortable," Penrod said. The last words were spoken confidentially and significantly as if he knew how good they would be to him, and that that they were in a not a mistake about the two girls who had a moment before when coming in looked with great surprise at the new boy then they advanced.

"Shake hands with him sister dear," Penrod said, "It is the custom of his country."

Each little girl in turn held out her hand to James, who as he shook hands with them, took a mental stock of his future girl companions. Their faces were so bewitchingly beautiful, and they had such an angelic expression and manners that he felt entranced and yet shaky as if he was in the presence of persons of great holiness and that he was not worthy.

"Surely they must be celestial children of heaven and not real girls," he thought to himself. "Indeed more like little girl angels than true flesh and blood. Their adventures in the army has however done them a world of good. I bet the littlest one could polish off two like me together with one hand."

"The rest of my sisters," Penrod said, said Violet, Catherine Jennie and little Evan Evangelina."

Four other little girls still more prettier had descended from their seats as Penrod entered with James into another room (the little girls having been busy at some military schooling work, and to James surprise (for to him why should Penrod do such a low rank boy like himself) when he should do it) each little girl made a deep courtesy as her name was mentioned, and James bowed deeply in return. James could see that Jennie was the tallest of the little girls and pretty far beyond his wildest imaginations, and also Angelina was almost her likeness and slightly nearer size too and also Violet but Violet and Jennie were oh so pretty beyond what the boy could ever conceive. Angelina struck him as being about the same age as his own little sister, who was between eight and nine years old. Penrod was about his own age, while Joice came between Jennie and Violet. Most boys would no doubt be very bashful and shy in the presence of these little girls but James was never shy or embarrassed under any conditions you couldn't embarrass him.

But he was astonished about their prettiness for he had never heard of how the Abbeinnian princesses really looked. Their manners were as graceful as they were beautiful but he could see there was nevertheless a tremendous amount of holy dignity about them that too was remarkable.

"Jennie dear," Penrod said to his tallest sister. "Take James out with you and your sisters and go home back riding with him before he gets scared and thinks you're from Heaven instead of earthly creatures. He just stands and stares. Do all in your power to eat him at his ease. Remember what you would feel dearest sisters if you were suddenly placed as he is in a strange heavenly country."

"I believe I would feel as he does now," said Jennie laughing in spite of him in spite of herself. "If he was allowed I believe he would kiss and hug us to his heart's content."

"Why not let him do it?" smiled Penrod. "He must first gain his esteem among all the boys and girl scouts or they would think we were strange to do that." Said Jennie more seriously. "But if he really comes to love us we'll let him." And smiling sweetly at him she motioned to James to accompany her and six of the little girls left the room together while Joice remained with Penrod. Unrestrained now by their presence, Joice turned to her brother with her customary merry smile.

"But it sure is a human bear you have brought to us Penrod dear, a veritable human bear---my fingers ache still---and he is to be our aide de camp. Always believed American boys were strong, but I did not think he would be like that. These Americans are like us."

Penrod smiled. "He is a little strange, but that will soon rub off Joice dear. I like him. Joice, remember it was a difficult position for a boy like him. We did not have him here to give polish to your dear sisters but to be your aide de camp. The Abbeinnians are not polished and neither are the Americans, every one knows that but they are as many and independent as we are. That boy bore himself well in your presence and that of your sisters. He probably had never seen little girls like you before in his life, your appearance was so out of celestial to him but he was not embarrassed or shy as I expected he would be and there is no fearfulness in his handshake than a mere kissing of the hand and it is calm and self possessed even though alone among strange strangers. In case Father would want me again and I am away for a time being he could surely do anything for you in case you are in trouble and remember Joice dear the Glandelinians will be soon finding out that Americans are different than we are in the method of doing things and in fighting and are not to be trifled with. That boy is good, but in a good cause I can see by his eyes he is dangerous. He would make a rough and swell defender for you and your sisters. And I like the honest straight look in his face. And look at the width of the shoulders and the strength of his little arms---why he would break your enemy Gerald Starling across his knee, and he and that Glandelinian boy scout must must be about the same age. He is also a good Catholic went to Holy Communion and Mass every day with Starling's Starling."

"Oh he has brute strength I grant," Joice said. "So have many of our boy scouts too. Of course from the start dear Penrod I do not want to find fault with him, and don't in fact I do like him and if he really wants to hug me all right but only, hope brother dear it will not be necessary to give him my hand again. I thought he crushed my fingers and yet without knowing what he was doing. I must not declare at wailing but my fingers strong as I am are delicate never thickless."

"I do not suppose it will until he learns if he ever does Joice and by that time no doubt doubt, he will know what to do with that as to him hugging you he'll squeeze the breath out of you without meaning to so in case he does warn him not to do it too hard---but there is Walter Starling waiting all this time for you to speak to him."

"Pardon me my good darling friend," Joice said, rising. "In truth that squeeze of my hand has driven all other matters from my mind. How have you fared. This long journey with this American boy must have been safe for you as they say you met with no adventures."

"Indeed Joice," Walter replied. "It has been no hardship, the boy has amused me greatly may more he has pleased me. We have been able to say much to each other though as he knows our language pretty good but his face has been a study. When he is pleased you can see he is pleased, and that is a pleasure indeed and again when he does not like a thing you can see it. When we did encounter at some distance a small patrol of Glandelinians, some of them fired at us and I unsling my rifle and told him to go with his horse behind me to be safe he exploded. "What do you think I am a coward?" and he unsling his own rifle and hit six Glandelinians where, didn't hit one. From the look of him his honest eyes I shall believe without the slightest doubt what he says. That boy would not tell a lie what ever were the consequences. Altogether I like him very much. I think that in a little while he will adapt himself to what goes on around him and that you will have no reason to long to complain of his foreign ways."

"And you really think Walter dear that he will be a brave useful aide de camp and deserve that high commission my sisters and, will give him."

"If you will pardon me for saying so Penrod I am sure that he will---at any rate I am sure he can be trusted to get you and your sisters out of trouble which no one else could do. Americans are dangerous to the enemies of those they come to like. I saw that from experience."

"You are having the same opinion as I have," said Joice. "I too can see it in his eyes and I could even read what he was thinking as we were being introduced to him. He doesn't believe we are and my sisters are really little girls. He believes implicitly that we are little angels taking human form. When Hettie and Daisy shook hands with him he had a strong temptation to hug and kiss them instead but he restrained himself, even though the two little sisters of mine would not have objected if he did. Why didn't he the poor boob. That sure would make things top shape for him at once for that is more a sign of friendship than squeezing one's hand off. He is not at all awkward, though we wouldn't mind if he was for that is natural to a person I like him very well and some day brother Penrod, I'll bet even you will take him into your arms and kiss him."

"That is the true spirit of the Abbeinnian nobility Joice dear," her brother said. "Out side our walls too the Glandelinians seem nothing to us. I tell you my dear that the time is coming when nothing will suffice for us but to have a boy to aid you like this, American. Because of our own spy work, work and the many marvellous astonishing escapes from the Glandelinian armies you and your sisters have accomplished the Glandelinian nation is stirring, that crazy Glandelinia which we have so long ignored during this war is nothing is lifting its head and muttering the news from Angelina Agatha is more and more grave. The move is as dark as with a dreadful thunder cloud and there may be such awful storm of war sweep over our southern Abbeinnian States as we have not been since this great conflict started."

"But surely brother dear we should be safe within the Christian lines." "Not so good," Penrod said. "There is danger within as well as without. It is one thing to the other. There are hidden secret hidden spies within and you remember the advice of Catherine Jane Lee. She helped you and your sisters though though unseen perils when I was away and you had reports that I was killed on the battlefield of Ophelia Ophelia. If as soon as the tempo of the foe had been seen our guards had entered and cleared the position and closed up on the foe that would have been one way. But spies are many within our ranks even probably among our boys and girl scouts too and these are very troublesome, and therefore a boy like this one would come in handy for you and your sisters and even more so whether I am away or not. And precisely I do not believe I will for a month or two now may be longer. It is like sliding down a hill, when you have once begun you cannot stop yourself, and you go on until there is a crash, then it may be you pick yourself up so only wounded and bruised and begin to recede the hill slowly and painfully, it may be that you are dashed to pieces. I can see that a new and dreadful storm is gathering and as for my brothers James and Germaine they go about shaking their heads and moving their heads more vigorously, their anticipations are the darkest. What can one expect when fellows like the Manley lead on such destructive foes. The heads of those Glandelinians should have been cut off the instant they began to take command.

The Glandelinian spies are at the root of all the trouble with their pestilent efforts against us but they operate against you my sisters more than our generals, but it is too late now the mischief is done. If we had every general as strong and determined as our friend and Guardian Jack Ambrose Evans all might yet be well, but many of the others are weak in decision though brave, they listen one moment to some other, and the next to our Father who is as firm and courageous as Evans, and so things are drifting from bad to worse, and these Glandelinian generals backed by the turbulent spies, scums of Glandelinia are masters of the situation. You're in greater danger now than when Catherine told you and that it was her suggestion to me to get some American boy though she herself is coming again to stay by you and Jannie."

For some time James lived a quiet life at the headquarters building. He found his position a more pleasant one than he had ever expected, and the Vivian Girls and all boy and girl scouts that accosted him as friendly and loving as if they had known him for years and if he was their brother. The orders of Penrod and Violet and her sisters that he should be treated as one of themselves and there was no distinction made between himself and many of the others. In the morning he and Penrod and even Timothy Grovaton whom he came to know, and so like very much worked at the task of boy scouting, in the afternoon he and the Vivian Girls rode and fenced under the instruction of Penrod, and in the evening before dark were allowed a little recreation and they went out to shoot game or fish as they chose on the nearby stream. He was surprised how during school hours one or the other of the Princesses started their time in their instructions to the boy and girl scout regiments that attended, learning new things, and James learned fancy horse back riding but strange to say did not need to learn shooting as he already had proven that he was a great crack shot. James got on very well with Violet and her sisters and there was more cordiality between them than was expected but it was no surprise to Penrod. Violet and her sisters were always that way toward those that were good. There was no haughtiness and insolence about them even to any inferior to them and from what he soon seen in the Vivian Girls, the thought of what they had gone through because of the enemy and what they would have to go through, was a source of as much exasperation to James as if he had gone through it himself, and what had only once been an hurtled interjection about the Glandelinian cause was now to him more bitter than ever and he was fast becoming an enemy that no one suspected. In fact as we will soon see it was this boy who was to bring the little girls through the seeming impossible.

"Those little princesses are too good to be treated that way," he would often mutter to himself. "I would give a good deal to have some of those Glandelinian generals in the United States for three months. Wouldn't they get their consciences and wickedness knocked out of them?"

At the same time Violet and her sisters were always scrupulously polite and courteous to their American aide de camp--much too polite indeed James thought for Princesses to be when he himself should be the polite one, and he alone bow to them. Too they had more good qualities than he had ever expected, Violet and her sisters were generous with every thing, and they were always ready to assist refugees in distress no matter what the sacrifice. Violet and her sister as too as James found were as clever as grown up school teachers despite their age, and James to his surprise and delight too found that their knowledge of many things was far beyond his own, and that any of the little girls in any books you hand them could construe passages in even English and German with the greatest ease which altogether puzzled him. Violet and her sister and all the boy and girl scout were splendid riders better riders he saw than even American cow boys were, and little as they were could keep their seats on the most fiery animals they ever rode. When they went out with their guns to scout on the enemy James too a good shot himself soon saw his inferiority. Very very much. Not only were Violet and her sister as the most excellent excellent shot but at the end of a long day sport too and vigorous scouting tours and exciting adventures with pursuing Glandelinian patrols they would come in absolutely untired and perfectly fresh, while James although bodily the far more powerful, would be completely done up (if not down) and at military boy and girl scout gymnastic and exercises Violet, and her sisters could do with perfect ease feats which James could not at first dare attempt for fear of injury. But Violet and her sisters did not kid him as girls usually do, in his country, instead they did their best to help him to perform telling him that as at first as he was they believed in three months time he may be able to out rival them.

"When things are new like that," said Violet "I don't believe the strongest man could accomplish it. Things we have here is very hard to learn, but even our brothers have learned us things in the art of self defense which we thought at first would be a big miracle to learn. We have not got it as good as he can do it yet, but we have improved. So don't be discouraged. And don't fear that any one will make fun of you here when you fail at first for instead they'll only be willing to help you as long as we all have the same weaknesses even when we are good. Only God is perfect you know and can perform all things. So don't be discouraged. You'll need to know all these things to make your self as much a terror as the boy and girls here do to the enemy."

To please the little girls however, James to the greatest exertions and his muscles practiced in all sorts of games soon adapted themselves to the new exercises. He found too at recreation times boys and girls played here the same games as they do in America, but there were many other exciting games that were new to him played among boys. Boys and girls he saw were just as good at baseball and foot ball as any in his own country and good among boys there and that was a surprise to him. James picked up much better in Abbiennian too and the absolute necessity there was to express himself in that language caused him to make a progress which surprised himself and even at the end of a few days he was able to converse with the hardest words with little difficulty and having learned it entirely by ear he spoke with a fair accent and pronunciation.

Walter Starving who was the principal instructor of James took much pains to assist him to even read Abbiennian and helped him on in every way in his power and James saw the true goodness in Starving and every day around him. Nearly in all cases as James saw all boy and girl scouts were some what more good looking, handsome and even pretty, but there was a striking appearance in their eyes and faces that showed why the Glandelinians dreaded even a small patrol of them. They were armed with four weapons and though little girls and boys their sabres were the same size as the cavalry, their carbines too the pistols also and the lances whose points shaped like short swords. On one occasion when James said:

"How many lances in a fight get broken? One of the little girls laughed and said 'I'll let you break mine with that big stone if you want to' and the look in eyes was such that he said in Bewilderment:

"You don't mean to say those lances are unbreakable."

"They sure are," she said. "You are a strong boy but even general Evans could not break it with a stone as big as he could lift. That is where we have the advantage for our safety in lance fighting while the dirty enemy have not."

"I'm glad of it," said James. "I'm a good lance man and when I have one I'll show the enemy something the Americans can do."

In the evening there were pretty dancing lessons and although very far from exhibiting the stately grace Violet and her sisters who instructed him and others could perform the minute or other courtly modest dances then in fashion, the waltz, the two step and also the Grand March and the old lively famous barn dance James could nevertheless perform his part fairly. Two hours also were spent in the evening in the salon of the headquarters. Being with the princesses and they his instructive instructor he did not find this part of the day tedious, and Violet and her sisters also directed most of their conversation to him, asking him questions about the life of American boys at school in America, and about American manners and customs and James soon found himself chatting at his ease.

"Strange the distinction of classes is clearly very much the same with you in America as it is here," Violet said. "Only our boys and girls are too good to be doing the fighting which is among each other there there are no quarrels. It seems extraordinary that the sons and daughters of gentlemen should engage in personal fights with each other when they should be good and charitable to each other. Strange than enemy enmity can even come between brothers and sisters. Such a thing could not and would not happen here. A boys love each other. A boy can only become your friend here for one day and lose him by death the next and he'd cry his eyes out for weeks. I can see fortunately you are too good for that. Many nations think our's is a miracle have such a good reputation. But in case of necessity if he has to any one of our boys would hand you one if you forced it on him by bullying. If you were instul insulted by such a boy, what would you do Penrod?"

 "If it is justified to do so and not a sin to kill him I should run him through the body." Penrod said quietly. "It is considered a sacrilege here to see a foreign boy of bad reputation strike one of our girls."

"And yet the Glandelinians do worse," thought James to himself bitterly.
 "Just so you are right," said Violet to James. "Glandelinians do worse, and I don't say and neither do my sisters that we are all in the right. No foreign boy here yet has ever behaved, in fact he has caught our ways as our holiness seems contagious, but I do not the way boys and girls over there do things is not of the best. That is why when they grow up they then have fights which turn out to be crimes and murder. The American gentleman as you say the same habits prevail, and that proves that so many do not use the Grace of God when it is given to them. If every body were like the people of our nation there would be no cause of wars. People do the same among each other in Glandelinia as they do in other countries. It is a coarse and unholy way and altogether at variance with our notions and notions and more so at variance with God's Commandments 'Love one another' and that they don't. That is why so that Foreigners find it almost impossible to be admitted to Abbiennia and when they do get in they must be like us or be deported in a hurry."

"That also does away with the reverence that the lower class should feel for the upper and also causes revolutions," Jennie objected.

"That is true Jennie. So long as that feeling generally exists, so long as there is as it were a wide chasm between the two classes, as there always have existed in many nations it would be wise perhaps for the upper to admit that in any respect there could be any equality between them but this is not so in our good and Holy Country where not so much equality only exists but where there seems as much charity as there may be found in Heaven. The American ranks of all ranks have a certain feeling of self respect and love of independence just like we do, but we have found out by experience with them here that any where else that no Abbeinnian soldier no matter how good or brave can fight with the ferocity and invincible spirit of Americans. The Glandelinians and these Christian foreigners with a awful terror. One thing comes to our mind when once we were spying on the Glandelinian generals some where. An American who was an Irish man by the name of George McCann, a German, and a Dago were captured by Glandelinians and brought before the generals on the charge of murdering foreigners and not in uniform. That American alone shot down in being fugitives more than four or five Glandelinians in that short time not counting what damage terrible too the other two did. We were hiding under the big table. When accused, the Dago being bad in the knowledge of the language didn't say much, but that German and the Irish American oh my heavens. We had never believed any one would dare speak to Munley and those generals like those two did and especially the American. Though not sinful in any way his language to the stupid Glandelinian general was shocking in the extreme, and he told the general that they and their whole Glandelinian government and nation could go to the bad place. They were really afraid too because the American told them he was under the protection of the American flag, and if he was shot on accusations which they couldn't prove despite their not being in uniform and foreigners Glandelinia would have the United States joining in with Abbeinnia and Glandelinia would be swept off the face of the earth by the United States alone. Staring as the language was we had to stuff handkerchiefs into our mouths to keep from laughing out loud. We secretly caused the three to escape after wards."

"But what about the Glandelinian soldier?" asked James.

"Why the result is shown by this war that is raging," said Walter Starving himself. "Our own nation even in her early days always relied upon her chivalry and the intercession of God and His Saints and Blessed in Heaven. In a just cause the horse of foot men she put in the field seems so far now to count for little because we are fighting people equally of our own race but who have gone bad. Glandelinia upon the other hand relies principally upon her infantry and her cavalry and her artillery, and as they have such well learned and courageously made generals it must be admitted it seems as if they are beating us handsomely. Then again in the wars around Vivian Wokey under the Glandelinian general Purgatorio their infantry and cavalry and artillery is always proving superior to ours. It is galling to admit it because our cause is such a just one, the freeing of so many child slaves little children stolen by the Glandelinians from the parents and orphan asylums of other Christian nations, but there is no blinking the facts that every body sees. Only general Jack Evans and Continental Aronburg are the generals that cannot be beaten by our force and Father and Uncle too. The other generals pooh they can't do a thing but retreat and retreat. It seems strange to me because that the feeling of independence and self respect which this English and American system gives rise to is the same among us of both sides, and the men of both will render them man for man better soldiers than those drawn from peasantry and of other nationalities whose every lives are at the mercy of the floods and yet as seem to have such difficulty and can't even save our fastest sections of country from utter devastation. I think sisters you have done very well in taking Catherine Lee's advice as to having an American Aid camp for your selves as from your experiences you know that Americans are even to boys. If things were as they were years before the war it may not have been necessary, but it is different now. We are on the eve of great changes. I did not like the ending of the battles past except the six days conflict at Depressionsville at the Hollister run just past in which your little girls got caught in general Vivian's burning head quarters. It was a sort of Christian victory thanks to you and God first of all, but what will come of it no one can say, God only knows, but there certainly be changes, and it is a good thing that you have a American guardian. This lad is quiet and modest but has fighting spirit as fierce as a tiger, and he ventures to think for himself. He is not in the army from curiosity either he dislikes Glandelinians very much from what he has heard and seen of them. I scarcely enter the head of any Abbeinnian nobleman a generation back that we would even though so holy a nation to be compelled much against our wishes to be inter-coursed in so terrific a conflict as this, to restore the rights of the child ren held slaves and restore them to their parents if they can be found, and to adopt them among ourselves if not found. They are treated worse than the most undesirable animals are by the Glandelinians, they're belittled more than peaty roaches are, and receive not even the slightest consideration. To the enemy child ren of Christian nations have never counted for anything much less than peaty roaches or peaty rats."

In our country as well as in America from which I came the people have rights and liberties, they won them years ago. It would be well for us to copy the American way of fighting wars in the present day as they did in America and copy the doing of their generals. I fancy some day our armies will have to adapt adapt themselves to changed circumstances in this fearful war that Glandelinia wages against us, and the idea sisters that you will learn from this American lad and all your followers and I stand and I too will be a great advantage advantage and fit us good and proper for the new state of things."

It was only during lessons, at meal times and in the salon in the evening, that James had any communications with the Vivian girls or their brothers, because of all he had to do. If they met in the grounds they were saluted by all the boy scouts with as much formal courtesy as if the little girls and the child scouts were in Heaven and they were chief angels, the little girls returning the bows with deep courtesies. These meetings were a source of great pride and yet a lament to James and he was willing to do the same. On one occasion however the strange even course of one of these meetings was broken. All the boys and girl scouts had just left the most reliable weapons, which they had been drilling and had laid aside some of the school yards was at some little distance from the head quarters, and they were all hurrying hurriedly hurrying across the company street when they heard a scream from some where. At a short distance was Joyce her foot caught tightly between two roots of a tree and she could not get free despite her sister's efforts to help her. That alone would not have been so bad but something else was wrong. They stood the picture of excitement and terror for the sister's safety uttering loud cries for the boy and girl scouts to come and help them before it was too late.

Looking around in astonishment to discover the cause of the cries, James saw a large and long column of gray running toward the edge of the camp at a trot. He thought at this sight the boys and girls would run and leave the camp like children on a usual day at such a sight else what but to his astonishment and glad they didn't but grasped what was wrong. They had and previous previous day that the Glandelinian soldier in this locality had seemed strange and unquiet, and had ordered every body to be on the look out. He had also heard that Glandelinian soldierly never dared to ask a boy scout camp or girl scout camp but here was a column of them coming, and they were either making a mistake in thinking the camp was defended by soldiers or were advancing Glandelinians and had now heard of boy and girl scouts and were advancing bent on committing a massacre. I flashed across his mind at once that these Glandelinians were the only kind called Micopolitians as they are the only Glandelinians who wear blue uniforms instead of gray not dark blue but light, but being an aide camp he without an instant's hesitation called to all the scout troop to follow him and dashed off at full speed, and soon the whole column at his assumed leadership threw themselves in front of the little girl before the foe reached 259

th. The Glandelinians knew there was a child in this camp and had advanced with the guilty passion they had of committing a horrible massacre as they usually do and were not expecting that the child would act like a soldier but would scream and try their best to escape which would have been impossible had they been so near enough to do so, put deploying themselves behind every sort of object the child scouts at James' injunction awaited the coming attack.

The Glandelinians thinking the child scouts were mere children just dressed that way, and had done this to think they could hide themselves rushed on with fierce yells. They were within range and from every object there came a frightful crash, and the front line of the Glandelinians was mowed down. Struck with consternation the main body of the foe were thrown into confusion and panic, but the impetus of the movement of the troops behind pushed them on and they could not stop. Again and again came that horrid fire, and now to save themselves and get hold of the position for that purpose the Glandelinians struggled at a furious, but James showed his Americanism by getting his comrades into still stronger positions and not only to remain the grasp to the positions but to press forward to the surprise of the Glandelinians.

They had not expected this from children wearing so raggedly colored clothes.
They had heard of boy and girl scouts but did not think these were they.

In vain the Glandelinians tried to free themselves from this trap, or to drive the little assassins through and from it, and struggled to get them with their own swords to the fire. James worked the boy and girl scouts up to a frenzy and they through his directions and encouragement maintained their grasp of the position they had secured. At last James seeing an advantage got them all to make a great effort when he and they were up to the top of the Glandelinians were in panic, and managed to get the child scouts to rush suddenly in a counter charge.

Mainly the Glandelinians threw down their arms and ran off like mad the others strove to escape through a ravine but were shot down to the last man as child scouts gave no quarter. They were pursued for quite a distance till only a remnant of the foe survived and escaped and the boy and girl scouts without a single loss to themselves came back, and by that time James was running with them had liberated Joice but cutting one of the roots with his big jack knife just as a number of other regiments of boy and girl scouts and a wave of soldiers behind came running toward the spot, while Penrod saw in hand arrived on his swift horse.

Joice too, paralyzed by fear had stood close by with her sister and her foot still imprisoned while the struggle was going on. Penrod had dismounted and was standing in front of his sisters, ordering on the other child scouts to come up ready to be the next victims if the attacking column had overpowered overpowered those defending Violet and her sisters under James' direction.
The distance too far for running up in time, and for a moment rooted to the ground with horror at the danger his sisters were in, he and his troop had not arrived at the spot until the struggle between James' column and the Glandelinians was half over, and then had seen no way of rendering assistance the Glandelinian attack was so fierce, but believing that the Mic-Hollatinians the fierce fighting Glandelinians known were sure to be the successful part of the issue he had placed himself and his oncoming horse before his sisters to bear the brunt of the next assault too excited to know what had happened to Joice. Terrible was the slaughter and through James' methods. Seeing at a glance that his sisters were untouched and the troop victorious Penrod ran on to James who had just liberated Joice and was standing panting and breathless, and threw his arms around him.

"My brave boy friend," he exclaimed, "you have saved my sisters from a fearful death by your courage, devotion, and quick American wit. When they hear of it how can I and my own parents ever thank you. I saw it all from the terrace-- the speed with which to get the boy and girl scouts with you to the defense--the speed to which you made them advance forward successfully which seemed the impossible--the quickness of thought with which you made the boy and girl scouts finally strip and clean the territory of the Glandelinians. At the beginning of the fight I could see nothing except the smoke from the sudden firing. You are not hurt, I trust?"

"Not a bit Prince," James said.
"And you have massacred the wicked would be murderers--wonderful."
"There was nothing in that Prince. I have heard my scout master in America say you could stop the biggest Glandelinian column or enemy troop if you could secure a good position to meet the attack at once. So when I once managed to get my comrades and boy and girl scout friends into the position I choose for I not only felt it was all right, but that the Glandelinians mad with fury as they were could not be able to gain an inch of ground."

"Ah I know you Americans well. It is well enough for you to speak as if it were nothing," Penrod said. "There are few boys even on our own side indeed, who could throw themselves in the way of a mad column of Mic-Hollatinians especially such a formidable column as that. You have behaved with great courage and mothy Glevaton and brought up the machine gun in time. I saw you wipe out an entire company of Glandelinians. You expect them away like chaff.

and, say you were ready to give your life for my sisters, but you all had the quickness and readiness of your new friend, and no one was too late. I believe the survivors of those Glandelinians will remember these boys and girls for a long time to come."

"It is that Penrod said in a tone of respect. "I am glad that none of us were too late, otherwise we should have been useless and the Glandelinians would have to run us down in a moment, and then fallen upon your sisters unless some miracle protected them. James" he said frankly and with more friendly emotion than he had ever shown before. "I own that a American boy is a splendid
I have always respected the games of which you spoke, but, see their use now.

When I saw that Glandelinian column I felt powerless for I didn't believe my machine gun would be of any use in the final end, but you--you rushed to the fight without a moment's hesitation, you even started it first at waste!

Trusting in your strength and your head and how to conduct the boy and girls to such a secure position, can see that ground now and its nature. To assault it when its defended is to run into a veritable death trap. Well done friend James. You sure know how to choose and you ran the foe into that merciless devastating trap. Not a loss on our side but look at that drove of dead Glandelinian soldiers. Plenty of ammunition and weapons for us too. Yes your American knowledge has made a man of you, while, and the rest are boys still."

"You are very good to say so," James said. "But I am quite sure that you were just as quick and ready as me in these circumstances, for, say you place that machine gun as you followed me opened fire on the foe, and you swept them away in a minute at every discharge, but I am glad you see there is some advantage in our arm. A American way, for in that when you all learn it you'll make your camp camps as safe from the enemy as if there were no Glandelinian arms in existence."

Penrod had put his hand approvingly upon James' shoulder when he addressed James, and then turned to his sister. Poor Joice brave as she was had sunk to the ground as her foot was sore and she could not stand upon it. The youngest of the princesses had thrown herself down beside Joice to rub her foot, while the others stood pale but quiet beside them. Penrod directed one of the boys to run up to the head quarters and bid the doctor bring down water and his bag to take care of Joice's foot, and then lifted Daisy and Hettie up and tried to soothe them, while he stretched his other hand out to gentle her self.

"You are all shaken by these things," he said tenderly, "but you have borne the trial well. Caught as you were without any weapons to defend and you realized I did not have any of you scream as if you were frightened even though you called for help from the troop, and you all behaved more wonderfully than I expected.
And yet at one volley those Glandelinians could have killed you."

"We couldn't help it we were frightened enough," Penrod said simply, "but of course we were not going to scream; but it was very terrible, and oh how noble and brave he was. Though I am a prince I feel so little beside him now. And my sisters liked him much before but now we love him as we do the rest."

"You see my dear sisters you have nothing to be conscious to bother you for you never do judge by external things," Penrod said soothingly as she hid her face against his coat, and he could feel that she brave as she was and a hero for it after wards, but as I am sure that you have showed him such a friend and companionship no harm has been done, and because you are so good and a angel possessed god allowed this to happen. Believe me to prove to you again what an American can do. Had he not been here at this moment, I shudder to think what might have happened. And he formed a death trap for those assaults and they ran plump into it. He said it was an American scheme."

"Oh I would love to hug and kiss him Penrod, shall I."
"Yes presently my dear sister has just gone off with Tim to see the result and help gather up the enemy masks and cartridges belts which the rest are doing. He sure is a wonderful boy."

"Soon the leading scout came back and saluting Penrod said:
"10,000 dead prince."

"10,000? But sure is exaggerating my boy. Are you sure?"
"Positive. We have counted the fallen of the foe and we have that many rifles and cartridges left over. It was almost wiped the attackers out though the direction of that American boy. What a splendid one he is."

"Only five hundred boy and girl scouts dead, ten thousand Glandelinian soldiers. He is a marvelous man."

This incident caused a considerable change in James' position in the conce- n of the others. Ever before he had not been just accept in consequence of the order of Penrod or the Vivian Girls. They had liked him from the start, and all had treated him as an equal and a good com-ade, and had in their hearts looked upon him as good and as the sort of boy friend they wanted, while all the girls scouts had regarded him as a sort of ne- b- othe- t- othem, and thus as a creature too good for them and they not worthy of his companionship. They had shown true friendship but henceforth he appeared in a still better light than before. Penrod acted up to the spirit of the words he had spoken at the time and so had Tim and treated him more than before as a friend and com-ade to be respected as well as beloved. 2

Tim would play willingly with James some of the English or American games and the others would join in too. He even asked James to teach him to box but James surely had the good sense to make good excuses for not doing so. He felt a lot that Timothy G. ovaton though a good and able boy and brave was by no means what he was in strength, and that with all his good ness and good will he would find it difficult to put up good naturedly with being knocked about. He said that the before it could not be done without boxing gloves, and these it would be impossible to obtain in the army--and that in the next place he should hardly advise him to learn even if he procured the gloves from some outside town for that in such contests very bad injuries and bruises were often given.

"I KNOW THAT WE OURSELVES DO NOT THINK ANYTHING OF A BLACK EYE." HE SAID LAUGHING. "BUT I AM SURE YOU RESPECTFUL ANGELINA ARONBURG AROUBURG. ANGELINA ARONBURG WOULD NOT BE PLEASED TO SEE YOU SO MARKED, BESIDES YOUR BEST FOLLOWERS WOULD NOT UNDERSTAND YOUR MOTIVES IN UNDERTAKING SO ROUGH AN EXERCISE, AND YOU MIGHT LOSE SOMEWHAT OF THEIR RESPECT. BE CONTENT COUNT TIM, YOU ARE AN EXCELLENT SHOT, AND A GOOD MAN AND A HORSE BACK RIDER AND PERFECTLY GOOD AT THE LANCE, AND ALTHOUGH I AM IMPROVING UNDER PENROD'S TUTORSHIP I SHALL NEVER BE YOUR MATCH. IF YOU LIKE SOME TIME WHEN WE ARE OUT AND AWAY FROM OBSERVATION WE CAN TAKE OFF OUR COATS, AND I CAN GIVE YOU A LESSON IN WRESTLING--IT SURE IS A SPLENDID EXERCISE, AND IT HAS NOT THE DISADVANTAGES OF DISADVANTAGES."

All the girls scouts looked upon James as a hero, and hence forth when they were together many number of them gave him the same sort of implicit obedience they paid to any of their highest leaders. In most cases the ceremonial duties, tasks, scouting and so forth prevented anything like familiarity on the part of the younger girls scouts, though they liked him well too, but Violet and her sisters now always greeted him with a sweet friendly smile than before when he confronted them or parted to go out scouting with them and joined in conversation with him as with their brother in the evening. 2.2.44

However Violet and her sisters who regarded him with real affection refused him constant allusions to the depth they considered they owed to him because they saw that he really shrank from the subject. When one of them asked him what he would have wanted if he did for them he answered them;

"I want a great reward."

"What is it?"

"That I can see the day that you and your sisters have passed swiftly through this horrible war and will see the happy days that you deserve immensely."

That answer astonished them beyond measure and Violet answered;

"Well for you sake we'll try to make it so."

"And though my help it will be," he answered.

Since Penrod shortly after this incident went on a long distance scouting for a few days to ascertain the exact position of things since the past battle. He returned depressed and angry.

The violence of the Glandelinian advance from Mic Chills plain and other points of victory had increased from day to day. Some were being set on fire, the property of all Christian convents and churches had been destroyed and looted by the enemy and this measure had been followed by the seizure of the vast estates of an enormous church in a country town and the great massacre. All hope of driving the enemy back had been declared at an end, and because of the dangers a decision had been passed warning all people of various towns and villages in the path of the advancing scouts to safety before it was too late and to destroy if possible what they could not take with them. This panic and exodus had taken effect in the towns of the recently devastated cities of Wilford Greenburg and in other great towns and also in some parts of the country, two of which the Glandelinians were advancing but in La Pola

it had remained a dead town because the danger was so great the Glandelinian armies continued to pursue the loss of the most sweeping decision, assuming that the Glandelinian order the sovereign power and using it as no monarch of Abilennia had ever ventured to do, sending even even martial law to place a in danger until people could get away, seeing to it that everything was done so that no measures of the inhabitants could occur, every body was shocked at the head long course of events, and many who were more timid shrank back in dismay. James and Vivian however was advancing toward it that territory with an enormous army but it was believed he would not be able to get there in time.

"It seems to me that a general mad man and far too has seized all part of the country into the path of the Glandelinian advance." Penrod said to his sisters on his return "but at present nothing can be done to arrest it. I have sent a telegram to father to hasten with his army and sent two letters to my two brothers and they too are advancing. I have seen General Blain night long ago and heard him. They are resolved to do everything and might have means they are concentrating their armies. Memo said he would only let events take their course with an iron hail of cannon, and what would his action against the foe will be Heaven only knows. We save all refugees from the enemy who has such a strong passion for the future and murder of little children, the Asael assembly at the order my father has taken all necessary power into his hand to aid them by sending help and to get other Christian armies on the advance to check Stanley if possible. We know that the cruel violence of these Glandelinian generals are beyond all measure. At any rate there is nothing to be done at present but to wait. A large number of the city deputies terrified at the aspect of affairs, have left Calvernia to go to Abyssinians and I am sorry to say many of the nobles have gone too. That seems common sense to me. We cannot help them if they won't be helped, but it is sad to see the main here and check the enemy if he moves in this direction to join the smaller army confronting us. Nevertheless I am glad that the Calvernia Calvernia assembly has passed a law protecting by night and force all refugees who are compelled to flee from their threatened towns, cities and villages."

Although Violet and her sisters were much alarmed at the news brought by their brother, they did not think of questioning his decision. But it did not seem possible that within the Christian line there could be danger for them and even their followers within so strong a Christian army under General Jack Ambrose Evans. He they felt sure could cope with all the foe armies combined who fought in the separate battles just past. There might be battles terrible and furious far away, and even disaster following following but surely a more serious one would reach them safely.

"We have never thought it must be possible that you have to go up and take your place by father and my sisters will go and take care by mother," Violet said quietly. "We must do our duty."

That day passed quietly at the camp, there was none of the usual gaiety for a deep gloom hung over all the army, and still during the past days great hunting parties had been formed for the chase of Glandelinian raiders, for these often came down upon some unexpected part of the Christian lines and committed great depredations. 2.2.

Upon one of these occasions James and Timothy G. ovaton were in high spirits for they were to take part in the chase of the Glandelinian raiders. It was the first time James had done so, and at an early hour all the boy and girls scout were invited to take part in the chase began to assemble at the Vivian Girls headquarters. The great courtyard of the headquarters presented a lively and splendid aspect with the horses and attendants of the chasers and the splendidly armed boy and girls scout uniforms added to the scene. Inside a collar of baundy color of the boy and girls scout uniforms added to the scene. Inside a collar of golden was spread in the great hall, and Violet, and her sisters moved about among the boy and girls scouts, saying a few words of welcome to each.

"Who is that young man standing on guard in the corner eyeing you?" sisters no longer Penrod? James asked for since the adventure with the Glandelinian attackers the enormous title had been dropped (popped) and the boys and assessed themselves by their Christian names. "It isn't that ho is eyeing them because they are so pretty or rather wise but something else is wrong...." "GAA"

"I do not know the man. I have not seen him here before, but I suppose my sisters think it is well in these times to do the civil thing to all foreigners who are refugees within the Christian lines. He is a good looking fellow too and a man, can tell by his features but it is easy to see that he is a man not of good family."

"I do not like his looks at all," said James.

"Don't like his looks. That's strange James. A man cannot help himself by his looks. He has to take what our blessed Lord gives him."

"I don't mean that Penrod. Look what a strange coming in he put on na he eyes Violet, and you other good sisters. And yet I fancy he could be innocent and saluting; through the leafless trees and they were there for a still moment to shape the scene in the direction whence they had heard the sound of firing. Presently again they heard the sound of shots, followed by several others, and then the bay of hounds. The sound to their surprise came to their left.

"They are chasing Glandelinians to a fresh place and they're coming here" said Jim. "My followers are close to us now. Penrod and his followers are unconsciously chasing Glandelinians toward us and us. That places them between us and they."

Tim signalled to his followers all who have returned and they got ready all turning their heads in the direction of the sounds and presently James said "they sure are coming this way." Louder and louder grew the sounds of the chase, then the deep tones of the hounds' baying and the angry barking and a fusillade of shots were heard.

"The Glandelinians are at bay. Penrod said Jim. We'll strike for Violet and her sisters as this band had been their worst enemy."

They moved forward and a minute later some notes were sounded on the bugle. "That is a call for help James. The Glandelinians are now numbered and are pressing them. We shall arrive before they can do any harm. Give no quarter." Five minutes later they rode into a glade where a great number of boys and girls were engaged with an overwhelming number of the Glandelinians who had retreated before but finding out the Christian troops had been thinned out by the division made by Tim were rallying.

The flank attack was a short and fierce one, and those of the Glandelinians who were able to escape with their lives can thank the God whom they hate. They fled in panic in all directions with the whole cavalry after them until not a Glandelinian could be seen. Sixty children were found to have been rescued and not a one had been hurt.

"Why Tim?" Penrod called after the end of the bloody conflict for there was loss on both sides even among boys and girls. Scouts too many of whom were wounded, and a great number of Christian soldiers killed, and still more were wounded. "We thought you and your troops had lost us. You have missed some who are good exciting conflicts, but what's the matter with you a arm, and what have you got there?"

"We have got the demon wolf Colonel Boondia." Tim replied and wiped out his band a a part of it that got away from you. "You have't had all the fighting to yourselves."

There was a general exclamation of surprise and great immediacy at first, and then every one who could rode over to meet them, and when it was seen that the object along between the two houses was really the Glandelinian colonel called the "Demon Wolf" there was a shout of satisfaction, joy and pleasure. A man the notes of the bugle rang out through the woods, and every one crowded round the two lads to congratulate them and to examine the dead colonel.

Tim was lifted from his horse, for he was now reeling in the saddle, and could not have kept his seat many minutes longer. His wound was carefully examined and Penrod pronounced fortunately there was no shoulder bone broken but he had an awfully deep flesh wound and out. A litter was made and four of the soldiers formed it in a hurry and one of the men placed it properly he was then placed on and two of the men hoisted him upon their shoulders, while four others carried the colonel still slung on his pole behind the litter. While the preparations were being made James had given the history of the battle and the slaying of the colonel saying that he owed his life to the quickness and courage of Tim.

"I owe mine to him now." Tim protested from the bunk where he was lying. "That Glandelinian officer was a powerful man and would have killed me had he not slain him and he was lucky in bringing down his horse with him. But the best thing was a joint affair."

"The slaying of the 'Demon Wolf' was so important an event as and as no more of the Glandelinians could be seen anywhere that no one thought of pursuing the Glandelinians who escaped any further. Now may be it was too late any how. James learned that no one had suspected that they had gone in pursuit of the 'Demon Wolf', and that part of the conflict had been kept all around the thicket, while the dogs hunted the avenger and to end but no signs had been seen of the colonel and the second section of his gang, and none were able to understand how he and his followers could have slipped between the watchmen. After the Glandelinians had been routed from the ravine the scattered party under Penrod had pursued the bloodstained and retreating flight Penrod had missed the two boys, and their followers.

No one had seen them see them and it was supposed that they had lingered behind in the forest. Two or three notes of recall had been blown and then no one had thought of the matter until they were happily pressed by the rallying and Jim Tim and his gang had come to his aid and almost at once launched the attack. Then it was discovered who had the colonel. It was after noon when the victorious party arrived at the headquarters of Violet and her sisters. Before they started home word to the Christian lines Penrod had sent off two swift horse men, one to the Surgeon's quarters to bring a surgeon with all speed to the headquarters, the other to tell Violet and her sisters that their dear friend Tim had been hurt and that every thing was to be got in readiness for him, but that the little deaths were not to become uneasy or frightened, as the injury was not a serious one. The messengers were charged strictly to say nothing about the death of their worst enemy so far. "The human demon wolf."

Violet and her sisters and even Gertrude Angelin and Angelina Liche and others were at the entrance as the party arrived. The sight of the litter added to the anxiety which Violet, and her sisters were feeling but Penrod rode on a short distance ahead to them.

"Do not be alarmed dear sisters," he said. "The lad is not very seriously hurt. He has been to a bit by the sabre of the Glandelinian officer, and has behaved splendidly."

"The messenger said he had been hurt by a 'Demon Wolf' 'Demon Wolf Penrod' de ar but how came he to put himself in such peril, and where is the wolf?" "It was not a wolf Violet dear but a Glandelinian officer called a 'Demon Wolf' and he will tell you all about it. Here he is to speak for himself."

"Do not look so alarmed princesses," Tim said as the little girls ran down to the side of the litter. "It is no great harm only a deep cut, and I should not have minded it if it had been ten times as bad as long as we got rid of your worst enemy Colonel Boondia."

"Colonel Boondia," gasped Violet. "Is he dead. Who killed him. You and James?"

"Yes."

"Bring up the dead colonel," Penrod said, and "And James do you come here and stand by Tim's side." "Dear sisters," he went on, "you see that great gray coated dead man?"

"Yes."

"Do you know the dead man?"

"Yes that is Colonel Boondia who terrified us so often and who was the terror of so many mothers throughout Calvernia a man who throughout the war so far has been the dreaded terror of the whole of Calvernia," said James. "These are his slayers, and they and their followers wiped out a good part of his band."

"What?" gasped Jennie while she and her sisters looked as if they thought it was impossible to be believed.

"Yes Tim and James, they and the two alone without any one helping them have wiped the glory which every cavalier put on leader and infantry infant officer has been so long striving to attain, they alone in the first miles away from the second section of the conflict pursued and slew this scourge of Calvernia."

Violet and her sisters looked long at the two boys in evident surprise while Penrod put the bugle to his lips. Others who carried similar honors followed his example and a triumphant traralla was blown. All present took off their military caps and hats and cheered, and the hounds added their barking and howling to the chorus.

Still Violet and her sisters could not hardly believe the words they had heard.

"Is it possible?" Jennie said terrified at the thought of the danger that these two boys must have run in an encounter with these dreaded Glandelinians and their fierce leader. "Is it really possible that these two alone have slain this colonel, one of our most dreaded enemies impossible for us to face without terror and apprehension?"

"It is quite possible my dear sister, since it has been done, though had you asked me yesterday I should have said that it could not be, however there your enemy is. The two boys don't know why but they had to bring it on bringing the body that way as the horses were so strangely scared of the dead man that they had to blind fold the animals to get the litter on the saddles. Tim and James his brave friend have covered themselves with glory, they will be heroes of the whole encampment, but we must not stay talking here. We must get poor Jim to bed as soon as possible for a surgeon will be here very shortly. I sent a messenger to the surgeon's army quarters for one at the same time I sent to you and your dear sisters."

Penrod stayed outside for a few minutes while the domestics handed round great silver cups full of spiced wine, and then dismissing the troop troop entered the headquarters just as the surgeon rode up to the entrance. The wounded boy and girls could take care of their own injuries and they were not bad enough to need a doctor or a surgeon.

"Please tell us all about it," Violet and her sisters asked him when having seen the surgeon sew up the big cut and bandage the wound, operations which Tim bore with stoical stolidity as much firmness as if it were nothing, he went down to the saloon where the Vivian Girls his best friends were anxiously expecting him as the surgeon declared the wound was not serious enough for so strong and active a boy to be in bed and that it was better for him to stay out and be active. "All about it please. We have heard nothing much from Penrod our brother who confesses he was no witness and James went up stairs with our brother and has not come down again. Tell us and then too we have a startling story to tell which Penrod must hear above all."

Tim did not want to praise himself, but he was forced to tell the whole story and then Penrod coming down told his part more declaring how the great portion of the Glandelinian horde under the "De mon Wolf" had made their escape from the ravine unseen through the corridor and has had passed within sight of the two boys and their realivade some distance away, and hunted him and his column down and slain the colonel and massacred the rest and then came to his aid when he was hard pressed and massacred the counter-attackers. The girls shuddered at the story of the massacre of the picket line, and the short but desperate conflict the two boys had with the Glandelinian colonel.

"Then it seems that Penrod has the principal honor this time," said Jennie looking admiringly at Tim.

Tim shook his head and said it was a joint affair. "According to the boys it is pretty evenly divided," Penrod said. "You see Penrod brought the Glandelinian Human Wolf to bay by breaking his shoulder and James cut his leg with a bullet though him struck the first blow as the colonel was using on James with drawn sabre, the boy having been thrown from his horse. Then again Tim would certainly have been killed had not James in his turn come to his assistance and dealt the man his mortal wounds. There is not much difference, but perhaps the chief honor rests with James."

"No it don't," said James. "It rests with Tim."

"No it don't," said Tim. "You saved my life and you get the honor."

"Now about you Tim, didn't you leap off your horse and put yourself in front of me when I was attacked? The honor rests with you."

"I am glad and so are my sisters that you two boys stick up so good for each other," said Joice. "I think it is only right the chief honor should be with you both equally. Both of you had more than your share of the peril already, given both of you, one with your quick head and action, the other too with your machine gun saved our lives."

"He sure did and quick too Joice dear," said Jennie impetuously. "It was very brave of them both too to kill that dangerous foe of ours, but then I think it was even so much braver to attack a charging column of Mad-Mic-Hollistinians as he rushing on us when you Joice dear had your foot caught in the wet roots, and and we wouldn't abandon you. Don't you think so Penrod dear?"

"I believe both was equally as brave as dead," said Penrod. "I myself should have liked nothing better than to stand before the Glandelinian colonel with my sabre in my hand, but although if I had been near you when those fierce Mic-Hollistinians attacked and tried to enclose you my sisters I believe I should have been horribly frightened, and should certainly have been killed by overwhelming numbers for I should not have thought thought of carrying out so promptly the plan which James adopted of running the attacking Mic-Hollistinians into that fatal death trap. But yes there is no need to make comparison. On the present occasion both the lads have behaved with great bravery and I am proud that Tim is one of the conquerors of your worst and most murderous enemy the "De mon Wolf." It will start him in life with a reputation already established with our courage and James too. Now come with me and have a look at the colonel before he is buried out of sight. He was only brought into camp to prove to you you need not worry about him any more. That shows too how a lad of the Abbsinnian race, with an American boy of his own age but a little smaller size with the "De mon Glandelinian wolf man" of the Glandelinian army..."

Violet and her sisters then shocked their hearers by telling them that while Penrod and his companies of boy and girls scouts and the division of Christian Cavalry were driving the foe out of the woods, an unseen enemy had tried to shoot them through the window from a distance.

"D'you see safe spot inside the house we turned the fire-boys hotly and brought a lot of soldiers on the run," said Violet. "Who ever shot at us escaped though the soldiers who came to our aid and joined in the firing believed one of us hit some ones for two of the soldiers followed a train of blood for some distance."

"Penrod and James exchanged strange glances to the surprise of Violet and her sisters and Jennie said;

"What is the matter with you two? Did you suspect something?"

"Not in that line," said James himself especially. "Did you notice a strange man standing in a corner before we went out who appeared to be a foreigner?"

"Yes we did," said Joice. "He was a German. We did not like his face and avoided him. We saw him run out after you, and you party started to go."

"Wonder if he didn't have a hand in it," exclaimed James looking at Penrod.

"He might have. I can't see a member of that face. If I see him again I'll have him taken into custody for questioning."

Tim it was believed would be confined in the house on sick leave for nearly a month after this incident. Penrod now talked with James over the situation of the country and compared the evils which had and was taking place with the struggles elsewhere. Then came the talk on Abbsinnians and Americans.

"There is one point between the two cases," said Penrod as the little girls who liked to hear their brother talk gathered around him and James. "The Americans have a different method of fighting which is absolutely irresistible to with stand and the people have most of the power and elect their own President Governor Mayors and so forth. The people have always been also a check upon Roy al authority winning freedom of it from other nations like England. In both ways of living, and eating which, found out when, was over there was and the American Americans are alike, and our make of buildings bridges and every thing of manufacture and dress is alike but our way of fighting though good is much different and not so good. One way of proof of a American way of fighting is to study that for sadful American civil war from 1861 to 65 concluded for a long time both sides were so tenacious and stubborn and fought so desperately that for nearly three years the war was believed to be absolutely a drawn affair with no decision on both sides. I believe had not General Grant been in the army the Confederates though small in number might have finally gained the victory. If we could copy a American method of fighting would our armies fare better and put Glandelinia back where she belongs? That is the question. Glandelinia can fight better than we can. That is why the situation is so discouraging. At present our armies said to say under Father, and our brothers more than others seem bent on showing their incapacity to overthrow the foe even though they lick the enemy in battle. Only last week father told me he fears the outcome of the future. Manley is not the one to fear and neither is General Fitzroy nor Raymond Richardson. No one yet can and has licked Izner-Mylatze."

Penrod had in some respects the thoughts and opinions of teachers in the Catholic school he had gone to. He had studied American history till he knew at least the American Civil war by heart, and he showed now he was a daring good and noble prince pure and simple as to politics he troubled his head little about them. These were matters only in his opinion for the others. It was their business to find a remedy for the general ills of the country and he would with his father's advice and help lend all aid possible.

But he no his father could not do everything. As to the National Assembly of Calvernia, he regarded it with some light of hope. "In Glandelinia it must be from the middle class," Penrod said "that the worst of the Glandelinian fighting scum must have been drawn against us. It is they too who were farmers General, and officials and city folk of all kinds. It is they with their armies who try to ground down the Calvernia state and in their invasions want to enrich themselves with the spoils. All Christians are to have no voice, they want to make our father if they can a mere cipher. All power is to be placed in the hands of the worst and wickedest of Glandelinian leaders, the chosen of the scum of the great towns and cities, the mere mouth pieces of the ignorant mobs. It is not war these Glandelinian leaders are organizing it is a general massacre of all Christianity."

Such were the opinions of Penrod, but he was tolerant of other views, and at the gatherings at the headquarters James heard opinions of all kinds expressed. During his ramble alone that evening he entered into as much as he could into conversation with his boy and girl scout companions. He found that the apprehension, devastation and distress which prevailed every where was terrible, and he wondered how these child scouts got all this information. One girl scout told him the refugees fleeing before the advancing enemy scarcely kept life together, and many had died of absolute starvation even before aid desperately sent could reach them. The boy and girls scouts told him that among the refugees there was a feeling of despair and a dull righteous hatred of the Glandelinian army.

James motives in endeavoring to find out what were the feelings of the people at large were not those of mere curiosity. He was now much attached to Penrod and his sisters and their many followers and the Abbsinnian Cause, and the people that the boy and girls scouts were able to get from all parts of the war-torn country convinced him that the state of affairs concerning the advancing foe was far more serious than Penrod was inclined to admit. The capture of the town of Mic-Calls and the massacre of its defenders and inhabitants the slaughter of many little innocent saintly children innocuous to the foe not only in the streets of Mic-Calls but in those of other great towns and villages captured and taken by the advancing enemy proved that the Glandelinian armies, if they once obtained the upper hand were ready to go to all lengths, while the dreadful number of the immense droves of the refugees who were flocking to refuge where ever a refuge could be obtained and even across the border States showed that among these bodies of refugees there existed grave and dreadful apprehensions as to the future. James had read in a book of the headquarters an account of the frightful excesses perpetrated by the Glandelinians earlier in the war at Norma Catharina section of Vivian Wickey Wickey. That dreadful unspeakable horror was not going on now but was going to undertake the task of trying to stop it should such a flame again burst out somewhere else...? Except superstitious Christians no army was able to stand against the foe. That Penrod with his father should face out any grave danger which might come seemed to James right and natural, but he thought that he was wrong not to send his sisters and little Jannie back to Angelina Arathia until the dangers were passed. But Penrod knowing his sisters were angel possessed had no fears. Some one had mentioned the past horrors of Vivian Wickey in one of their conversations but Penrod had put it aside as being altogether apart from the question.

"The Norma Catharina took place," he said over a year ago. The enemy then had the full sway in everything and were not as tame even as savages even though they know better and knew of the existence of God. Can we imagine it possible that at this day the Glandelinians at Vivian Wickey would be capable of such dreadful excesses when they know that the besiegers whom they cannot drive off would do in consequence to all prisoners held in the besiegers' internment camps."

The answer of the officer the prince addressed had lighted little with Penrod, but James and even Violet and her sisters thought it over seriously and so did Tim who was nearby.

"Of course the Glandelinian armies are dreadful and dangerous. Prince as you say but the size of your Father's various fighting Christian armies have unusually increased since the days of the battle of Big Old Knoll and Beppo Landin, but the condition of the refugees who have lost their homes through the ravages of the war and through the past Abbeann horror has improved but little despite the desperate efforts of all our kind people and the movement to relieve them. The darn enemy prevents relief from reaching them. Now the horrors of illness and starvation are growing worse. The Glandelinians in savagery and cruelty are regarded lower than the most vile of snakes, and the increase of the Christian armies of which you too have spoken of and from which the refugees have received no benefit because nothing can be done unless it is by a miracle. Thanks to the darn enemy make the people hate even more bitterly than of old the Glandelinians who so savage a holy count as I like this, and God knows that what is a righteous one and perfectly justified. Hatred of any body wicked and of wicked things is no wrong but just. I am a reformer I desire to see sweeping changes, but God alone can now help us out. We have a very good honest wise government in every state their government's representatives are good and worthy, but Heaven knows it seems that even they themselves cannot stop this tempest and lawlessness of the Glandelinians, and the whole of Calvernia desires vengeance."

"Well the Glandelinians will be soon getting all they want," Penrod said peevishly.

"The Glandelinians are passing every sort of martial law to please their own wicked purposes, and laws however wicked and absurd, that comes into the heads of their wicked government and leaders and so on. No one is so as it seems able to oppose them. They have got the reins in their own hands. What on earth can they want more. There might have been an excuse for this sort of rebellion and civil war many years since--the can be none now. What say you, Jim Tim?"

Tim seldom took part in conversations on politics but now being appealed to he said mildly:

"We must allow for the doings of human nature," Penrod. Glandelinia's head is turned with the changes in the last two years have brought about. The Glandelinian generals are drunk with their own success, and who can say where they will stop. So far they have found no benefit from the changes. They thought to gain everything by making the worse the worse of the war on all the non-combatants like the destruction of Abbeanna, Seliv Selica selicia and other places--but they find they have gained nothing, and so they will cry for more and more chances, their fury against us will run higher and higher with each disappointment, and who can say to what lengths they will go? They have already destroyed a whole country full of towns and cities, by fire, and flood, and are wiping out the Calvernia count by forest fire, next will come to that of destroying the country itself."

"I had no idea you were such a prophet of evil," Tim Penrod said with an uneasy laugh, while feelings of gloom and grave anxiety fell over the others.

the hand Tim was in.

"God forbid that I such be that sort of a prophet," Jim said gravely. "I hope and trust that I am badly mistaken, and that Glandelinia cannot go further in her cruel punishment of a Christian State. But you asked me my opinion Penrod and I have given it to you."

In the morning came news of other raids by the enemy, pillage and acts of massacre in various parts. In a score of towns County homes and convents and orphan asylums were burned and destroyed. In the south the popular excitement was greater than in other parts. In Angelina Vine State State which the enemy found it absolutely impossible to invade there was forth most part no symptoms of war, all was tranquil, and Penrod believed that as long as that State can keep itself free from the enemy and Angelina too the Glandelinians will then soon be cut off from their resources to and from Glandelinia, and the crushing blow to the rebellion can be struck.

Occasionally and at considerable intervals Jim James received letters from his father and Mother. The last letter declared that there was great excitement in Pandora over the events that had taken place with the battle and the enemy successes, and that his mother was rendered extremely anxious by the news of the battle of Depressionville on the Mic-Hollister Run which had lasted six days, and which though victorious the Christians had won at such a dreadful loss and the state of tumult and horror which prevailed, and of the big Glandelinian army concentrating before the army under General Jack Evans at Derrinda.

James in his replies made light of the danger, and told his father that even if he so desired he could not as they asked resign his service in the boy scout troop until his time of enlistment expired, and also wrote that after being treated so kindly, and shown such love and respect by so holy little girls like the Princesses it would be sinful and most ungrateful and like double crossing for him to break the engagement he had made for the duration of the war and leave such good boy and girl scout friends at the present moment. Indeed he loved all those around him, and like all around him was filled with the excitement of the situation but was not afraid. He told two in the letter that he was engaged in two battles and he and his friend wiped out a very bad Glandelinian officer called the "Demon Wolf," the chief and most treacherous foe of the Princesses. In spite of the almost universal disorder and confusion life went on quietly at their headquarters and General Evans army so far was at peace despite the size of the Glandelinian army confronting him because the enemy generals in command were afraid to attack him or molest him, and were waiting for Mylster to come up and help them. And he wrote too the danger of the times had brought the prince and the little princesses close together, and that they agreed between themselves that they had not spent a happier time than now.

"The news of the failure of a Christian army again at Mic-Calls Run was a great shock to Penrod.

"A general who knows nothing of the enemy and his way should never make an attack so rashly," he said. "Above all he should never make an abortive attempt at battle. It is lamentable that he should be so ill advised."

That early morning Penrod was shocked by receiving a letter that he must come to his father's aid as he was badly needed. His father was advancing with an enormous army but he was partly stayed because some Glandelinian army under General Baggio John Quincy Evans was annoying him dreadfully. "I must go again to Father's army," Penrod said showing the letter to Angelina Aronburg but Violet and her sisters were out scouting with James and Jim at that time. "In cases like that a place or the place for a prince now is beside the father. I wish my sisters could go with me but my father says he positively under any conditions forbids their traveling that way even with me because heavens the peril for them is too great every where. It again will be a sad parting. Good-bye, I cannot help it, how I hate the enemy."

And that of the girl scout Matron is also beside him. "Angelina Aronburg Aronburg said quietly.

"I cannot say no," the prince replied. "I wish you could have stayed with my sisters but my father as you see there in the message wants you with me. As long as they stay within this army my sisters need fear no trouble here but oh they will be lonesome for me and for them. Tim may well begin in my absence to represent me as they loved him nearly as much as they do me. I think we can leave this Christian army without anxiety, but even were it not so it would still be our duty to go. Because of my being separated again from my sisters I'll at sure strike a blow when I get there. Father wants to make a junction with Evans and only through my way of doing things he can then succeed only then can we see each other again, I and my sisters. There is another thing, want to speak to you about before we start. Joyce and Jennie my elder sisters are grave and more earnest than most little girls of her age. I never suspected it, it seems ridiculous to think of such a thing, but it is clear they have made or more of our staunch and tried friends here to rely in any way on a foreign lad, but I do so. Not of course as before our faithful friends but one whose aid is not to be despised."

The parting was indeed a sad scene than I could even think of writing. Violet and her sisters hated desperately to see their brother go, but as their Father needed his assistance they couldn't stand in his way. While they were parting a great number of boys and girls sang the song "Fare well to Thee, and also I be with you till we meet again, and after a tearful parting Penrod and Gertrude Angeline slowly at first went on their way.

Thus it happened that on the same day that Penrod and Gertrude Angeline started for the location of Camp Rock, vivianites away taking with them a small caravan of disguised boys and girls scouts, life at the headquarters of Violet and her sisters was dull after the departure of its two heads and Violet and her sisters were sad and gloomy. They had few high rank visitors now, the most frequent of them being Timothy Groveton with his arm in a sling. The management of their headquarters had been arranged by Penrod, Tim and Violet and her sisters were usually attacked to each other since they first knew each other. Tim had been and was a prominent general among all his followers and was one of those who had taken his seat with the third divisional assembly of the vivianites and had voted for the abolition of the once even small privileges of all Mandelminian prisoners, for the violence of the fury of the Mandelminians had aroused and alarmed him and made him terribly disgusted.

alarmed and alarmed him and made him terribly uncomfortable. James and Tim took their work up at the request of Violet and her sisters to prepare the child scouts for any emergency, for the going of their brother and the ever-darkening cloud weighed upon their spirits, and life was gloomy and unpleasant and fearful. The absence of absence of their brother and Gertrude and the general feeling of anxiety knit Violet and her sisters and their boy and girl friends closer together, much of the occasional observance which had on his first arrival surprised and even delighted and amused James was now laid aside, joy and its joys the visits and careful observance of him to her and her sisters and fearful of the prospects of some unseen and dreadful approaching danger, did her best nevertheless to make the house very cheerful. Once without thinking one of the boy scouts started to sing the song "God be with you till we meet again, and that slightly cheered the little girls some what. James who had liked her and her sister at the first meeting, liked her and her sisters immensely for they were even in times of sorrow most pleasant and agreeable, and the younger girls walked in the grounds with their boy and girl scout companions and chatted when they were gathered in the evening, just as James sisters had done at home. Jennie and Violet and also little Paisy were if the group broke up generally James companions, and sometimes the others. Ever since the day of the first fight with the foe, Violet and her sisters had treated him as their special friend, adopting all his opinions, and falling in with any suggestions he might make with a readiness which caused Tim one day to say laughingly to James:—

"One would think James that you were a thief rather than not be a Penrod. They listen to you with a good deal more deference than they even do to me. Look out you'll call that a real angel sickness yet" and then you'll be like them."

"I wish," was the bad answer. "An angel can do more to those accused Glandelinians than a human being. Two days came and went. Penrod reached the river Vivian early with Gert rude for a letter arrived from there from Penrod but the news was always in the same strain. Things were going worse and worse, there were sixteen new battle engagements, and Inez Myletze was advancing toward Poland. The Vigilance of the Abbiannian Assembly was over on the increase, fearing the advancing foe was the real master of the situation, the greater part of the refugees from a hundred towns had fled, a number of great Christian armies were also over on the retreat or had fled. As grave disaster threatened, and as the enemy was hurling great attacks upon Poland a Committee was formed in every city and town further north and virtually superseded the constituted authorities who couldn't do anything at the onsets of the emergency. Reports came in that recently two hundred country towns and two cities were burned by the advancing foe, and the town fold distasteful and refugees. But at present none dreamed of real personal danger. The refugees who started exodus did so because they found the situation and the heat and smoke of the great averaging fires intolerable, and hoped that more armies would soon move forward to aid the emergency to put down the victorious Glandelinian armies which constituted a danger to every body and national property in Calvinia. But as yet there was nothing to Fortshaw for shadow the terrible events which began would only take place to indicate that a Glandelinian movement which began would only increase the diabolical fury of the war and in disaster to blood and bloodier battles than ever and greater adventures so now and peril of the little Vivian. It is she who had gone through so much to save any individuals in the world already. Therefore though Penrod feared the possibility of the increase of the violence of the war, he was thoughtful and uneasy. He knew that the safety of his sisters though he was deeply longed for them. He knew they were angel possessed, and that Jim or James could guard them well and Jack Evans too. He believed it was a wise plan of all army officers to the strict abolition of all the privileges of Glandelinian prisoners. His instructions were precise, that if a great horde of Glandelinians should ever make a sweeping attack or start a general battle in the location of his sisters' headquarters, and it was evident that a successful resistance could be made, Jim should send down to General Evans word of it and ask for help for the sake of his sisters or sent his sisters to Evans care and James too. But if the attack was general all along the line and the battle became very severe and dreadful, then Tim or James was to journey at once to the head quarters and at once report to the Christian army, or if possible escape if Evans was in danger and try and get to Emperor Vivian's army. But that day went on without disturbances though scouting parties frequently declared that the enemy was acting mighty ugly and suspicious and was under General Huebaum Mic-Whi-ther and Cannonia and that Deprassionville was still in danger.

At Calverline as elsewhere a committee had been formed and had taken into its hands the entire control of the management of the city and placed it under martial law and saw to it that all fortifications were heavily reinforced in case an enemy force would advance upon it. At its head was the Mayor of Calverline.

"I do not understand that boy Walter Starving," said Tim. "I do not like the way he works about things, though he is so ambitious and pushing, he is the leader of the advanced troop of Boy and Girl Scouts of the town, and is in communication with the most strong spirits of the Gemini, and has sent an urgent he appears most anxious to be of service to you princesses and has sent an urgent letter to Catherine Lee beseeching her to come. When I saw him he assured me of his devotion to you princesses but I can see by his face something wrong. He is most keenly to day princesses he prayed me to assure you that you need feel under no uneasiness at all, for that he held a mob of scout scouts and picket at hand every where from the strictest watch and would unswerving that no hostile movement of the enemy should be made against the Christian lines at our section without his observation, and timely warning, and in fact I know for I have taken the precaution of engaging the service of a Gemini who is upon the committee that Walter Starving is exactly exerting himself to bend it us."

It has been several times urged by Starving that there was danger of the Glandelinians making a most violent attack upon this part of General Evans' army but so far nothing had occurred. Starving had been and is a successful leader of the opposition to the proposition that Violet and her sisters should leave this army. He declared that while no one is more hostile than himself to the Glandelinian army, and while he would not only abolish the Glandelinians he considered that they were not doing anything as dangerous as to cause immediate fear, and that nothing should be done about you little girls leaving Evans' army until a decree to that effect is passed by the army assembly. If Evans was here all would be well but with Vivian only in command it is hard to guess whether he could hold against Huebaum Mic-Whi-ther again as he did before at Depressionville. Until that time Starving knew that every body should be on the watch. Of course many towns have been burned to the ground, but as the enemy out side of the army is so dangerous and the country itself in such dire peril it would be unwise and foolish of any one to send you little girls off through open country when the Glandelinian generals are striving so hard to take measures of wicked and diabolical vengeance against you little girls just because you are Ablesunna Princesses and more so because you are such holy little girls, and that therefore you should remain until the assembly see it is positively safe to proceed, but if we do go we must head for Emperor Vivian's army, and here after we must for God's sake never leave it again."

"I am sure we are much indebted to Walter Starving also our best friend," Joice said. "He often does a lot for us and is a worthy boy of his class. We love him and his companionship as if he was one of our brothers. Of course often he is very bashful and feels out of place among us because we are such good and angel possessed girls, but for a boy of his position he is brave and good."

"Yes," Jim agreed but in some what doubtful tone of voice. "So far as assurances go there is nothing to be denied and he has as we all know been loyal to us and you little girls, and yet some how, do not like the working he has. It strikes me that he fears the enemy is playing a treacherous game, although that that game is he or, cannot say. He has also been playing an unusual lot lately though he always did pray and he attends more masses during the day than he ever used to. At any rate I do not trust his story, he speaks a speaks smoothly but I think he has a grave apprehension for the once said that General Cannonia in charge of this Glandelinian army, has a double face, and that he is cruel and treacherous."

"That is not like you Tim," said Jennie. "You who generally have a good opinion of everything. It seems to me that you and Walter Starving are over suspicious, but then who can tell. If there is anything he can discover he will warn us."

Disaster came again. The battle of the night was lost to the Christians under General Bruno Angle, and Walter Starving learned that the advancing Glandelinian armies were becoming more and more (more) violent, and that many secret spies and agents and other Glandelinian watchmen had been told off to see that none of the Princesses attempted to fly from General Evans' army to Emperor Vivian. He therefore wrote to the Ablesunna Prince urging that it would be better that his sisters should under a strong escort move to General or Emperor Vivian's army where it was felt sure they would be in no danger.

Tim replied he received a letter which showed that Penrod and also Emperor Vivian was frightened as to their safety, and begged him to start with the American boy and Jim as soon as the roads were fit for travel. About the same time Timothy Groveton himself received a summons from the Emperor in a separate letter to join his son at Big Old Knoll where the big Christian army was still at but starting to move out. The messenger who brought the letter to Walter Starving brought one also for Violet, and her sisters, from Emperor Vivian their father, saying that the great ruler and leader was of the opinion, that any spying act that they had intended to be doing must be still further postponed as in the present state of affairs all private military plans of their part and interest must be for their own personal safety be put aside in view of the terrific dangers that surround them already.

"They are quite right Tim," said Violet, "my father and brother, have felt for some time that when our cause was on the verge of a precipice of disaster it was not time for us to be throwing our lives recklessly away if we cannot succeed in finding out something any how. If there was some chance of disguising our selves my sisters and I so that the enemy could never tell us in under any condition we might try but we can make our make up as homely homely as little ugly witches and the Glandelinians would recognize us any how. As it is we must wait, even though we may know waiting may never come to an end. I have a conviction Tim, that our days of happiness are over, and that terrible things are about to happen."

"But nothing that can happen can separate us together and you brother Penrod Violet."

"Nothing but death Tim," she said quietly.

"But surely Violet you take too gloomy a view and it is said angel possessed child - an angel could be killed, no - will disprove take so gloomy a view. God will aid us in time. Death of course may be a part of our Penrod from you but the seems to be no need to fear him now more than at other times. The enemy is only advancing successfully at many provinces because the Christian generals opposing them do not know how to operate against them but what is that, and surely you brother has been no good to you little girls that I need not have fear for him. Surely you angels have preserved you so far they'll preserve you again and who knows - she hesitated for a moment and then continued "without your wish knowing it Penrod may be possessed by angels too. He can do such strange almost magical wonderful things."

"My dear Jim," Tim said Jennie herself quietly "You do not have ask a fierce savage wild about to send and out his way no matter what it is, what is the reason for his actions. I hope Violet may be wrong, but at least my dear friend we shall see each other and poor Penrod Penrod again before long, and whatever trouble may come shall share them. Of course we are righteous to perfection and so was Our Blessed Lord, and he didn't escape the avenging fury of his worst enemies and didn't try to. My own mother in her letter to us yesterday far from Angelina Arathia said that she was determined that as Evans is not in command of this army he must not only Vivian, we should try to join our father's army before all of it moves out of Big Old Knoll to advance for Penrod, for that although the fury of the war has now abated some what, she is frightened and anxious over the thought of cut being alone here, and in the present position of things they have no hope of being able to do anything for us either in case we do get in dire peril. We are secretly watched by enemy spies and we know it, she says my father gave very ill indignation at the report of so many child soldiers. Christian generals that is going on. In the first place he holds that they are deserting their post in the face of the enemy, and in the second place by their misbehavior across the Anorburgs in a River they are causing all the people to look with horror and fear upon the whole situation."

"I and my sisters have been bidding far well!" Jennie said "Not to you but our dream of happiness. We are always unhappy and now we are yet since Penrod had to leave us again. This cruel sorrow separating us too often to my way of thinking. We shall meet soon but, fear that will never return."

"We hope so Tim dau r---I pray God and His Blessed Mother that it may be so."

The change of life would have been great indeed, but as no one could dare leave the Christian army for Papero-Vivians nothing could be done. James had thrown himself however into the thick of all that was going on, and the salon of the princess's head quarters was crowded every day with those of the Gemini trying to think of a plan to forward Violet and her sister safely to Papero-Vivians army, but being a foreigner James was regarded with by no means a boy of extreme value and many of the leaders of the party with whose names James had become familiar with were also frequent visitors to Gligora, Debernard, Rodney Graves. James was struck with the variety of conversation that went on at these meetings. Many of the young members of the Gemini laughed and chatted with Violet and her sisters trying to cheer them up and make them forget their loneliness on Papero, and chatted with them with as much gayety as if the former state of things were continuing without any disturbance or disturbance, and an equal indifference to the public state of things was shown by many of the elders, who sat down and devoted themselves to cards, or other amusements.

cut, and to restore peace and happiness to Afghanistan. James himself moved from group to group, equally at home with all, chatting lightly with the court courtiers, whispering eagerly with the elders or discussing with the sons of a brave hero the views and opinions of the British. Jack Saunders and many of the girl and boy scout leaders were constantly at the house and strove by their cheerfulness and gaiety to dissipate the shade of horror and melancholy which still hung over violet, and her sisters and their ever-increasing loneliness for their Father and brothers.

On this same day General De St. Kauxar and his body of general staff officers on the left of General Alvinia was left wing became more and more anxious for they have been heavily assaulted by wave upon wave of Ghazalini soldiery hurled forward by General Hasbaum Mic-Whither, and the positions held by by desperately struggling Afghani soldiery were not most precarious; most of the troops under General Alvinia had been sent elsewhere to relieve pressure upon General Daniel Hudsons front, and those left behind not in action yet were discomfited by random shell fire hitting into their camps, and ready to join the mobs of those already on the white retreat. Two out of three Ghazalini divisions had been swept away and but one remained under General Sullivan and he was badly wounded. Of the National Guard, only the Battalion of William St. Thomas and part of the battalion of Saint Pierre remained to tell the tale, and the enemy attack was faithful and ferocious. Other Christian columns were opposed to General Hasbaum Mic-Whither but all seemed lost.

At even that distance Violet and her sisters had heard the distant sound of conflict and at eleven o'clock A.M. (the hour that um) the Mill Military tocsin was hurrah'd to sound, bugles blarney, and the drum beat calling troops into line. All that morning, and even any all the day before there had been sinister rumors of circulation, but General Avilonia had sent privately to his generals that the danger was not imminent, but that they should nevertheless be prepared as you could not trust the foe any more than the cattle snake and as soon as the alarm sounded Jack Saunders left the head quarters of the princess princesses to go and see if he could get his boy and girl scout regiment to do some fighting of their own. He embraced Jean Saunders and also Violet and her sisters, who were calm but very pale and sad. One of his boy scouts who had been wounded recently asked to go with him but Jack said, "O my friend you are too badly injured and could not fight with the rest, but your sister is at present to your own comrades. Jack O James keep an eye on Violet and her sisters and see that no harm comes to them."

all over the general vivandises left wing princesses"he said.

girl had been better at moving to some safer spot."

Before leaving that had passed Violet, and her sisters insisted upon Jack taking refreshment and having his wounds bound up and attended to when he had finished his meal that two of the little girls prepared for him Jack began:

The attack we wished was so violent and severe that soon though we were not yet even near being assaulted one of the officers came to Angelina and pressed her to leave the position with her followers as it would be untenable.

[illegible]

and the soldiers. The fight was always at close quarters and we ourselves drove the Gladdellians from our own position with our own hands. We had our rifles and pistols and shot and killed them and we seized the cannon and turned them upon the same place opened an artillery fire of our own. The Gladdellians attacking us fled in terror, and I believe that as would have conquered all the armies of the Gladdellian army, had not the Christian armies all around us continued to retreat. The Gladdellians whom we had dispersed kept up a withering fire upon us from all objects.

Then taking better courage the Gladdellians seeing their comrades victorious else where took the chances and rushed us. We managed to fight them back without a loss and then were compelled to retreat ourselves or be left without a defense. Every Christian soldier who did not retreat was a martyred or shot down by hundreds, as well as many of the officers of the division. The mob of victorious Gladdellians rushed through a portion of the Christian camps driving the defenders before them seeking and getting the tents or fire. Then the Abyssinians retreated firing as they did so heavily, we made our retreat through a large plain, but most of the Abyssinians were soon attacked in the rear and their division literally cut to pieces. We rushed into a new position when again assaulted and massacred the first wave of those who attacked us and drove the other back, and in the lull made our way out of that plain and so escaped the worst disaster of that bloody day.

I getting off with only these few wounds, then after deploying my troops to defend our camp in case of attack, and all our leaders were doing the same I then hurried to this place and so you see here I am. The enemy are smarting under their defeat before at this town of Depressionville and are trying desperately to make up for it. The battle is raging still some where else but along the left I had gradually died down, but it may flare up again."

11 MAY 2009

"to question me y strainer that comes here."

"So my Doc" said General de Arredino extending his hand. "I was just doing our duty."

Although the incident terminated well it left the spy shaky and weak, but a narrow escape seemed that can of light-fuel been discovered all would have been over. As evidence it was an amusing darning as if he had been caught in the act of setting the fire to attempt it again was impossible, and he was glad to get on a ferry and go down the river to return to his own home. Violet and her sisters never knew of this narrow escape, for to avoid causing them extra misery Angelina, a young woman, had told her that she had had no evidence especially as no evidence could be found on the man though she alone thought letting him go was suspicious.

"Oh Princesses, princesses," Jack Sanders exclaimed hurrying into the salon in which the little girls with Tim Govey and others were sitting during the following morning. "I hear that it is rumored in the street, that many strangers who could not give a good account of themselves have been arrested. Many secret spies are being you."

It being a dark day, from the smoke again from the eastern forest fires being thick in the sky the room was lit up as if to receive company but the crowd which had thronged it the night before was gone. Very body was out watching the progress of the bloody battle. The Abyssinians had first with drawn, then the Dondobians had begun to fall off, for it had become dangerous for them to try and hold the position any longer. The only constant visitor now was Angelina, but to day she was absent. The news was not unexpected and neither that of the results of the battle. The violence of the Glendellian assault waves had been increasing since the battle on this morning had been renewed. Generals Obedience, Jackbin, Danton, Josephine and others on the Christian side had been killed in striving to maintain their positions against the attacking force and it was certain that at any moment disaster would occur. Such had been the state of feeling in the provinces that it was felt that it would be more dangerous for Violet and her sisters to go away than to remain in the Christian army here, and yet the queen and king and even Penrod had been a prey to the liveliest anxiety and flight in respecting Violet, and her sisters. Forcent many to their hopeful expectations they had not come. It seemed impossible that there could be so much danger within the Christian lines itself, for before there never used to be, but the blind fury of all Glendellians had been against the little girls to such a height that it was impossible to say that might happen. Now that they had heard that the blow was about to fall (the little girls drew her two young sisters instinctively to them as if to protect them but no word passed her lips).

"It might still be possible to fly," Walter Starving went on. "We have all the little disguises in readiness."

"While we are ill with the Christians lines as princesses do not fly from the action of Glendellia," she said quietly. "Out side of the Christian lines it might be different. If we fled from this army to another the danger would be just as great. No Walter Starving we have a good strong body of boy and girls here in this army, and it is not for us that danger and friends to leave that post here in the Christian lines because unseen danger threatens them, come what may, these Glendellian spies and agents will find us ready for them."

"But think of your brother Penrod Princesses. If you are destroyed how will he feel and your father too. Don't take such risks and bring them unnecessary sorrow." Walter Starving murmured.

"We won't perish," said Violet confidently. "The enemy tried that often on us and never succeeded yet. As for you my friend Jack Sanders,"

"I shall stand by you through it all," Jack said firmly.

"I no my sisters do not doubt your courage Jack and they wish now that we long ago had we warned you all within emperor Vivian's army, but who could have foreseen that the Glendellians fierce as hoed of it all beasts should win so easily a victory by hate against God and all Christianity. However although it is the duty of, and my sisters to either get to our fathers army or face the consequences here it is our duty also to try and save our child so out troop from destruction because this army is badly wanted—therefore a Walter Starving my friend I commit all my regiments to your charge. Save them if you can with the help of God and make for my father's army. Once there you know all the arrangements we have already made."

"But princess Violet Jack Sanders is most grateful."

"In this situation, can listen to no argument Jack," Violet said firmly and decidedly. "In this respect my will is law and backed by my sisters. I and they know what your feelings are, but you must set them aside they must give way to the necessity of saving one of the best and oldest regiments of girl and boy scouts from perishing.....""qqqq

"It is about your duty," Violet said. "I asked an Jack bent his head in a sign of obedience to Violet's order."

"I cannot do not think that we will be included in any grave peril as long as we remain within the army," Violet said. "But we are not going to stay here. We will go with James as he has arranged in the morning to the head quarters occupied by General Evans before he left and remain quietly there awaiting the course and events of this great gigantic battle. We have an old maid of our acquaintance there and we can pass ourselves very well as even of herself. We have arrived from some part of the of the country. You had better send a trust servant to prepare her for our coming. You James will of course accompany the boy and girl scouts."

"Pardon Princesses," James said quietly. "I am firmly resolved to stay with you within the Christian lines. I may be of great assistance to you and there surely will be no danger in me remaining for an a fortnight and have no nobles blood in my veins. Besides my traveling with Walter Starving would add to his a danger. He will have difficulty enough in traveling the unsurveyed country with two regiments of boy and girl scouts, and I would add to that difficulty."

"We cannot help that," Put in Jennie sweetly. "I and my sisters ought long ago to have sent you everywhere home and feel that we have made a mistake in allowing you to remain so long and face the same peril as we so often do. I must as well as my sisters insist upon your accompanying the boy and girls scouts."

"I am sorry that I have to disobey you Princess Jennie," James said quietly but firmly. "But Penrod you brother showing a slip of paper with pen rods and writing on it has placed me as your legal guardian in his stead until there is a reunion of the union and as long as I carry this slip of paper I am my own master and can rightfully dispose of my actions. I am deeply sensible of all your goodness to me but I for you makes cannot yield for I feel that I may be of some slight use here. Of course if any of you please indicating Violet especially with his head) really has more say than Penrod and will force me to comply with your command, then what ever will happen afterwards I will not be responsible for it. I don't want you little girls to think I am trying to make any thing of my self by saying so, but in spite of all your exparience in this war I can prove I know the enemy more than you do. As long as I am not seeing up to anything unusual and keep my own back to my own foreign clothing on and so forth no harm could come to me by the Glendellians as they do not generally attack foreigners unless they suspect that foreigners are Christians. I am a good one but you of ten said while I was here that I do not seem to act as good a Christian as I am. See there is an advantage for me and you can fool the enemy easily. There are so many at present in the Christian lines that there is little fear of my attracting notice if they would be Glendellian spies or Federal agents in disguise. A mouse may help a lion Princesses, and it may be but though a little boy I may be able to be of service to you Princesses and as I am an American I can do things in an American way."

"Do not urge him further," Jennie said. "Angelina said laying a hand on Jennie's arm as she was again about to speak. "James is brave and thoughtful beyond beyond his years and it will be some what of an effort to us to think that he can be watching over us, and as he has that paper that makes him secure because Penrod could believe we are fools to send James away. I and my sisters gratefully thank you James for your offer, to share that danger and so we do. I don't think you should say that you will do all that can possibly be done to protect us and help us in our work. You will be much more than to do so than any of our friends, for if they were with us they would likely be involved in our fate, that ever that may be, for you will be viewed as American boy friends and joint guardian with you. Save yourself and us. Any one of us must persuade him should difficulty be encountered as if he were our dear brother and be guided by his advice. And now sisters dear come with me to my room (the room) I have much to say to you."

"I implied the princesses decided after all to Jennie or Angelina said James. "Walter Starving said patting the back of his shoulder when the Vivian girls had really left the room. "For I shall feel comfort in knowing that you are watching over the little girls, how I love as for a time for I have much to arrange with Timothy Govey." After a prolonged talk with Timothy Govey, Walter sent for Jack Sanders. As soon as he entered the lad said: "Of course I shall obey Violet's commands, but it seems to me an an odd plan, putting a boy, scout officer to play, to be fighting the country and lead leaving James the only boy to look after the little Princesses and as I am the only one at that."

"He is hardly a danger," Jack said. "Walter replied. "He has been with us as one of us for even only a short time now and has already risked his life for Violet, and her sisters. You could not stay here without extreme risk."

For if our part of the camp isn't yet attacked by an overwhelming number of Glandelinian soldiers it will speedily be so and when they once taste blood those demon wolves will hunt down every one of us. On the other hand might proceed opening through the streets of a Glandelinian encampment without danger as he is a foreigner and Glandelinians don't pay any attention to foreigners not dressed in uniform, nevertheless they would not have kept him if he could have gone, but the little girls since Penrod made him their guardian in his stead had no power of controlling him and as he chooses to devote himself to them they thankfully accepted his devotion. And now Jack dear it may be that after our parting to-morrow, we shall not meet again, for God alone knows what fate is in store for us. I have therefore some serious advice to give you. If anything happens to me or the girl and boy scout troops you will, I know never forget that you are the head of the troop and that the honor of a great well fought regiment is in your keeping, but do not try to strive against the inevitable. Adapt yourself to the new circumstances and under which you will be placed, and to disguise yourself lay aside that Christian military bearing. As to the dear Vivian Girl Princesses, Violet, and her sisters are already provided for. I have already also sent off a message to warn Gertrude Angelina, and as it has already been arranged between us that while she will dare to stay and face defiantly what ever will come during this useful battle, which now is making so much din, it is her duty like yours to escape the danger which threatens us all, I trust that she will endeavor to leave the army and this part of the country also, but, I imagine that she will stop in general Evans head quarters until some means are devised for getting poor Violet and her sisters away. As to the child scout regiments I believe they will make a safe trip as the enemy would be afraid to tackle them. Cover Violet and her sisters secretly with all those child scouts if you wish if you do not deem to move them away, protect and make them happy despite the circumstances. Even now these thrilling times and the threat of danger in a way does not make them unhappy. It is the absence of their father and brothers and their dear mother. That to protect them you must see to it they're really scouts and no secret small fess in disguise goes without saying, but that is sufficient. Guard them carefully against you wicked treacherous brother Gerald Starving who is on the enemy side, and for example if in future time even real good foreign boys or girls of the rank of our American friend here of whose character you can entirely improve and approve, asked for the privilege of guarding Violet, and her sisters, do not refuse it. Remember that such a favor would have the cordial approval of their parents, and brothers and myself."

"A great over look of great surprise passed over Jack's face. It had seemed to him so much a matter of course that the Princesses should be guarded by noble people that the idea of the danger being so great that they must be secretly covered by as many boy and girl scouts in disguise as possible was surprising and unerving indeed.

"Do you really mean sir, that is my friend James were to be their chief guardian under Penrod's advice you too would approve of it."

"That is exactly what I do mean Jack. In the war stormy times in which we are living and passing through Penrod and I could wish no better protection for them. Were he an Abbeismian in the same position of life I own that I might view the matter in a different view of light; but as I have said in America the distinction of classes is much less marked than here; and more over in America there is little fear of disaster from Glandelinia, and besides if it was necessary to do so Violet and her sisters could flee over there."

A few minutes later Timothy Groveton entered with the clothes which had been prepared for Jack and his friend Jean Saunders. They were such as would be worn by the sons of Glandelinian workmen, he himself was attired in a clothing fit for a ragmuffin. Jean was aroused from the couch on which she had for the last hour been asleep, and she and Jack retired to dress themselves. In their new customs, Timothy Groveton accompanying them to assist in their toilet. Both child scouts had the greatest repugnance to the change, and objected till further when Timothy Groveton insisted it was absolutely necessary that Jack should cut his hair, and Jean should fix hers in long bob fashion dyed color it and smother their hands and faces with a little coating of iodine in water.

"My dear Hostess Jack," he said "it would be worse than useless for you to assume that attire unless at the same time you assume the bearing and manners appropriate to it. In your own uniforms we might for a short time walk the company streets as if the enemy captured the camp without observation--but if you sallied out in that blouse with your white hands and faces and your hands thrown back and a look of disdain and disgust on your faces the first Glandelinian who met you would arrest you and find you are Christians in disguise. You must behave as if you were Glandelinians. You are representing a boy scout of the Glandelinian Army and must try and imitate his walk and manner. Gave you hands deep into your pockets, shuffle your feet along carelessly, let your head wobble about as if it were uneasy on your neck, round your shoulders, and slouch your head forward. As to you Jean your role should be impertinence. Put your hat on the wrong way, hold your nose in the air, pull some of your Glandelinian hair down over your forehead and let some of it spurt out through the hole in your hat. See how completely I have got myself up. You would take me for a back again. Again again in where ever you met me. I do not like it, but as I have to disguise myself, I try to do it completely."

It was however with a feeling of humiliation that the boy and girl presented themselves before Walter Starving the All High Chief of staff of the boy and girl scout troop. He looked at them scrutinizingly.

"You will do Jean and Jack" he said gravely. "I should have passed you in the Company street without knowing you. Now come in with me and say good bye to Violet, and her sisters. The sooner you are out of this house the better, for the battle they say is growing intensely and the enemy aiming more and more and there is no saying at that hour a general sweeping attack of the enemy may storm upon this sector and cause the enemy to possess this part of the camp."

The parting was a sad one indeed, but it was over at last, and Timothy gave them hurriedly the boy and girl scout leaders away as soon as Walter Starving returned with them.

"God bless you Tim" Walter Starving said as he embraced his friend. "Should I starve overtake us, you will I know be a good leader to us if you survive."

"Now James" Walter Starving said when he had with great effort of effort mastered the sorrow and emotion caused by the dolorous parting, which he felt might be a final one "go to Violet and her sisters. They're waiting for you as they have something to tell you."

James was led into their presence and how beautiful they looked even in their sorrow and misery and James was so touched that he almost cried himself. "Don't cry for us James dear it isn't necessary" said Jennie through her own tears as she tried to smile. "We are not grief stricken because of our peril. We'll face peril gladly as we like the excitement of it. But we're oh so lonesome for father and mother and our brothers. I called for you since you for our sakes have chosen so gallantly to throw in your lot with ours. I will give you a few instructions. In the first place I have hidden beneath a plank under my bed a bag containing a thousand dollars in Abbisannian money. It is the middle plank. Count an even number of planks from each leg of our bed and the center one covers the bag. You will find the plank is loose and that you can raise it easily with a knife; but varnish has been run in, and dirt swept over it so there is no need of fearing that it will be noticed by any of the Glandelinians who may pillage the house, which they will doubtless do when we are gone. I have already sent an equal sum to our house keeper Mrs. Jerry. Here is her address; but it is possible in your adventure with us you may need more money, and may be unable to communicate with us at our new headquarters, at any rate so you keep the bag of money in your charge and use it for our benefit and yours too. You had better attire yourself back into your old plain clothing but better wear the oldest suit you have got. I and my sisters will be ready in a few minutes. Little Jennie is to accompany us and she is already dressed, so we all at you help can slip out at the back entrance. Since Penrod put you in guardianship of us while you were in converse with Walter Starving we voted that you shall be our director also and leader, and we will place ourselves under you as if you were the top over us."

"Oh Prince see do not do that" objected James. "It is I who should; should;"

"I know" continued Jennie mournfully, "but we have to assume that rank to avoid all suspicion for as you act as our Master the Glandelinians will have no suspicion should they be in possession of this part of the camp. Should we be disturbed before morning, we shall place ourselves under your escort; for although I hope that all our servants are faithful one can answer for no one in these times. I would send them off now, but that the sight of females moving through the company streets at this time of night would be likely to attract attention on the part of victorious and drunken Glandelinian soldiery, one of whom is running from the battle field which is the center and focus of all the mischief that is going on. I and my sisters can give you no further advice. You must be guided by circumstances, place your trust in God like we do and then all will be well. If as I trust we girls can live undisturbed and unsuspected with our old housekeeper we will be best that we should remain there until the battle is finally over and Glandelinia is defeated again. If not and you advise us to go to the Abbisannian army and you accompany us and my sisters must leave it to you to act for the best. It is a great trust for us to place in the hands of a youth your age; and a foreboding too; but it is your own choosing, and we have every confidence in you to help us pull through to safety."

"I will do my best to deserve it princesses." James said quite quietly. "But I will continually pray that you and Penrod and your loving ones will soon meet together again. I cannot believe that although just at present the Glandelinians are becoming so vicious they can in cold blood massacre you little girls if you were captured if you are really possessed of angelic souls."

"I believe you may be right." Violet herself said "but sometimes I fear that it is not so with our brothers Penrod. He goes to such risks for what he attempts to learn, and the Glandelinians are mad as demons so far, and they gladly follow the leadership of the arch-sound in Vanley and the like. I fear that before all this is over the whole of California will be deluged with blood, and now James when you have changed your clothes lie down ready to rise at a moment's notice. Should you hear a tumult or a battle raging in our quarters run at once to our long gallery. The girls and my sisters will join you, prepared for flight. Lead us instantly to the back entrance, avoiding if possible any observation from the domestic staff. As there sleep on the floor above and know nothing of the dangers which threaten us, they will not awake so quickly and I trust that you and us will be able to get out without being seen by any of them. In that case however closely questioned no one will be able to afford a clue by which you and we can be traced. If you pull us through and get us to Evans headquarters, we will reward you by allowing you to try later if it is necessary to get us to the Cape Horn, a fine army and the reward Penrod will then bestow upon you and my father too."

When he had changed his clothes James extinguished all the lights in the antechamber. Before this all the adventures had been told to him. Then he opened the window looking into the company street and took his place close to it. Gloom under the circumstances was inevitable. In the hours passed he thought over the events of the past few days. Indeed he was fully aware that the task he had undertaken might be full of grave dangers but to a healthy and active mind! A man can find a spice of danger in by no means a deterrent. He could of course have left his employment but for Violet and her sisters and that follows left the place but after his arrival to Evans headquarters to which all the child agents were going it would have been difficult for him to traverse the country and crossed into Canada, and he thought too that the peril which he now ran was not much greater than would have been entailed by such a step. In the next place he was greatly attracted to the little princesses, and the orgies of the Glandelinians against them of what he had heard in the past had filled him with such horror, disgust and hatred that he would have risked much to save any of the princesses, even a stranger from their hands, and too he loved the little princesses now, and lastly he felt the fascination of the wild excitement of the times and congratulated himself that he should see and perhaps be an actor in the fierce and astonishing warfare which in this story was occupying the attention of the whole civilized world. And he a little forebore too. As he put these he arranged his own plans in the best he could. After seeing himself in safety he would take a room in some quiet locality if possible disguised as a Glandelinian boy scout or other and in that dress pass his days in the streets gathering every rumor and so forth and watching the course of the bloody battle and its events. Morning was just breaking when he heard the sound of yells as steady as a loud wind storm and the added sound of the wildest number of shots he had ever imagined to hear and in the lull of that crashing sound came the other clamor of the thread of many feet and yells as of confusion and panic, and looking out he saw a long wave of Christians retreating in panic from the camp borne along by an added wave of men in gray headed by two whose black scarfs showed them to be officers. The Glandelinians had delivered a frightful and surprise attack upon this quarter of the battle field and was winning a sweeping victory. Victory for now captured cannons were being swung round and opened upon the retreating masses and many tents were on fire. James saw several cannons being aimed upon the house and then they were fired. Balls hit the roof tearing off much and exploding below in the company streets. As they reached the entrance gate where a strong mob of Angelinian soldiery had been firing upon them blindly the Glandelinians stopped. A shell crashed in explosion some where inside the building and plaster fell all about James. He at once darted away to the long gallery and as he did so heard the sound of fierce firing elsewhere and the sound of loud banging against the gate. Scarcely had he reached the gallery when a door at the further end opened, and seven little figures the tallest carrying a lamp appeared. The little girls too had been keeping at hand, and they were dressed in the attire of Glandelinian gamuff in boys in a gamuff in boys so that at first James drew a pistol and cried

"Get back in that room there you'll not get away from here if I know it." "Why James thought you began Jennie in disdain and surprise thinking for the instant he had turned against them, but he interrupted; "By Heaven is it you and your sisters. How you fooled and scared me. I thought you were Glandelinians trying to interfere with my plans."

Little Daisy was weeping loudly for Penrod, but the elder little girls although their cheeks bore traces of the many tears they had shed during the night restrained them now. Or restrained them now. James quickly put up his pistol but his face was white at the fright he had received. When they reached James, the lad without a word, took the lamp from Jennie's hand, and led the way quickly along the corridor and down the stairs toward the back of the house. There was need of speed too for another shell crashed some where in the house tearing that part of the building to pieces and fire had broke out. "Everything was in the wild uproar of battle where the enemy in successful range as it was the noise of the conflict loud as it was with shells tearing up the structure here and there had not yet aroused the servants, and drawing the bolt carefully and putting out the lamp, James led the way into the garden behind the house. Then for a moment he paused in suspense. There was the sound of axes hewing down the gate which led from the garden into the company street from behind.

"For God's sake quick princesses!" he said. "There is no time to lose." He took the key out of the door closed and locked it after him. Then throwing the key among the thick shrubs, he took the hand of Daisy and Hettie the two youngest, and led the way rapidly toward the gate, which was fortunately a very strong one.

"In here princesses!" he said to Jennie pointing to some very thick shrubs close to the gate already covered thick with the spring grown leaves. "Those Glandelinians seeing the house is supposed to be defended will rush toward it from the rear where it is not defended. When the gate gives way and they pass out of sight we will slip out quietly."

For nearly twenty minutes, the gate which was strongly bound with iron and even stone resisted the attack upon it. Then there was a crash of thunder as if from a cannon and a solid shot struck the gate which was splintered and gave way with a crash, and a number of Glandelinian soldiers armed with torches and rifles poured in. Daisy and Hettie were clinging to Jennie and those who whirling to them to be calm and brave, pressed the young sisters close to them, while the others stood quiet and still on each side of James looking through the bushes. James had drawn two pistols in case of necessity. A great number of Glandelinian soldiers entered and a minute later there was the sound of battering at the door through which the fugitives had just sallied out.

Two Glandelinians stood as if on guard by the shrubbery but they were within easy reach of James who small as he was leaped like a wild cat and struck each a knock out blow on the head with his pistol butt before either one of them could attack him or cry out.

"Now said James let us be going."

Emerging from the shelter a few steps took them to the gate, and climbing over the door which lay in a heap on the ground, they turned into the lane just as the wreck of the house burst into such a flame that the light was thrown far.

"Let us run before the light betrays us." James said. "We must get out of this lane before the rest of the Glandelinians get here and before before men come here and question us."

They hurried down the lane took the first turning from the house, and then slackened their pace seeing that great fires lighted up the whole company street far and wide. Presently they heard a number of foot steps clattering on the pavement but fortunately they reached another turning before the party came up and just before they got hit by a shell that exploded in the company street. They turned down and stood up in a large doorway till the foot steps had passed, and then resumed their way to comforted by the loud din of battle.

"It is still too early for us to walk through the company streets to get to the army section once ruled by Evans without exciting attention." James said. "We had better make down the river to the river and wait there until there may be hopes of the battle being reversed."

In ten minutes they reached the river near the same ferry to which the Glandelinian had been brought who attempted to set the building on fire and arrested by Gertrude Angeline. James found a seat for them at the foot of a pile of lumber where they were entirely screened from observation. Hettie the little girl had not spoken a word since they had issued from the house. Daisy and Hettie were dazed and sad but not frightened by the events of the night. The only misery was that their brother was not with them and had hurried along one mechanically holding Jennie's hand, the other James. 'S. Jennie's brain was too full to talk, he thought was with her father and mother and the other two. And they wondered that Walter Starving had not come to them in spite of everything. Perhaps he was already on his way to Evans part of the army, perhaps in obedience to Penrod's orders he was in hiding too waiting the events of the battle or maybe he got his own boy and girl scouts on the move. That he could even have Penrod commended him have left the Christian lines as a fugitive without coming to see her and her sisters, did not even occur to Violet and her sisters as possible. With these thoughts the three mingled a vague wonder at the position she and her sisters were in. A few weeks hence since things had been all right and now she and her sisters petted and cared for as the best little girls of a noble Abbeysian only family now fugitives in the very streets of a Christian camp under the sole care of this strange American boy. It yet seemed to her wrong that Jim Groveton should be sent away by them after all and the assertion of James that he intended to stay and watch over her and her sisters seemed at once unusual and also absurd and presumptuous when they if really angel possessed should be able to take care of themselves as before in the face of any dangers whatever but she already felt that she had been wrong in that opinion and once Penrod said:

"In spite of being angel possessed sisters don't be rash or reckless. Remember the angels don't work miracles."

The decision in which James had at once taken the command from the moment he met them in the gallery and the quickness and coolness in which he had seized the only mode of escape had surprised and dominated her. And the shock she had received showed that when he drew a pistol on her and her sisters when mistaking them for enemies interfering with his plans showed that he had been also alert and prepared. Her own impulsive impulse when on opening the door she had heard the sound of the battle and the attack that was being made on the gate, was to draw back instantly and get herself and her sisters to hide in the cellar which would have been foolhardy as it would soon have been sure a death trap and it was due to James only that she and her sisters had got safely away. His hit her to although after the two incidents of the fights with the enemy, once in the child scout camp and in the woods, she had increased her love and respect for the strange boy and added great confidence and love friendship and regarded him as a boy some what in more intelligence than she and a brave hero despite her position as a prisoner. Indeed she had treated him and considered him as much younger than Penrod, and in good respects she had been justified in doing so for in his light hearted fun his love of active exercise and his shrewdness of any assumption of age he was far more boyish than Penrod or Jim even, but although her thoughts were too busy to permit her to analyze her feelings she knew that in some respects she had been mistaken, and felt a strange strong confidence in this lad who had so promptly and coolly assumed the entire command of the little party, and had brought them with such steady nerve through the danger. After placing the little girls in their shelter and arming them with weapons Jim had given them James had left them and stood leaning against the parapet of the quay as if carelessly watching the water but maintaining a vigilant lookout against approaching danger. The number of Glandelinian soldiers passed in increasing numbers but did not see him nor the little girls. Then soon there were no more soldiers in sight, and seeing that it was now safe to proceed, James returned to his companions. He had scarcely glanced at them before when he drew on them when mistaking them for foes, and now looked approvingly at their disguises which the little girls had during the long hours of the night devoted the most careful attention. Jennie had managed to make herself look like a boy older than herself. A few dark lines traced carefully on her forehead, at the corners of her eyes and mouth shaded added many years to her appearance, and she could have passed, except except to the closest observer as a small mother of her other six children or big brother rather, the dresses of the others being formed to make them look much younger than they really were. The hands and faces of the whole seven had been slightly tanned with brown to give them a sun-burned aspect in accordance with their customs and so complete as the transformation that the boy could scarcely suppress a start of great surprise as he looked at the group.

"No wonder," he said, "drew a pistol on you little girls in the gallery." Her hearing the talk of Glandelinian child scouts, I thought you were a gang of them who sneaked into the building to interfere with my plans. Had you been those instead I'd have killed you all in my intention to save you little girls like dogs. I have come to hate Glandelinians savagely. But I guess it would be safe now princesses to proceed. There are still plenty of Glandelinian soldiers about in the streets and there is now martial law, prisoners are captured but as the news had already no doubt been spread that the princesses have left the house it will be better for you not to keep together too long.

298 best for you not to keep together. I would suggest that the eldest of you should walk on with the youngest and you especially Jennie walk on with Hettie and your younger one and go on ahead. I will follow with Joice and Violet a hundred yards behind, so that I can keep you in sight, and will come up if any one should accost you. I got an American made revolver in my pocket besides the two pistols Jim gave me but the other is far better than a dozen of those and I could save you from a score of Glandelinians at once."

Jennie at once rose and taking Daisy's hand and Hettie's too set out but James cautioned her to go slow and not to look about at all but to pretend to pretend as if nothing was going on of interest. They had to traverse the greater part of the of the Christian camps to reach their destination and then the problem would be to get through. It was an unusual trial for Jennie, who never before had been in the company streets of the Christian lines to find them filled with exultant victorious Glandelinian soldiers. However she went steadily forward tightly holding her two youngest sisters by their hands and trying to walk as if accustomed to them in the thick heavy shoes which felt so strangely different to those which she had been in the habit of always wearing.

From time to time she addressed an encouraging consoling word to Daisy or Hettie as she felt them shrink from loudness as they approached groups of Glandelinian soldiers lounging outside of big captured tents, for there was little left for the Glandelinians to do in this part of the Christian lines and the Glandelinians when not fighting spent their time in some work or other in discussion of the events of the battle or joining in the moans which under one pretext or another kept the company streets in an uproar. Fortunately Jennie knew the way perfectly, and there was no occasion for her to ask directions, for she had frequently ridden through this section. And now she was approaching close to the division of the camp where she could make a new cut and get toward Evans main lines still unharmed by the battle though it too as fiercely attacked at some quarters as she could hear a loud sound of battle but the enemy here as not winning. He knew where Evans headquarters was and that her house keeper occupied the upper floor near the head quarters was in the north western part of the camp. A messenger on a swift footed horse in the north western part of the camp. A messenger on a swift horse had been sent to her on the night before, and she was on the look out for her visitors, but after they had gotten through but escaping under fire. She they were pursued all the way to Evans lines the Glandelinians trying their best to shoot the supposed boys down but couldn't hit or catch them. The Glandelinians were on horse too but the little girls directed by James went the way he said he putting up American way of being a fugitive so that he and the little girls managed to quickly surmount obstacles which the Glandelinians could not get their horses to even step on and so had to go all the way round.

In vain the Glandelinians who were the best crack shots of the regiment tried to bring the fugitive child down with their revolvers and rifles, and even flung hand grenades but you might as well have fired on empty air, or hurled hand grenades at nothing.

The pursuing Glandelinians were astounded and not believing the child was a armed pursued on, and on showing the utmost determination and some emergency in their efforts to try and capture the fugitives and tried all sorts of tricks but it was to no avail. Finally the boy and his charges reached the pickets of the Christian lines, and then as the pursuers saw the pickets they gave it up. Seeing that the eight little fugitives had been pursued by Glandelinians they opened fire but the Glandelinians escaped with only two losses. Then Violet and her sisters not only knew the counter sign but were able to prove who they were and whom the boy was, and indeed the soldiers thanked God that the little girls had escaped and tried to please the boy mainly but the boy only blushed and went on with the little girls until they reached the main Christian lines where they were well received and conducted toward General Evans headquarters. Mrs. Jerry was on the lookout for her little visitors and yet had a vague feeling of dread and heart sickness over her belief the little girls would not get through but finally when they did come she did not recognize them, and she uttered a cry of surprise and alarm as Jennie and her two smaller sisters entered the room.

"Is it you princess Jennie and you two youngest sisters," she exclaimed in great surprise, "and you my little angels! My eyes must be getting old indeed that I did not recognize you, but you are finely disguised. But where are the others and your boy friend James?"

"They will be here in a moment," said Louise, "they are just behind. But you must not call us princesses not even here, you must remember that we are just as we are supposed to be by our disguises, you are to act as our aunt and we you nephews, whom we have come to stay with. Glandelinian spies may be here too you know."

"I shall remember in time," the old woman said. "I have been talking about you to all the Christian soldiers around here for the last week, of how the situation situation stands, how good a father and mother are, and how you were going to you may to them and Penrod under the charge of my American who was your guardian and how you were going to look after me and help me in the house since I'm getting old and infirm and the younger ones were to stop with me till they were old enough to go out to service. To keep up that disguise you must do all that as if you were my helpmate. He is the rest of the little dream."

"He is as true as the rest," Jennie said. "Thank God and his blessed mother we have all got here safely. Oh how we had been persecuted but James knew what to do and made us do it so that it was fun more with our sisters than the dread of getting caught. This Louise is the young American boy who is going to be main here at present and to whom we are indebted for having got us safely here."

"And you mother, the dear old woman," Louise Jerry exclaimed. "The darling I remember, what of her and your beautiful good father?"

"The message I got last night that some danger threatened them."

"They have, but been compelled to move their family out of Big and Knoll and it is so obvious and Penrod has gone the road to go there to be with him and console him," said Jennie mournfully as she burst into tears feeling now that the strain was over and the natural reaction after her effort to be calm for her mother's sake for God's sake mostly she had held up to the last and so she had her sisters, and had tried even to make the parting seem all her boy and girl's own friends as easy as possible.

"The dirty Glandelinian skunks," the old woman said stamping her foot. "Old as I am, I feel I could tear some of them to pieces. But there is an old saying: 'Useless as a y and you must be faint with hunger if you have a horse ready on the big stove, a plate of beef that will do good to you and I know you little girls don't like it but a good strong dip of coffee will bring you back to normal and bring back your spirits.' And you see Madie-James, you will join me, hope?"

James was nothing loath for his appetite was always a hearty one. "It is as if I have been thinking it would be of some advantage if you would take a lodging for me. The little girls rather would have me stay in here but as you see I am a foreigner and it would excite suspicion should spies be here and in case this camp too would later on get shot up. If you would say that a little boy who is friends are known to you has arrived from the other part of the Christian camps to make his way to Grand Lines, and they have asked you to see a lodging for him, it will seem less strange than if I went myself. I should like it to be next so that you can come to me quickly should anything out of the way occur but I should like to look in some times to see that all is well. You could mention to the soldiers that I traveled up with the new nephews and nephews."

"I will do that willingly," the old woman said. "But first my dears you must have some rest; you come in here and she led the way to the next room. There is a bed for you Jennie, and more beds for the rest. The room is large and hot that you are accustomed to, but, dare not buy finer things, though I had plenty of money from your mother and father to have furnished the rooms like a palace but you see it would have seemed strange to any one, do not know when I do not know whether they are spies or not, but at least every thing is clean and sweet."

Leading the little girls who were worn out with weariness and anxiety to sleep she joined James.

"Now James the boy, I will do your business. It is a comfort to me indeed to tell you that some one will be next of whom I can seek advice for it is a terrible and most dangerous responsibility for an old woman in such a dreadful time as these when it seems to me that every one has gone mad at once. You will surely have good luck in being so good to those little girls. What sort of a chamber do you want?"

"Quite a small one," James answered. "Just such a chamber as a young boy on the lookout for employment within the Christian lines and with his pocket very slenderly lined would desire."

"Why wouldn't you desire to be inside of some tent for it is hard to find any such a room in a barracks," the old woman said. "There is a good empty tent a few yards away, and is being tenanted by a friend of mine, a young soldier, who was married to my daughter twenty years ago—it is a quiet tent and the soldiers are all Abolitionists and could be trusted, and will guard you well and help you help the little girls."

CHAPTER FIFTEEN.

A VERY ANXIOUS SITUATION THE EIGHTEENTH OF APRIL. VIOLET ARRESTED. FREE. THE PRINCESSES AND WALTER STARVING.

"That will suit me fine," James said. "I suppose there is no one else around or guards to be posted by so that I can go in and out without being noticed."

"If there will be guards around, but they won't bother you, as long as you are known, and you can go in and out as you like. You could command one to accompany you and he would obey."

Half an hour later the matter was settled, and James was installed in his tent, which was scantily furnished, the tent opening looking into the street in front. James and the little girls had bought bundles of clothes with them in their flight as it would have looked strange going through the captured camps had they gone through without any clothing since they were there. They had not been bothered while trying to go through the camps but in their endeavor to leave to go to Grand Lines was where the trouble and pursuit started. For the Glandelinians had declared martial law and no one was allowed to leave camp. James had bought with him only underclothes, as he had heard of nothing else that would be of service to him now. No sooner had he put on his jacket than he went out to a quarter-master's tent to get a shirt and put on a suit for his army working child scout boys. This he did in his tent and dressing himself in it went out side and set out to get his things across the camp and get into the camp which had been captured.

He had some difficulty to get in but as he presented a sort of pass to the Glandelinian picket he got through with out difficulty for Glandelinians unless you are fighting against them they usually do not molest foreigners of any kind who the Christians do not molest. He was with only the States of Anglinia. He pretended that he was interested in the capture of a certain house belonging to the Glandelinian soldiers and saying that he wanted a little booty for his invalid sister at home (he really had one) asked if he could get any thing and that he would be allowed to join in the raid. A soldier looked the boy over and said:

"Do you know anything about those Vivian and Princesses boys?"

"Only what I have heard of them," said the boy.

"No kid but, have heard lots about them. Though I, as a Glandelinian I'm human and am glad they escaped, but come if you want something I'll show you the way to the house. But be civil to the soldiers and do not ask questions."

Then he finally made his way to the mansion of the Princesses. He found a crowd of soldiers going in and out. Those leaving the house were laden with articles of furniture (for they had put the fire out), clocks, pictures, bedding and other things and one soldier was carrying out a picture with the little Princesses dressed at their best standing in a line. He was going to throw the picture into a fire when James asked the soldier to stop.

"Oh you want this picture? Well that'll serve me for going to the bonfire. Here take it and get something else and take it home. You are welcome to anything you want."

James was glad to have it for he wished to preserve it if possible for the little girls. A complete sack of the building was indeed taking place. The servants had all fled, and the mob of soldiers had taken possession of the house.

The lofty mirrors too heavy to carry were smashed into a thousand fragments, the costly hangings were torn down, and after the Glandelinians had destroyed much of the beautiful furniture, every man and boy scout of the enemy began to lay hands upon what ever they fancied, and the country man in London was already stripped of the greater part of its belongings. Fortunately all this stuff was not the property of Violet and her sisters as the enemy supposed for the little girls were always sick enough to place their own personal belongings where they were positively sure they would not even be known to exist by the enemy. So this loss would only be to the ones who formerly owned the house. But he himself was dead having been killed on the battlefield at Cedar Nine and his wife was in the insane asylum having lost her reason for the loss of her husband. With his hands in his pockets (hot pocket), whistling carelessly James entered the building, and wandered carelessly from room to room (boom boom) watching the proceedings and trying to get his eyes upon something that he too could carry off. It was his purpose mostly to try and salvage some thing of smaller value but of more importance for the little girls, and at the same time if he did not go and take something he would surely place himself under suspicion as it is of the order of those to raid. Several barrels of wine had been brought up into the wrecked salon, and around these were gathered already a mob of drunken men, singing shouting and drinking.

"Drink, drink I kid you a foreigner not a christian dog drink for christian dog s won't drink," a soldier said, holding a silver goblet full of wine toward him. "Drink disaster and confusion to the christian dog s, and down with liberty and freedom to child slaves. Hail with child slaves."

James drank the toast without hesitation and even helped himself to two more but in his heart he drank the same word to the gladiolians three times invoking God and the urge is to back up his purpose; and then he sat sick at the destruction and ruin, wandered out again into the street. He had found nothing except the picture that he could save. Clothing and stuff that would not do. Knowing too the anxiety which Violet and her sisters would be suffering as to the safety of Walter Starling he next took his way toward the place where Walter Starling had had his headquarters. It was a big tent. The tent was shut up but groups of gladiolian soldiers were standing in the road opposite talking. Sauntering a long James stopped near enough to one of these to hear what they were saying, and having taken a small bottle of brandy along with him for a ruse and having taken enough wine to make him feel it a little which was a case of necessity he pretended he was slightly drunk. He learned that the child scouts an under Walter Starling had all gone to Evans own army where they were joined by all others in so strong a body that it seemed dangerous to attack the army there in case the three child scouts could join in. All had been effected quietly and the child scouts had either taken all with them or destroyed what they could not take along, and had set fire to all their own tents so the enemy could not be in possession. Guards had been left but side of the tent partly it was said that in order the tent might be preserved from pillage and to be used for public purposes for the enemy, partly that the boy scout leader Walter Starling who was absent and yet had not gone off with the scouts might be arrested when he returned. As James knew that the boy scout had other quarters in the neighborhood he thought it probable that Walter Starling might have gone thither, and he at once proceeded toward the gate, by which he would enter on his return thence. He sat down a short distance outside the gate and watched patiently. A gladiolian soldier passed him and unconsciously James was holding the bottle.

"Give me a drink or of that will you?"

"No get it yourself over there," said James. "I had a hard time to get it and I need it."

"Stingy for you rage you little American big," said the soldier angrily. That aroused James not bluffing but really for what American would take such an assault as that.

"Call me an American pig will you," said the boy and he flung the bottle at the man narrowly missing the fellow's head. The soldier would have done something but other soldiers came up and one demanded:

"Here what is the matter?" He was a sergeant.

"I won't be insulted just because I'm a foreigner," said the boy. "He called me an American pig because I wouldn't give him a swallow of snapp s."

"But it is your quarters," commanded the sergeant. "No fighting with boys here John."

"Well the brat tried to hit me with the bottle."

"Served you right if he had. Get a long."

The men obeyed and the little boy was left sitting there still smarting under the insult. Soon there was no one in sight and presently he perceived a boy approaching on horseback. He back disguised as a gladiolian scout and from descriptions of him at once recognized it was Walter Starling. James went forward on to the road and held out his arms but first looking to see that no soldiers were about. The young boy scout leader not recognizing him, did not check his horse, and would have ridden him down had he not jumped aside at the same time drawing a sabre, and James had to avoid a swing. At the same time shouting to him by name to stop.

"What in the heck do you want and what do you mean stopping me when I'm in a hurry kid?" Walter exclaimed angrily, reining in his horse.

"You do not recognize me?" James said. "I'm no gladiolian but James Andrew whom you brought to the princesses, and I am here to warn you of the danger of proceeding."

"Why what has happened?" Walter exclaimed anxiously "and why are you in this disguise James?"

"The gladiolians have captured this camp and driven the soldiers of your country out of it and as you have stayed behind when you scouts went off the gladiolians are waiting inside and out side your tent to capture you as you enter."

Walter looked aghast and then uttered an exclamation of anger. "I am glad I did sent all the regiments of child scouts away to safety," he said. "When my own father had no doubt received a warning of what was about to happen, and yesterday at noon he requested me to have all my child scouts and all the other regiments hasten to his army under Evans before the attack came upon this sector. I wondered at his advising me so suddenly, and feeling uneasy did as he advised. This accounts for it. He knew that if the child scouts remained there nothing would have induced me to separate myself from them if they were fiercely and disasterously attacked by too great a number of foes while by having me advised to send them away he left it for me to do as I thought fit after a while, trusting that when I found they were all safe it might follow the council he had urged upon me, to make my escape to take charge of the princesses. But they too want me to make my escape if possible to Emperor Vivians army. How about the Vivian gladiolians?"

Then he added that they have been wrecked and aided, but they are safe with the other old House keepers. Quise Jerry, this is their address. The soldiers disguised as a midget man and her sisters are disguised as gladiolians but look younger and no suspicion will I hope arise as to their real position in case that camp is carried before I can convey them away again. Tim himself conveyed his boy and gladiolians out last night not that he thought it probable they would be included in the disaster as they were strong enough in numbers to do wonders but he said there was no knowing how things the gladiolians might go, and thought it better they should be over at Evans army to incur less the number of child scouts there and should disappear altogether from this sector for the present until God will a division comes up and captures this camp. Jack and Jane also went away with the scouts though I heard they had to fight and shoot their way through with some loss. After seeing the little princesses in safety this morning, I went down to see what had happened at your tent in order to assuage Princess Violet, and her sisters anxiety respecting your safety and found as I expected, that all the child scouts had been gone, and learned that a party were waiting inside and out side your tent to arrest you on your return.

"I am very thankful to you indeed my boy," he said "and most warmly. But I do not know what in the world to do. It is impossible for me to get out of the christian lines. My father is most anxious that I get to Emperor Vivians but I cannot go so long as Violet, and her sisters are in danger."

"If you try to escape from the lines as you are," James said "you are certain to be captured. You only chance would be to disguise yourself as I have done, and take a small lodging somewhere where you might live and act as a gladiolian boy scout unobserved."

"And in that way I can see Violet and her sisters sometimes," James said. "Poor girls. How I wish they must feel for their father. And yet I received a letter from him yesterday. He is dreadfully worried; that they did not come. I will try and see them at any risk."

"You could do so James agreed in a somewhat hesitating way. "But it would greatly add to their danger and to you're more still, and were you detected might lead to the discovery of their disguise, and even could succeed in saving them then you would be in greater peril. Besides the thought that you were liable to capture at any time would naturally heighten the anxiety from which they are suffering as to the loss of the father and the brothers. As dear old Walter, reminds me of the grief that came to them when that boy scout was killed who resembled you so much they thought it was you, and you was far away. Don't let them be grieved more. Be careful, little girls and you too like them ought not to suffer this. Be careful for you and their sake. I hate to see a tear in their eyes."

"But I cannot and will not run away and leave them there in danger," Walter said passionately. "The enemy won't capture me and would not have even if you were not here to warn me. Had I come and seen soldiers in front of my tent, I would have bolted and had they pursued I could have grounded them of my tent, I would have enough in my bag here to ground a whole camp."

"It would be sinful for me to advise you to do so," James replied. "I would only suggest that after seeing Violet and her sisters once if you can get the way with me you should lead them some how to believe that you have decided making for Emperor Vivians army and they will therefore have the happiness of believing that you are safe, while you are still near and watching over them. This probably we can both together work hand in hand in saving them from these gory-canted demons."

"That is all very well," Walter said "But what opinion would they have of me if they thought me capable of deserting them that way? I cannot do it no sir. If you would represent yourself in her opinion it would be but temporarily orders, and besides if you did suffer in her opinion it would be but temporarily for when she and her sisters learned the truth, that you had only pretended 303 to leave in order that their position might be entered and that their minds might be relieved, they could only think more highly of you. Do not believe you may be in danger of facing any firing squad on the charge of desertion they would not be that way having known you so long. Besides if necessary you could at any time present your self to them, then."

"You council all seems good James yet at any cost, will not follow I t it I know those little girls better than you do, and their father would pay dearly if they thought he deserted them no matter how great the sacrifice, so would any one amongst themselves or even their brothers or fathers if they thought I deserted them I'd be a prisoner in ten minutes. Then if I couldn't prove my innocence I'd be facing a firing squad two two days later. As you say I can at any time appear but I'm not going away. I'm going to try my best to get to General Evans line and stay there. If the battle rages there again and the foe starts to win I know what to do, put I'll not do anything else I will not pretend anything. Good as those little girls are God help those they suspect double crossing them. Think for instance of their wicked brother Germania Vivian. He's their brother and he but what they would give to get their hands on him. Where are you lodging? I will try to get to Evans line and take a room near and we can meet and compare notes and act together. I know how to get the re. I can make it. There is no such thing as can't."

James seeing he could not turn the boy about leader from what he feared to be a move gave him his address.

"But you can't lodge with me," said James. "There is a house nearby only a two story affair you have only to walk upstairs to the top story. My tent is directly opposite the house. But you must not come as you are. Disguise like I do, and if you like I'll tell them you are there."

"I will call on you to morrow if possible," Walter said. "I will ride my horse a few miles back and turn him loose in some quiet place, and buy at the first village not in possession of the foe the same sort of disguise you have on."

"I think," said James "that would be unwise. Walter it would look strange for a boy of your kind to make such a purchase. You might be at once arrested, or a report of the circumstances might be sent into the foe lines and lead to your discovery. If you will wait here for half an hour, I will go some where and try to secure a copy of the things you want at the first shop I come to within this camp if Glandelinians will sell me anything of the like. As you are of my size I can pretend I want them for my self. Then I can bring them out to you. Then you can ride back and loose the horse as you propose, but I should advise to you to hide the saddle and bridle as well as the clothes you are now wearing care fully. No one finds you who will probably appropriate it and will say nothing about it, so that all claw to you raiments will be lost, and it will be supposed you have ridden far away."

"Good James, you sure seem to have a head ready for all emergencies. That's you Americans all over I know what a high opinion not only the princesses but all of the boy scout leaders and privates had of you, and I perceive that it is fully justified, and considering myself as fortunate indeed in having you for a friend in such a time as at present."

"We have need of all our wits," James said quietly. "They and their dear brother were good enough to accept my offer to do all that I could to look after the safety of the little girls, and if I fail in my trust it will not I hope be from any lack of care or courage. We Americans are invincible and cannot be conquered. We in our wars have licked nations ten times our size as hostily as history proved. I'll yet show Glandelinians what Americans can do. And I got a grudge against them too. One of them called me an American pig."

The meeting had taken place at a point where it could not be observed from the gate, and the boy scout general withdrew a few hundred yards away while James went to look for a quartermaster's store in possession of the enemy as he expected it would be. Though he bought it from Glandelinians the boy had no difficulty in purchasing the clothes required by the boy general and returned with them in little less than a quarter of an hour and then having seen Walter start riding a side off, he sauntered back into the main section, and made his way toward the out skirts of the camp heading in the direction of Evans army. As long as he was a foreigner and had a pass the Glandelinian picket let him go without questioning, though they wondered what he was going to do with the "silly picture". Crossing the river he found a vast crowd gathered in front of a large country house that looked like a hotel.

The who the news of the whole sale success that the foe had made every where during the night had filled all these Glandelinians with joy and the air was full of shouts of "down with the Christian dogs". "Vive Demons", "Vive every thing else. Hawkers were seen as lying in the crowd Glandelinian news papers and broad sheets filled with the foulest attacks, couched in the most shocking and horrible language upon the Christian papers and Emperors, and charging the Vivian girls as being black headed little cowards because they fled to "save themselves" from the Christian lines. At various points Glandelinian soldiers mounted upon steps or the pedestals of statues arranged the mob of Glandelinian soldiery, while from time to time the crowd of soldiery opened respectfully and made way for members of the Glandelinian military council, who were cheered and shouted according to their supposed sentiments for or against the persecution of Violet and her sisters. After remaining there for some time James made his way to the entrance of the Glandelinian military assembly. A crowd of Glandelinian soldiers and officer officers were gathered there, and a tremendous rush was made when the doors were opened. James managed to force and elbow his way in, and sat for some hours listening to the debate, which was constantly interrupted by the soldiers and Glandelinian boy and girl scouts in the galleries, who applauded with loud insane frenzy the speeches of their favorite orators, the deputies of the army, and howled and yelled when some thing was said not in their favor. It was late in the evening before the sitting was over, and James was unable to leave his place earlier. Then he went and had supper at a wine shop and after re-entering on the company streets until they began to be deserted and the army was moving on to support those still attacking the Christians who had been driven into a strong position far beyond the camp, for the report of battle had been heard widely all day, the boy again crossed the river and made his way to the same mansion. Not a light was to be seen in the windows and all was silent and dark. The great door stood open. The work of destruction was complete the house was stripped of everything that could be carried away. James made his way to the bedroom where Violet and her sisters used to sleep. The massive bedsteads still stood in their places having defied the efforts of destruction which had proved successful with the cabinets and other heavy furniture. Sitting down on the floor James counted the boards beneath one of the beds, and then taking out a strong knife which he had always carried with him he inserted it by the side of the middle board and tried to raise it. It yielded without difficulty to his efforts.

As soon as it was lifted he groped in the cavity below, and his hand soon came in contact with the heavy heavy bag. Taking this out and putting it beneath his blouse, he replaced the board and made his way down the stairs. He felt too weak and fatigued to walk across the main camp again and the efforts made his way down to the river and curled himself up for the night at the foot of the wood pile where the little girls had found shelter for the morning, and in spite of the novelty of the situation, fell instantly asleep.

It was broad day light when he awoke, and an hour or two later he regained his lodgings, stopping by the way to breakfast at a quiet mess hall, frequented by the better class of Glandelinian soldiery who were Quartermasters many of whom laughed and joked about the fact that the princesses got away one of them saying: "Good thing. I don't favor the doings of the others at all. As against children. What a crazy notion." As when he called out the day before he was so fortunate in meeting no one as he made his way to his own tent after a three hour travel from the new Glandelinian camp, to Evans lines which still was not yet reached. In the morning the first step was to get up a board from the tent floor and deposit beneath it the bag of money. Then after having changed his clothes he went out and made a variety of purchases for house keeping as he did not wish always to be obliged to take his meals at places where any one sitting at table with him might enter into conversation that he did not like. His Abbeinnian was quite good enough to pass in the saloon of the princesses but his ignorance of the Glandelinian slang spoken among the soldiery and boy and girl scouts would have rendered it very difficult for him to keep up his assumed character amongst them even though he was a foreigner and would have needed all the fabrication of all sorts of stories as to his birth place and past history, why he was here and what he was doing and so forth. Although in the position in which he was placed James felt that it would be impossible always to adhere to the truth and that a life of complicity was no sin he shrank from any falsehood that could possibly be avoided.

His first duty in order to carry out the task he had undertaken was to keep up his disguise and this must be done even at the cost of telling lies as to his antecedents and why he was here and so forth but he was determined that he would avoid this unpleasant necessity as far as lay in his power. At nine o'clock he made his way to the apartment of Mrs. Louise Jarry, his entry was received with a cry of satisfaction from the little girls.

"What is the news James?" Jennie exclaimed. "We expected you here yesterday evening, and sat up until ten o'clock, and that is that you got wrapped up in your arm."

"I was over the other side of the river discharging the mission you and you date - a had confided to me, and did not get back till this morning. I presume preserved this picture of you and your sister from the glandelinians in possession of your head quarters."

"I knew he was presented by something," Jennie said triumphantly. "I told you no police department didn't find you feared he had been captured and had been killed."

"Yes Jennie dear - I was mistaken to be impatient and feel some but you will forgive me James. You can guess how; and my sister's suffered yesterday?" "It was surely natural you should have expected me. I said I was after a while afterward that I did not tell you little girls when I let you that I should not be able to come in the evening, but indeed I did not think of it at the time."

"And now for you - we have James." Jennie asked impatiently. "Have you learned anything from our Father and Mother?"

"I am sorry to say I have not, except that from the conversation of the glandelinians they seem sort of apprehensive as your parents must be moving from the place and know with immense armies to come down here and strike the glandelinians a blow. But don't worry. They'll get here sooner or later and run your enemies out of the country. But I have good news for you girls. After going first to your deserted head quarters and finding it in the possession of a heinous mob of glandelinian soldiers, who were plundering and drinking. I went to see what had taken place at the headquarters of Walter's gang. I found that all the regiments of child soldiers had gone! I learned that Walter's gang was absent and that a party of soldiers were within and without and without in readiness to capture him on his return. Thinking it probable that he might have gone else where I went out beyond the gate on that road and waited for him. I had the good fortune to meet him to warn him of his danger and preventing his return to his own head quarters. He rode away with a disguise similar to my own which I procured for him and was to enter general James's army camp in the evening. He is to call on me at ten o'clock if he can get here, and I will then conduct him. He thought it best to come in before I let you know that he was coming."

Violet and her sisters burst into tears of gratitude and happiness at hearing that their best friend whom they loved more than a girl loves her lover had escaped from the dangers that threatened him. Born out by the fatigues and anxiety of the previous night and their loneliness in the dark and also their parents, they had not succeeded in sleeping except for only two hours after reaching the shelter of the old housekeeper's roof; she herself having lain awake all night thinking over the danger of all those dear to her and her sisters, and the far away father, mother and brothers. They were now completely convulsed to recover some with the revelation of feeling.

"You are a dear baby James even though a foreigner," Jennie said with frank admiration, while Joice sobbed out exclamations of gratitude for causing suspicion through her arms around you and kiss you if it was not for fear of causing suspicion. "You do seem to think about everything, and now poor Joice will know that Walter is safe, I do hope she and the others are going to be more like her self. As I tell her they cannot check the advance of father and mother who through Fenrod's direction will come to our help in time. Mama said we must be brave through all things, and at any rate, I try to be, and so does Daisy and Nettie, though they do cry sometimes and oh we feel so lonesome. Fenrod was best protector and with him away we feel so sad and oh so scared. And now I hope Joice and my other dear sisters will be cheerful too and not go about the house looking so down cast and wretched. I should have thought poor Joice would have been the last person to be down cast for no one is so powerful as being a brave girl then she is, but she is the most down cast of us all."

"I shall try to be better now Jennie," Joice said, but she couldn't even so much as try and force a smile and she wiped away her tears. "We ain't scared of the enemy James dear - what we may go through because of the foe in the future. We don't dare danger but this sorrow of parting. Father and mother so far away, brothers still further, Fenrod gone, and a cruel traitor brother-in-law get him a prisoner - it'll go hard with him. But you my sisters if I can help it shall not have any reason to complain of me in the future."

"While this conversation is on the house raised by the foe once occupied by the little girls is now possessed by demons whose ever-wicked foe soldiers follow demons come."

"Put do you think James?" Jennie went on with a return of her own anxiety that it is very dangerous for Walter to come back to the camp I know that his father has long been praying him to make for my father's army." "I do not think it is very dangerous at present Jennie. I think though it maybe better if this fighting battle continues and the foe successes goes on and this part of the camp set in danger, but I hope that when he has once seen you little girls, he will carry out his father's wishes and make for you."

father's army for his presence here (an even more chance you danger and can be of no utility. I told him so but he feared of losing you. He says it is desperation."

"In a case of his own opposition with his father it is different," said Joice. "I wouldn't tolerate desperation even from my best loved ones and neither would my sister, but if he does this for us - I don't want him to increase his own danger for us, when it would do no good for him or us and he must carry out his father's wishes. We'll make him. It is not desperation. He must not get that foolish idea into his head. I am sure he would be found out if the battle raged here and became successful for the enemy which I am afraid will happen and he never could make himself look like a foreigner."

"Why shouldn't he?" Jennie said insistently. "James does, and he is just as good looking as Walter despite his foreign features."

"What a little champion you are Jennie to be sure. You got the angel possession all over you, can see it now. (James looked closely to make sure and felt a sudden awe and strange feeling, he seemed transfixed and more lovely than ever in her excitement) But in some respects Jennie dear you are quite a right. Clothes after all do go a long way in making either a boy or a man or a soldier. Still although I think it is very dangerous for James, I think it will be more dangerous for Walter, because you see I he is an Abolitionist and he has the manner and ways of our own old race, and would find it more difficult to pass himself off as a foreigner than James, who has got something of a foreigner."

"Enough now," James put in laughing. "Don't be afraid to let it be a prince, I won't feel insulted. The American are sure rough, rougher than any people of any nation and fighters too and you are quite a right, but roughness comes to advantage now and I may need to use it and be a rough neck. A glandelinian called me an American pig yesterday and it was just good luck for him that I didn't throw straight at him, there was a bottle at his head. I can assure you little angels is that with those thick shoes on I find it quite natural for me to stoop along as a American boys do, and it will be much more difficult for Walter, who being of the military always rides on - walks with his head thrown back, and yet a sort of strong air of looking down on all wicked things as a child does a dirty tasting medicine bottle."

Jennie herself smiled a little through her own tears. "That is a fair report. Walter is a bit of a coward and a coward. And my sister shall order him to go, and if he won't obey his father's wishes because for fear of thinking we'll believe he deserted us, he will have to go for us. If he won't for us then we'll cry. He hates to see us cry like poison."

"I think Princess Violet, if you are the leader," began James and then looked at her sisters.

"Yes," smiled Jennie "we do her bidding at everything as she is the clever head of us all."

"Well then," continued James it would be wise for Walter's gang to wait you else where than here as we cannot tell how many and what spies may be here. The arrival of seven little girls to stop with Mrs. Jerry is sure to attract plenty of attention among secretly disguised glandelinian spies and if they cannot capture you they may try to assassinate you. That is the plot I overheard since you escaped with me. You then will be the subject of being watched on and covered. My visit will no doubt be noticed and it will be as well that there should be more material for talk. If all soldiers here in this army were Christians it would be well but God knows spies are here in disguise. No doubt this grand section of the army has so far escaped a disastrous attack at all, but spies may be here and be on a sharp lookout for you and your sister sisters. I should propose that if you have no objection to such a course that you should stroll out with your sisters and your housekeeper through the fields to St. Dennis for a while. We can keep a sharp lookout from my window and follow you at a distance until we get clear of any observation beyond the gates. If I see you are followed by any suspicious person don't be alarmed if I open fire and shoot him like a rat. Americans are that way."

Joice and her sisters first looked at each other and then they looked at Mrs. Jerry who nodded.

"That would be the best plan my little dears. What James says is very true."

The less chance we give the shadowing spies if there are any to see you and watch you the better, for though your disguises are good, glandelinians as you know from your own experiences can read through many disguises, and if sharp eyes are watching you they may note something in your walk or sound of voices that may excite a suspicion. They couldn't dare do anything else but then if they had a chance and got you little girls without protection they'll play you like the devils they are."

"That being arranged, then you must excuse me for it is just the time the boy general was to arrive and I fancy that he will be before then than the other behind time--so I must be going." And he kissed the hands of each. But little Catherine and then Hattie too instead of the new hair--arm--around his neck and kissed him to his surprise. He then returned the embrace and then reluctantly left blushing and nevertheless from the love and pleasure of it all. Indeed upon reaching the door of his room James found a strange standing there. It was about his size and thinking at first it might be a foe he drew his pistol and cried:

"What are you doing in here, spy?"

"Oh it's your friend James. I'm Walter Starling." James at once put up the gun for he recognized the voice.

"It is you friend James?" said James "but I got to be careful. I didn't recognize you in that make up and though some one invited my tent. How long have you been waiting?"

"I have been here a half an hour and began to be afraid that something might have happened to you and to imagine all sorts of things. I knew, fooled you with my disguise and to give the mistake. My but your face turned white as I met seeing me. I knew you'd draw at instant notice."

"It is still the same old friend James?" said James "but the time we agreed upon Walter?" James said in loud voice for at this moment one of the doors opened and a woman who seemed to be a servant came out with a basket on her arm and he did not like her looks.

He started to stand the two and James rose to meet;

"Have on, I'll call soldiers."

He obeyed with reluctance and James continued:

"I have been looking about as usual but without luck so far up the way they told me the battle is raging something awful along a forty mile front and the Germans are getting alarmed for the Nationalists will start a reverse. I suppose you have had no better fortune in your search for two?" He had by this time unlocked the door and the two entered together.

"I must call you by your Christian name Walter and will do so if you don't mind when alone as at other times otherwise the title might slip out accidentally. Will you on your part call me only and tell me you know the principles and their parents and brothers called me only James which is the ordinary way in America of calling any one whose name is James or John or so on that is unless he is a sort of a fellow, but I must ask them to call me Andrew. And now, James would never do here because it is too much of a saint's name no let me see no is Andrew an apostle of our Lord. Call me Henry. No that can't go either and I can't think of a name to be called so just name me 'personal'."

"Have you seen them?" was Walter's first question.

"I have just left them Walter and if you look out from that window into the company at west you will in a few minutes see them also they are just going for a ramble. Walter and the boy-titled women of St Dennis, and we will slowly follow them. The man with a wicked look in his eyes he drew out his American made forty five revolver with some they 're shadows by any suspicion persons this will come in handy." He added but, thought it safer not to attract attention by going to the house house and I also thought it would be more pleasant for you to talk to the little girls and their father (Jennie) he wink winked at Starling at the word father--out the rain the fields near the works, than in a little room with us present. In fact too I didn't like the looks of that old woman. I don't believe she is a woman. If she follows let me know."

"Much more pleasant indeed, was wondering if I should get an opportunity opportunity for a few minutes talk alone with them."

They both took their places at the open window and leaned out apparently chatting and watching what was passing in the company street and listening to the roar of distant battle. From what they could see it seemed that the distant encampments captured by the enemy was now under heavy shell fire for thunderous reports came from that direction in a lively fashion of reports and crashing sounds that was bewildering and a great cloud of smoke hid the scene. A quarter of an hour later they saw the house keeper and the little girls come out of the house.

"We had better come away from the window now," James said "The youngest of the principles might look up and then might look up and nod without thinking and with so many eyes we know nothing of we can't be too careful."

They waited three or four minutes to allow the others to get well shrouded and then started out after them, they walked fast until they caught sight of the others and then kept some distance behind until the party had left the inner section of the camp and were out among the fields which lay between the encampments and the artillery positions of the Christian line. The road was in the distance a double row of great cannons and a position in advance for machine guns too and it looked as if an assault upon this position if it came would be a rank suicide on the part of the enemy but they carried at original positions of artillery than before.

They then quickened their pace and were soon up with them. The greeting between Walter Starling and the little girls was a silent one, few words were spoken but their faces expressed their joy and meeting again after the perils through which they had passed; there was a little pause, and then James as usual seeing the old woman coming on from behind took the lead.

"Will it be all right to St Dennis and back with the youngest of the little girls, Mr. Jerry can sit down on that assessment over there, and go on with her knitting; you or our good Walter can ramble on with Joice and Violet and Jennie by that path through the field, we will agree to meet here again in an hour and for God's sake don't do anything suspicious for I don't like that old woman at all. I'll tell you two over the top. Keep your eye on her and don't do anything or say anything she'll hear. I'm going to try a ruse and capture her if possible and find out who she is. I'll act as to make her follow me."

This arrangement was carried out, Daisy Hattie and the others really enjoyed their walk, thinking their disguise was great fun, and being naturally little mischiefs and being used to disguises imitated so well the walk and manner of a woman in child that that Angelina and James were greatly amused. He had warned them strictly however not to look back at any time, though he himself would slyly watch the old woman with the basket of flowers.

"Maybe the poor old woman is all right and only wants to sell some flowers to some body," said Angelina shyly for she was loved and respected the aged as all good children do.

"It's not the case of being an old woman," said James "but of a really. I suspect old people because my aunt and grandmother are noble old people but I don't believe that is an old woman. She tried to overtake something I said to Starling and I believe she's a German spy and a man disguised as an old woman. If I can play a trick on her I might. I might let her come up and sell some flowers and then pull her on that shawl if it turns out to be a man I'll either shoot or call for help."

"None of these I like this too James," Angelina said. "I have often been among peasant girls and so have my sisters and even dressed like them. We have always found it joyful to be able to walk and do and do just as you please without committing sin but though our military bearing it is hard to forget not to hold my head up, and we almost forget not to swing our arms, and we walk much too sedately for our safety though that is the proper manner of good people. But on its hateful now when we are in such peril and it is what makes the enemy recognize us through our disguises and we never thought of that. Once when we were disguising ourselves and yet complained to Giggles because of their no often discovered he said almost hotly:

"It is you traitor principles. Don't hold up your heads, and swing your arms, act like peasant or German child men do and for Heaven's sake when within the lines don't walk so confounded sedately. That is the complete give away. And don't let your voices out so sharp, try to disguise them. That is more a give away than the others especially to the enemy who know you so well."

"Might we not do a little cunning might not we asked Hattie. "It would do us a lot of good and yet throw off suspicion upon that lady that is following following. I got a sight of her and, don't like her either."

"Oh by the way girls please call me the name 'personal' now, for spies may happen to know or notice directly if you happened to say my name while any one were near. Both my names come after the St. James and Andrew you know and my middle name even is Peter."

"I like the saint names best," Angelina said "but of course I should not say it before any strangers, but may we do a little cunning just once?"

"Certainly you may--unail you like," James laughed "You and your sisters can make to those cannons and back as often as you like for an hour while you do I'll try to trick that woman. If she is only a true hearted old lady I'll beg pardon afterwards. But I won't be followed by spies. I kill who shadows me in these times."

Came on girls came on little Daisy flows "Angelina cried as she started and the four dear little human flowers ran at full speed toward the cannons, Angelina however being the biggest completely distancing her sisters. They were then smiling when James came up. He had seen no sign of the woman and wondered where she went. He really didn't know it, it was his own dear mother in disguise. She wanted to see if he was really doing good to the poor little principles. Let him hope even by mistake that he won't turn on his poor mother."

"That ain't the first time I ever ran a race," Angelina said. "I have often in my earlier days have wished to try how fast I can run, and I believe so much of my running and my sister's too doing it has often saved us from even pursuing soldiers on foot. I don't know how it is my younger sisters did not run fast as they usually could. What's the matter sisters, you look so played out too and so red in the face."

"Daisy has more flesh," James said smiling and so has Hattie. "They carry weight too as we should say in America, while you being some what bigger have nothing to spare."

"and she is three years older than even I am" said Catharine. "but it never did make a difference before. Something must be wrong with us and yet we do not feel anything wrong."

miles he said while he could only stand it a mile.
 "Yes Hettie agreed frankly. We too have walked and walked and rode horses over and over so far without stopping and have got tired, while once we rode took a long hike with us and got so awfully tired and so sore on the feet we had to get the loan of a horse from a farmer to bring him back to camp. The soldiers said Penned has not been trained to let like we have and we believe it. He is a little better now and we hope he'll improve.
 He is a better horse back rider than we are though and better at any weapon.
 But when it comes to hiking or running that get a him."

"Here are you children going and who are you?" demanded the sergeant in charge. By their very looks and abrupt appearance violent sisters saw they were real Angelinian soldiers and not spies, and to avoid trouble by mistake Angelina proved their identity.

"By gad the lad may be right. Where are you little girls + residing?"

James and his little charges walked next to the left end of the battery, and though meeting with lots of soldiers and attracting the curious gaze of the artillery men and other gunners they then turned and reached the point where the party had separated a few minutes before the passing of the appointed hour. The four little girls ran away to Mrs. Jerry, and he chatted to her gently while James walked up and down until a quarter of an hour later, Walter, Starling and the three other little girls made their appearances. The party stood talking together for a few minutes, then adjourned with very tearful and pale faces, but with firmness on the part of Walter and the little girls, and then the princesses with Mrs. Jerry turned their faces to camp while James and Walter remained behind until they got well on their way. Violet and her sisters had not gone far as the two noticed when a party of soldiers on horse back stopped them from proceeding forward, the leader being a lieutenant riding up his horse. Finding disaster was taking the little girls the boys were about to draw when Walter, Starling recognized the leader. It was Frederick Parker one of his best friends. They saw Violet show some papers which the officer looked at then when which he returned with apologies showing that he too had been mistaken as to the little girls identification.

"I am sure it is better so," James said. "The poor little girls will have anxiety enough to harass to help their parents and brothers being so far away. It is well that their mind should be at least once concerned you."

"Not much risk I hope," James agreed, but there is no saying, what stringent steps these spies may take as times go on."

The y were startled by the question and looking round saw a strange boy scout in Abbotian uniform standing there and he had a pistol in his hand. "I have been watching you for quite a while since those little begamiffins left you. Are you spied?"

"That is well and good, let me see your passes and paper papers."

The boy saluted and went on.
Walter had taken a lodging a few houses from the tent of James. But that night he went out as he agreed and disappeared away down the company street. At its bidding James a sad good bye. All that day the excitement in the camp increased at the sound of distant battle, every hour there were fresh questioning of of strangers and ten arrests already. It was late late in the month of May news came that the Vivian armies were still advancing, as easily checked by a missive trying to oppose them as a little child checks a wave of the ocean, and a portion of the army had laid siege to Mic-Oulis Rand Hum and the enemy army there was starting to withdraw in panic, and now terror was charged from the emotions of former success which excited to madness the other Glandelinian armies which had been successful at other places. Superior Vivian had a motor car like no other brother was never meant to retreat set even if losing battle. They didn't know what retreat meant, defeated in battle or victorious, they were ever and over on the advance like a slowly moving enormous mountain.

On the afternoon of that day a crowd of soldiers and officers were gathered before an orator at which James attended and heard. "We soldiers of this encampment are exposed to two parts, that of the enemy without, that of the enemy spies within. There is a Glandelinian director which sits secretly within our lines some where and corresponds with the Glandelinian army. To frustrate it we must arrest all strangers. God help them if they can't identify themselves. The princesses must be protected at all costs."

The whole crowd drew death against all who directly or even indirectly acted in directly refused to execute or hindered the orders given by the executive power. Some of conspiracy from secretly disguised foes spies agitated the whole Christian camp and struck alarm into the minds of all the soldiers, while all those who had friends attending the Vivian princesses became more and more alarmed for their safety. So that evening orders were rigidly issued that all the soldiers were to stay in their tents no one to leave camp in order that a visit might be made by the delegates of the Military Commune, to search for suspicious papers and for suspected persons, and that a strong guard should surround the headquarters where the little girls were and no strangers to be among guards either. Ha indeed, as soon as the order was issued a man or two men, one by the name Harry Goodtooth, and Victor Hugo went to their lodgings, and telling their landlords that they had obtained work at the other end of the Christian DO, almost called them dogs. The camps paid their rent and left the camp by a secret way and for the next day slept in the woods. They passed most of their time discussing projects for enabling some way to get at the Vivian Glandelinian princesses and assassinate them by means of a bomb, for from the stringency of the steps taken, and the violence of the Military Commune against all spies pasting the officers and the princesses, they could no longer indulge in the hopes that in a short time they could accomplish their dastardly purpose. At the same time they could hardly persuade themselves that even such men as those who now held the supreme power in their hands since Evans left to take command some where else could intend to take extreme measures against so vast a number of secretly disguised Glandelinian spies as were now secretly hidden within the lines. Victor and Harry knew that the Vivian girls had at first escaped from Vivian's Viviananna's captured camp through the means of some boy, but whether they were still confined within a tent in Evans' army or not they were of course ignorant. Still there was no reason to suppose that the little girls had been transferred to some unknown hidden spot to shield them from grave danger. And too the main one feared feared, Penrod was not there. But when they found out by secretly shadowing that the princesses occupied the headquarters formerly used by Evans it was so strongly guarded that neither force nor stratagem was really available. The guards were the creatures of Colonel Hanton and Lieutenant Robespierre and any attempt to bribe them would have been dangerous in the extreme as to bribe them to try and give up the little girls would be the same as to bribe a man who loves his little daughter to give her up. He may give her up all right but over his dead body. Victor proposed that as he as well as Harry were well provided with funds, for he had brought to the Christian lines all the money which he had succeeded in collecting, they should recruit a band among the ruffian spies in the encampment and make a sudden attack upon the headquarters at night. But Harry pointed out that a numerous band would be required for such a dangerous enterprise and that among so many men one could be sure to turn traitor before the time came.

"I am ready to run all risks Victor to destroy these little Vivian boys, but I see no chance of success in it. I was once apprehended by a girl scout when I was going to set their headquarters on fire in the other camp, when I posed as a doctor. The fact they didn't discover the lighter fuel in the bag saved me from facing a firing squad. Even now the very first soldier we spoke to might capture us for how can we tell who are spies and who are not and if we were seized there would be no one else to do the work."

In the meantime some one suggested to James that he ought to try and bring out the Vivian Glandelinian Princesses out of Evans' lines and get to the Vivian town and village all the way toward Big Old Knool is in possession of the Glandelinians, and so is all territory, and the first man we spoke to might be a Glandelinian and denounce us, and if we were seized along with the princesses there would be no one to look after their safety. If they were captured and I still at large there would be some chance for them as I can plan the American way and that usually brings success. My first duty is toward them. I gave my promise to their brother and also to Tim and Walter Starling, and although it is not uprobably, can be of any use to them I will at any rate be at hand should occasion arise, and yet as long as no attack comes here or as long as one is not successful which doubtless would be the result as they tell me Double Day Federal is another general who never retreats, they would be safe here in spite of secret spies. The danger lays with them going out of the camp. That they must not do and I will not let them if I can help it."

James was indeed greatly anxious for the safety of the little girls and that evening warning James against again hastening there, but found that by the strictness of the guards that all was well, and that he had a hard time to get in and had to not only identify himself but show his passes, and having it all proven which he managed to do. Though that was great difficulty to him and some what embarrassing, he was glad for that showed the guards were faithful in their duty and when the guard was apologized James only said:

"I'm really glad you were so strict with me. That is good as it shows your care fullness. God to say though if you had let me in very easily I'd have to have reported you."

The deputies learning from the house keeper that really the princesses inhabited the upper story and no one else where in the place felt easier too though they did make a thorough search of the house to be sure no spies were lurking within. The little girls however were in a state of terrible anxiety about the slowness of the advance of the armies under their parent's, although Mrs. Jerry had avoided reporting to them the sinister rumors which came to her ears when abroad to do her marketing at the military canteen, for she now went out alone thinking it better that the little girls should appear as little as possible in the streets for some spy hidden in a safe place may open on them with a rifle or hand going machine gun and mow them down.

"It is terrible," Joyce said, "I think night and day of the armies of father and mother. Why are they slow, and why we don't get letters from poor Penrod and our parents now. I heard long Myletze with an enormous army is concentrating against him and he is at the point. Oh I hope not. Such a battle as there will be with armies so enormous. Can nothing be done? My little though a foe is not a bad man for we know by experience. He even once though knowing us treacherously treated us to a great dinner in his headquarters and gave us safe passes out of the Glandelinian camp. Can't something be done to pacify him. I don't him to have to fight father. My little never was whipped by any general or armies and I'm afraid. Barely we might devise some means for their escape from fighting him."

"I can think of nothing, don't even know where their armies are," James said. "I have heard of Myletze and his army is too strong and well drilled in the art of fighting to be worsted by any considerable force and it would be impossible to get that together when so many Christian armies are said to be retreating instead of standing their ground."

"Could we not bribe those generals under Myletze?"

"I have thought over that too," James said in reply, "but you see it would be necessary to get several others working together together and how could we find Myletze's army when we know of its whereabouts. If it is too dangerous your father or mother would be the wisest to refuse an interview like that with Myletze. One might perhaps bribe some general if you could get the other generals would not fail for it. I do not see how possibly that can be done and can't understand either the girls why a general fighting for so unholy a cause as Glandelinians cannot be lured."

"Would it be of any use do you think were I alone to go to general Myletze or some of his other generals in all my pretentious prettiness and plead with them not to fight with our fathers?" asked Jennie. "They say I'm the prettiest of my sisters and therefore I would do that willingly if you think there would be the slightest chance of success. I'm sure even if I failed Myletze if I came into his camp with a flag of truce would not make me a prisoner." "You have saved yourself from capture but it would be in vain when Myletze thinks he is doing his duty and you may have to make a big sacrifice for him to draw off from opposition with your father. You would only attract attention to the other Glandelinian generals of his army and they would believe you and your sisters would be weakening and look upon you as afraid."

"Could we not get hold of one of his gene-als and force him to sign an order for an armistice between the two so that Father could make good his escape?" Angelina suggested....

"Oh," James exclaimed in surprise. "Angelina, you have the best head of all to day. That idea never occurred to me. Yes that might be possible if, can his chance to get you little girls there. How stupid of me not to think of it. But first we'll have to find out where my father's army is and also where is his hide-out."

"Ten miles west of Angelina's father," said Jennie. "But do not run into any unnecessary danger on our account."

"Surely not," Angelina said earnestly. "I only suggested that, even such a scheme could hardly succeed."

"Certainly it will succeed if James dares to undertake such a perilous mission," said Jennie with implicit trust in his powers. "But, wouldn't it? But I would not let him take any such chances."

James laughed, and even Violet, and her sisters anxious as they were could not help smiling.

"I will try and deserve your confidence Princesses but, am not a magician nor a wonder worker of miracles. But suppose princesses that your father was so did get engaged with Myletze and Myletze came out second best. Myletze would lose his unusual reputation and you sure would have far more confidence in your father than even if, were you let your father take a chance with Myletze and offer him many masses as you can for his success, but, will soon to it over with a young fellow who is like myself a Christian boy scout. I saved his sister yesterday a six year old girl when she accidentally hanged herself almost to death when trying to tie a rope to the top of a colling beam. He has a father who is a prisoner of war in the enemy lines and will I am sure join me in any scheme to undertake, to even save you from the secret spies. Two heads are better than one, and even more are much better still than two when it comes to acting. And now I must say good night though I really hate to go as it seems I'm keeping company with angels disguised as little girls, and pray pray if, am not intending what sort of perfume do you little girls use."

"We use the Rose perfume of many kind when we have the chance to buy it. Why do you wish to give us some. If you do we don't want to take it from you for nothing. We don't want any one to sacrifice for us. We are not selfish you see."

"That is not the point," said James. "But, have bought for experiment all different kinds of perfumes which, could show you for proof I have in my tent by now and none of them give the smell your kind does. Have you several varieties here I'd like to test it."

Violet and her sisters looked at each other.

"Why," said Angelina "we only have one variety now and that is, rose. I'll get it and let you use some if you like."

But he didn't want to use it but only took a smell."

"Surely princesses you surely must use a brand that no one uses or know of and which you only probably can get," said James getting suspicious as he sniffed the air. There is something wrong and he felt queer. They could see it in his face and Violet herself the quickest to become mindful giggled.

"After a while you'll say we got perfume imported from Heaven," she said as he rose to go.

"Well it certainly smells that way and you look so transfigured to night every one of you," he said with a great feeling of awe. I don't hardly believe you are little girls. I'm afraid I'm entertaining angels unaware and they're testing my cause or work in the cause, took sides for."

"Here take a good feel of my arm," said Jennie. "When you can tell--"

"A spirit can make themselves appear solid," said James. "But I'm not insisting that you are. I said it seems so. If you little girls are not angel possessed as I've heard I'll eat my hat. But now though, regret it I must say good night again though it's hard to pull myself away. I hope when, see you again, I shall be able to tell you that, have formed some sort of plan to make enemy spies keep miles away from you. But again I must say don't worry about father or mother. I don't believe Myletze can lick them. Pray and have masses. Masses and asked the intercession of you angels and he'll win out and so will you mother. Then surely Manley will lose his record."

"But it is not Manley."

"I know but if Myletze cannot lick your father or mother Manley will lose his record as I heard it said Myletze is his record. If Myletze cannot win then there is a sure sign the war in the long run will turn out in your favor. So good night and please don't let anything make you lose sleep."

Vivian Hugo was as usual waiting near the door when Harry came mounting up (if not down).

"That is the news Henry? Nothing suspicious, hope. You are back sooner than usual."

"Yes, for I have something to think of. Here we have been planning in vain for the fourth night to hit upon some scheme for getting at those pesky little Vivian's but princesses and one of my companions had pointed out a way you and I never thought of...."

"What is that Henry?"

"The simplest thing in the world namely that we should seize one of the leaders of the guard around the head quarters and compel him to sign them over to us as prisoners. If that fails I'll try this. Have a fake letter made up as if the brother was waiting for them out in a road way and that either they or one of them should come out and meet him and lead him into camp. Then we'll capture them and lead them into an ambush."

"That seems certainly possible," Vivian said. "I wonder that it never occurred to either of us. But how is it to be done?"

"Ah that is for us to think out. That soldier has given us the idea and we must be stupid if we cannot invent out the details. In the first place we got to settle which one of them it had better be and the next how is it to be managed. It must be some one whose signature the guards at the headquarters would be sure to obey."

"Then," Vivian said it must be either Colonel Pantan or Captain Robespierre or, Robespierre or whatever you call him."

"Or," said Harry added. "I think he is as powerful as either of the others."

"He is the worst of them any how of those Christian dogs," Vivian said. "There is something straight forward about Pantan. He doubt he is as ambitious as any Christian officer but, think his hatred of us is all real and he'd die before he would sign anything. He is a terrible enemy general Marat and if the Vivian's are in danger and he knows it he will stick at nothing to cover them and protect them. They are angels to him. He is tug without and pitiless to those who persecute those little brats, but, I do not think he is double faced. Captain Robespierre is very ambitious too, but I think he is acting according to his principles such as they are. He would be pitiless too to those trying harm to the princesses but he would condemn also on principle. He would sign unmovable the order for a hundred heads to fall if he thought their fall necessary for the salvation of the princesses, but I do not think he would fact any one before the firing squad to satisfy private enmity. They call him the 'Incorruptible.' He is more dangerous than Pantan, for he has no vices, and they say he is fond of birds and pet a of all kinds. I do not think we should make any success if we got them in our power. The one would be like a wild beast in a snare. They could only rage with fury unbounded and could not be forced to sign anything what we require, no do I think would Robespierre and, cannot count on Marat either. He is simply venomous to those doing him and to the little brats. He hates the wicked world, and would absolutely rejoice in seeing those brats safe if he had to resort to slaughter of a whole Glandelinian army. So lunatic is he in appearance that even the Glandelinian prisoners shrink from him. (In fact he is really a very hard some man) He is a venomous reptile to us when it would be a pleasure to slay as it would be to put once heel upon a little snake. Men of his type are brave braver than the most courageous phantoms I think if we only had a lieutenant of the guards we might frighten him into doing what we want if we threaten him with burning at the stake."

"Then a lieutenant it shall be," Harry said. "That much is settled. To morrow we will find out something about his habits. Till we know that we cannot form any plan whatever, let us meet at dinner time at our usual place. Then we will go out side the Christian Dog Military Assembly and wait until he comes out. Fortunately we both know the lieutenant by sight. He will be sure to go about round as usual by a mob of his admirers to the headquarters of the princesses to change the guards and see that all is in perfect condition. From there we can trace him to his tent. No doubt any one could tell us where he lives but it would be very dangerous to ask when we have found that out we can decide upon our next step."

They were however saved the trouble they contemplated for they learned from the conversation of two men among the soldiers, who cheered the lieutenant as he entered the Assembly, what they wanted to know.

"Cap General Marat is the man to watch the Vivian's and princesses," one of them said. "He hates the enemy, he would destroy all to save the little angels. I never miss reading his articles in the 'Friend of the Nation.' His cry is,

"Protect them with your lives against spies. Protect them and help their boy guard them shield them." He is a great man but is just like one of us. He still retains his old head quarters since the army became stationed here though he could move if he likes into the fine head quarters usually occupied by the Vivian girl princesses as they have often entertained him to. He wants no servants but lives as we do. Give General Marat..."

"Where does the great general live?" Victor asked the man in a tone of great respect. "On learning the address they took their way to the part of the camp where the general was."

"General Marat occupies a part of this neighborhood in this company street. See he not?" Victor asked a soldier who was closing his tent.

"Yes in that small house opposite. Do you want to see him?"

"No, only I was curious to see the house where the great friend of the Vivian girl is live and as I was passing the end of the Company Street turned down, and so General Marat lives there; it is not much of a place for a great a Christian general."

"It's all he wants the other said carelessly. "But he knows a thing or two. There is often plots against the Vivian girl princesses, and those cursed Glandelinians would kill them in cold blood or bob bomb them if they had the chance, but their headquarters by his orders is closely guarded day and night."

In the evening Victor and Harry returned to the street, and watched until General Marat returned from the Military Army. Y.M.C.A. His escort of strong horsemen the front column with torches the others armed to the teeth left him at the door, but half a dozen went up stairs with him and until far in the night visitors came and went... Then the light in the upper room was extinguished.

"It is not such an easy affair," Victor said as they moved away, "and you see as that soldier cleaning his tent told us, there is an old woman who takes care of the little brats and cooks for them, and it is much too difficult to seize that man or to bribe the guards without an alarm being given and as to bribing Christian guards, you might as well bribe those little brats to commit suicide."

"That is so," Harry agreed "but it must be done somehow, every day though we are winning so far matters grow more threatening, and Empress Vivian's army is advancing, and those bands of Gemini have not been brought all this way for nothing. The worst of it is we have such a short time to act. General Marat does not seem to leave the headquarters the Vivian girl is alone from the same number of guards from early morning till next early morning and the guards are changed every half hour. Suppose too we did somehow get the order to turn them over to us from some head of the guards at night we could not present it until the morning and before we could present it some one might arrive and discover him fastened up, and might take the news to the little girls before we could get them out and we ourselves would be in hot water."

"Yes that is very serious," Victor agreed. "I begin to despair. Henri. There is no putting it over on Christian dogs."

"We must not do that," Harry rejoined. "You see we thought it impossible before till that soldier gave us the idea. If one plan is impossible the other is not. There ought to be some way out of it if we could only hit upon it. Perhaps by tomorrow morning an idea will occur to one of us, and there is another thing to be thought of we must force the little girls to change their disguises as they'll be known by the Christian dogs in what they wear now and would bring us disaster. It would also be of no use whatever getting them out of the Christian lines unless we could conceal them after we did get our hands on them. It would not do for us to go to any tent, too and the last orders are so strict about the punishment of any one giving shelter to the enemies of the country and of the little brats, that people that let them all be suspicious and caused cause us to be apprehended. The only plan will be to get them out of the Christian lines at once. If we have them it will be difficult to go on foot for in every town and village east of here is also possessed by Christian armies and the strictest look is kept for all suspicious persons. Still that must be risked; there is no other way. We could act and walk like Christians."

"Yes, we must see about that tomorrow Henri, but I do not think the little brats would go willingly on such a journey and may give us a lot of trouble which would also excite suspicion. Therefore I think that when we get inside their head quarters we should draw our pistols and shoot them dead."

"Yes that would be much the best plan Victor, and now we are here close home. I hope by the time we meet in the morning one of us might hit upon plan on the forgetting hold of these little brats. They're a great danger to the Glandelinian cause."

"Say I think I have hit upon a plan Victor I'd fight now," Harry said suddenly.

"I am glad to hear of it for although I have lain awake all night last night I could think of nothing. Well what is your idea?"

"Well you see General Marat often goes out in the morning alone. He is so well known and is so well regarded by all the Christian army that he has no fear of any assault being made upon him at any time. My plan is that we should secretly follow him till he gets into some Company Street with few Christian soldiers about... Then I would dash upon him, seize him and draw a knife to strike, shouting, 'I am you Christian dog.' You should be a few paces behind and should run up and strike the knife out of my hand managing at the same moment to stumble over the general and fall with him to the ground. That would give me time to bolt. I would have a beard on, and would have my other clothes over the blouse. I would then rush into the first door way of a barracks run inside pull off my beard and disguise and then walk quietly down dressed as a Christian soldier-dog. You would of course run upstairs and meet me on the way. I should say, 'I had just met a fellow running upstairs, and should slip quietly off.'"

"It would be a rightful risk, Henri, I might be at a disadvantage, enough to give you a successful fight before, could do the stunt."

"No I think it could be managed easily enough. Then of course the general would be very grateful to you, and you could either get him to visit your lodgings or could go up to his and once you managed to be there you could manage to out last his visit at night, and then we could do as we agreed."

"But under no conditions would he do it," Henri said. "You must not forget he wouldn't sacrifice those little brats to his best friend. And you know we should have hardly any time in the morning."

"You are right, I have been thinking of that, and I have come to a second conclusion that our best plan would be to seize him and hold a dagger to his heart and threaten to kill him instantly if he didn't accompany us. Then we would go down with him into the company street, and walk a-m in a-m to your own lodging. We could thrust a lot of cloth into his mouth so that he could not call out. Had he the courage and desperation to do so, which I do think he would even if he knew that by making the slightest sound we would kill him. These Christian dogs will sell their wives for the safety of those little brats. Then we could make him sign the order and leave him fastened up the rest."

"It is hopeless you could not force Christian dogs to sign anything. The best plan will be to put a knife into his heart at once the minute you have got the order signed if you did succeed, Victor said savagely. "I should have no more hesitation in killing any Christian dog general than stamping on a snake."

"No Victor we could not dare kill him in cold blood for we would do more harm than good to the cause, for those Christian dogs would consider he had died a martyr to his championship of his and their rights and of the glory of the God they worship and would be more furious than ever against the Glandelinians and we would be hunted down like abjects with hounds."

"But his account of what he has gone through will have just the same effect Henri, for it would not be probable that he should keep the story to himself. What has happened once may happen again and besides his statement that two persons tried to force him to sign over to them the princesses which he refused to do even to save his life would tell terribly against us. And make him a greater hero in the eyes of the army. No I think he would tell everything that was going on. After we have got them safe away we can say them where the killing won't be observed. Then with the little brats a lot of the way we can not only claim the reward from the Glandelinian government but see Glandelinia win the war just as well... well."

"Five minutes start would be all that we should want." "The plan was not destined to be carried out it was the morning of May the 25th and as they went down into the quarters where the quartermaster tents and army magazines of old clothes were situated in order to purchase the necessary disguises, they soon became sensible that something unusual was in the air. Separating they joined the groups of men at the corners of the street a street wondering why no many columns of soldiers were prepared for marching, and tried to learn what was going on while as to say in the alarm "A hell of a firing was going on in the direction of the recently captured camps of Vivianians right wing. None seemed to know for certain. All sorts of sinister rumors were about, sinister to the army enemy hopeful for the little girls of course. Word had been passed that most of general Double Day Federal army was to be in readiness that evening."

every man was to see to it his rifles were well oiled and cleaned. Some bands of officers had dropped hints that a blow was to be struck by Double Day Federal who was determined to strengthen his even now powerful army by capturing the camp and land success to general Vivian before it was too late and half of the army was already in fierce action. Every where there was a suppressed excitement among all the soldiers and boy and girl scouts too who had fled to Evans army, and would be an aid of gloom and terror among the Glandelinian spies. The thunder of a myraid of cannon could easily be heard. At some time Victor and Harry came together again and compared their observations.

"It may be that a great attack is going to be made upon Cannonia," Harry said. "I hope it won't succeed yet. There are still many divisions of Cannonia's army which have not been in any battle yet and who should be able to stand and with stand the fiercest Christian attack. It may be that a blow is going to be made being struck against the captured encampments."

"We must hope that Cannonia will win and sweep an attack here too," Victor said. "But I am terribly uneasy. Double Day Federal is a dangerous Christian general to contend with. Strange he only got word this morning that general Viviania lost all in his right wing, but when he strikes he strikes with irresistible force. I'm terribly uneasy."

"Oh Cannonia will lick him."

Despite that he said this, nevertheless Harry had the same uneasy feeling but he did his best to reassure his friend, and propose that they should at once set about buying the disguises, and that on the following morning they should carry into effect their plan with reference to general Marat. The dresses were bought, two suits such as military work, men would wear on working days were full of purchases. There was then a debate as to the disguises of the little girls, it struck them at once that it was strange for two young work men to be purchasing attire for children when they knew nothing about, and the size of clothing they were to wear, but after some consultation they decided upon clothing girls wez wean, and these Victor went in and bought. Gayly telling the quarte-masters regret that he was buying a birth day present for the Viviania princesses and to hold to the lie and to prevent suspicion was for the sake of the pretty good clothing. They took the clothes up to Harry's room agreeing that they needed not to put it all on the little "beast" but they decided to say nothing about the attempt that was about to be made until it was over as it would cause an anxiety which the old woman would be probably unable to conceal from the little girls. Victor did not accompany Harry to his room, they had never indeed visited each other in their apartment since a meeting always some little distance away in order that their connection should be unobserved, and that should one be arrested, no suspicion would follow the other.

As soon as he had disposed of the clothes Harry sallied out again, and once joined he joining Victor they made their way down to some spot spot being too anxious to remain quiet and saw the immense columns of soldiers on the swift march. They were close to the head quarters of the little girls and saw that it was guarded as closely as ever. They could learn nothing from the crowd of boy and girl scout which was as usual getting ready for their own movement and who would not say anything. But the noise southward was increasing.

There was a general impression that some thing was about to happen but none would give any definite reason as to their belief. For an hour they wandered about restless and anxious as the noise of battle in the direction of the captured camps increased. They fought their way into the galleries of the Military Assembly, when the doors opened, but for a time nothing new took place, only the continuous "tramp tramp" of the marching soldiers and the sound of artillery wheels and gun caissons and the thud of enormous numbers of cavalry hooves. The military assembly in which the Christian leaders had a powerful voice had protested against the slowness of the army being prepared for the advance. The assembly did not lack any firmness, the Abbeannian Committee in the army every day had gained more power of protection for all. Already war ants of arrests were prepared against all strangers who could not prove themselves or not spies or under suspicion of whose names were not on the lists of the roll call which seemed to show very much protection to Violet and her sisters. In fact it was so far having its effects. Too scared and restless to remain in the military assembly Victor and Harry again took their steps to the company Street of company B.

Just as they arrived there twenty four persons of whom twenty two were dressed as women were brought out from a prison tent of large size by a party of soldiers who shouted:

"To the Execution field." These soldiers lined up in rank formation in front and rear of the prisoners one of them looking like a priest, shouting:

"You may not arrive at the execution field you murdering spies, the very people among the refugees are waiting to tear you to pieces."

But the refugees people themselves looked on silently in sullen apathy.

"You see them?" one of the officers shouted. "There they are, you army here is about to march on to retake the lost camps. These spies are of the Glandelinians who butcher wives and children. They were here to assassinate the princesses. It has been proven. Their crime is terrible."

Still the crowd did not move. The great mass of the soldiers had a real thorough horror to think that Glandelinian spies instead of just doing the noble deed of trying to learn plans and so forth had come within their lines to murder the little Viviania in cold blood, ordered by the violent leaders of Glandelinian backed by the whole Glandelinian army. A few shouts were raised here and there of down with the spies, charge down with the murdering spies, "Victor would have passed for a dead backless recklessly to rescue the spies had not Harry held him arm tightly exclaiming in his ear:

"Be strain yourself Victor. The soldiers and mob will turn on you. They are not having the spies or anything with them on they are all soldiers. They're only too horrified to think and if they rescue themselves themselves the guards could not even protect the spies, you can do nothing yourself. Come get out of the crowd."

So saying, he dragged Victor away. It was well that they could not see what was taking place in the captured Viviania. Victor would have been ungovernable, for several of the officers had drawn their swords and were hacking furiously at their prisoners.

"We will follow them," Harry said, when he and Victor had made their way out of the crowd. "But you must remember Victor, that come what may you must keep cool. You would only throw away your life unnecessarily these Glandelinians are fierce and for your wives sake you must keep cool. Your life belongs to her and you have no right to throw it away. These spies were a fool enough to all or themselves to come and they're caught."

"You are right Henry," Victor said gloomily. "But how can one of us look on and see seeing officers inciting others to the execution of spies because they tried to be caught trying to kill the little beast which is going to take place? We must follow them."

"I am ready to follow them," Harry said. "But you must not go unless you are firmly resolved to restrain your feelings no matter what happens. You can do no possible good, we cannot save our spies from these Christian dogs, while they can save their own, and therefore you will only involve in the destruction of others."

"You may trust me," the other said. "I will be calm for my wives sake."

Harry however had his doubts as to his companion's self control, but he was anxious to see what was taking place and they joined the throng that followed the coaches. But they were now in the rear and could see nothing that was taking place before them, then the carriages reached an open field the prisoners were forced to alight. Some of them were set on one cut down by cavalry soldiers when in desperation they tried to make their escape, the rest fled into a big roomy house where unfortunately one of the Committee was sitting. It's members however righteously did nothing to protect these murdering scoundrels and looked on while all save two were massacred unreluctantly unhesitatingly. Then the soldiers came out brandishing their bloody weapons (blood from human deaths) and shouting:

"The good work has begun; down with the assassins of little girls, down with spies who come to murder the princesses."

It seemed a horrible deed but it really was justified. Spies who come into the Christian lines only to learn intentions and plans and so on even do not meet a death penalty but only a term in prison for a certain number of years but when spies come to murder the princesses in cold blood, such holy little girls then it is too bad for them if caught, and these were caught and the evidence against them a sure proof before heaven and earth and they won't wait to hang or shoot either. The majority of the soldiers and refugees however had not followed the procession to the scene of execution as beyond the crowds were too great. They had been horror-struck at the words of the guards of the prisoners, and felt that this was the beginning of the rumors of the last few days or the fulfillment of them. The attempted murder of the little Viviania by these prisoners was indeed the signal for every soldier and refugee to draw back in horror and sorrow. All who had at first thought that the hour of unity and happiness for the little girls now commenced with the coming of Evans army under Double Day Federal, Evans to come with the hero Vivian, and who had gone heart and soul in the hope to see them get the right desert, and had now shrunk back appalled at the strange new spy horror which had sprung into existence. Horror and apathy had prevented them from doing what the officers said they might do. They were or had been rooted to the spot in horror and grief. Each fresh act of usurpation of power by these many disguised spies had alienated a section and had frightened the whole army, now the spies got caught was from the fact they either didn't answer to the roll call or answered the wrong names. All the soldiers, and the refugees, had shrunk back, sick, and appalled, and as enraged when they saw that even in this treacherous way the lives of the good little princesses were so treacherously menaced.

Because the way Glandelinia had carried on the war, devastation of a whole country by forest fires, great floods, the world had never seen, explosions making volcano holes of a whole country, the massacre of children in a way that would be a horror to picture Glandelinia had no friend, and for all this time since the war had continued Glandelinia was standing forth in the eyes of the Christian world as a wicked demonish blood stained horrible monster, the enemy not of god and Holiness only, but of humanity in general.

And to offset the horror Glandelinian generals hired agents and spies to murder wholly little princesses in cold blood. Surely the angels were protecting them, otherwise whole sales of spies would not have occurred.

The crowds following the executions were composed almost entirely of what the Glandelinians would call them "The Scum of Heaven" Abyssinilian soldiers and soldiers who had long been at war with all Wicked Societies, who hated everything ugly and wicked, hated those who hated god if they didn't repent, hated all things cruel and wicked, and as they had seen children suffer more than even violet and her sisters could ever boast off, they had become wild beasts to the wicked murdering Glandelinians who were the products of that evil system of Glandelinian society which allows and commands children prisoners of Christian countries, to be tortured and massacred in all sorts of styles never seen in true history and far more horrible, too horrible to relate here, and which violet and her sisters fortunately had never seen.

What they had seen during massacres was nothing in comparison what Abyssinilian soldiers had observed and avenged. Abyssinilian soldiers don't give quarter to Glandelinians persecuting children. The greater portion of them were in the pay of the Abyssinilian Commune, and the shouts of the guards had been taken up and echoed by the mobs of soldiers. Savage cries, and shouts for vengeance against the Glandelinians filled the air. Can't leave the princesses alone. Well they'll die for it. Blood of the wicked assassins had been tasted and all their angry righteous instincts against bloody murdering assassins were on fire.

"Henry! this is horrible, those accused Christian dogs," Victor Hugo exclaimed. "I feel as if I were in a night mare, not that any night mare could compare in terror to this. Look at those heinous faces--faces men are glad because those little brats were threatened, exulting in the thought of seeing the execution of our brave heroes who had tried to slay the little brats, lustful for the deaths of these brave spies, and to think that these creatures are the masters of Abyssinilia. Great Neptune what can come of it in the future? Are those little brats so important to them that they'll do that to spies trying to kill them. What is going to take place now."

"Organized massacre of spies I fear. Victor! What seemed incredible for Christian dogs to do, what seems impossible, is going to take place; there is to be a massacre of all the captured spies."

They had by this time reached a large open field. Here a large number of prisoners had been collected. Many prisoners were also within a long building. It was a sort of prison. The soldiers entered who commanded the coming execution, and the prisoners were called by name to assemble in the field. First a spy disguised like an Archbishop was hurled, then the soldiers fell upon the others and hewed them down. Two men who were spies, and who were also had been disguised as bishops were among the righteously slain, and the executioners did not desist until the last wicked prisoners had either been shot, hacked to pieces or hung. Bodies had already been dug and carts were waiting to convey the corpses there, showing how carefully the preparations for the massacre had been made. Then the number of executioners returned to the big building, and with a crowd of followers entered the hall. Here one of the officers organized a sort of tribunal of men taken at random among the crowd of accused refugees, refugees because of the wicked foe. Some of these men had seen the loss of their all. No more spies who had been arrested were brought out. They were spared the face of the trial as there was too much evidence found on them, they were ordered to march out through the doors, outside of which the executioners were awaiting them. Some hesitated to go out and cried for mercy. A young spy with head erect was the first to go and pass through the fatal doors. He fell in a moment pierced with a bullet. The rest followed him, and shared his fate. The mob of soldiers and refugees had crowded into the galleries which surrounded the hall of the long building and applauded with furious yells the execution of the would be assassins. In the body of the hall a space was kept very clear by the armed 320 follow follows of the Commune around the judges table and a pathway to the door from the interior of the prison to that opening into the street. When about thirty of the spies had been massacred, the trial of other prisoners commenced. One after the other the wicked prisoners were brought out. They were asked their names and occupations, a few questions followed, and then as evidence was produced against them the verdict of guilty. Six of them were conducted to the door and slain. Ten received life sentence at the inland prison. Two others by the witness of their answers and by the fact that no evidence was proven against them amused the soldiers and were thereupon acquitted from the death penalty and were sentenced to four years at hard labor. Victor and Harry were in the lower gallery. They stood back from the front, but between the heads of those before them they could see what was going on down below. Victor stood immovable his face as pale as death. His cup had fallen off his hair was dark with perspiration his eyes had the look of concentrated horror his body shook with a spasmodic shuddering....

In vain Harry, when he once saw what was going to take place urged him in a whisper to leave. He did not appear to hear, and even when Harry pulled him by the sleeve, of his coat he seemed equally unconscious. Harry was greatly alarmed and feared that at any moment his reckless companion would betray himself by some terrible outburst.

After the thirty fourth spy had been brought out, and disposed of, a tall and stately man was brought into the hall. A terrible cry, which sounded loud even above the tumult, which reigned, burst suddenly from Victor's lips followed by a curse.... He threw himself with the fury of a mad man upon those in front of him, and in a moment would have bounded into the hall with sword up raised. Had not Harry brought the pistol butt with all his force down upon his head, Victor fell like a log under the blow....

"What is that? Is the matter?" shouted those around.

"For some reason or other my comrade has probably gone out of his mind," Harry said quietly. "He has been drinking for some days too much coffee, and his hatred for the enemies of Abyssinilia, and the Vivian girl princesses has turned his head. I have been watching him and had just knocked him down he would have thrown himself fore most off the gallery and broken his neck...."

The explanation seemed natural and all were too interested in what was passing in the hall below to pay any attention to so trivial an incident. It was well that Harry had caught sight of sight of the prisoner before Victor did so, and was prepared for the outbreak, for it was his father who had been led out to execution as a spy. Harry dragged Victor back against the wall behind and then tried to lift him.

"I will give you a helping hand (not on the left end)" a tall portly stranger in the dress of a store mechanic who had been standing next to him said, and lifting Victor's body onto his shoulder made his way to the top of the stairs Harry preceding him, and opening a way through the crowd of soldiers and refugees. In another minute they were out in the open air.

"Thank you greatly sir," Harry said. "I do not know how I should have managed without you. If you put him down here somewhere I will try to bring him a round...."

"I'm quartered not far from here," the tall man said. "I will take him to my tent. You need not be afraid," he added as Harry hesitated. "I have got my eyes open you can trust me...."

So saying he made his way through the crowd, gathered outside. He was frequently asked who he was carrying, for the crowd feared lest any of the wicked spies should escape; but the man replied given with a sudden rough laugh.

"It's hot in the re and he swooned----" satisfied them. Passing down a long Company street the man entered a large tent and laid Victor on a cot, then he carefully closed the door and struck a light.

"You hit him awfully hard on the head my friend," he said as he examined Victor's head. "My goodness I should not have liked such a blow myself, but I don't blame you. You were just in time to prevent his betraying himself, and better a hundred times a knock on the head than those Christian gun men outside. That door I had my eye on him too and felt sure he would do something rash, and I had intended to choke a him but he was too quick for me. How came you to be so foolish as to be there?"

"We wanted to see what was going on," Harry answered for he saw that it would be the bestest policy to be frank. "It was as I believe his father whom they brought out to execute as a spy as an assassin in spy."

"It was rash of you young sir. A person might as well try to save his mother from the tiger who has laid its paw upon her as for you to try and kill the one little Vivian girl great goodness. Gracious to think that in the early days, was fool enough to go down and do spying my self. But I have seen my mistake. What has it brought us, nothing. And now what are you going to do. My wife who helps me in spying on these Christians is out but she probably will be back soon. We will attend to this young fellow."

She is a good nurse and, tell you, think he will need all we can do for him."

"You don't think I have seriously injured him?" Harry asked in a tone of dismay.

"No, no, don't make you self uneasy. You have stunned him and that's all, he will soon get over that. I have seen men in the Glandelinian army get worst knocks in a drunken row and be at work again in the morning; but it is different here. I saw his face and he was pretty nearly mad when you struck him. I doubt whether he'll be in his right senses when he comes round; but never fear we will look after him well and prevent Christian dogs from getting him. You can stay if you like, but if you want to go you can trust him to us. I see you can keep your head, and will not run into danger as he did."

"I do want to terribly go terribly," Harry said "terribly, and I feel sure that I can trust you completely. You have saved his life and done all mine already. Now you will not be hurt at what I am going to say. He is the son of Duke Heigo the last man we saw brought out to be massacred. We have plenty of money. In a belt round his waist you will find a hundred dollars in Abbeinnian money. Please do not spare them. If you think he wants a surgeon call him in, and get everything necessary for your household. While you are nursing him you cannot go out to spywork. I do not talk of reward one cannot reward kindness like you're, but while you are looking after him you wife and you must live."

"Agreed," the man said, shaking Harry by the hand. "You speak like a man of heart. I will look after him. You need not be under any uneasiness. Should any of the Christian dogs come up to ask questions I shall furnish something excusable to say for instance. This is a young army work man who got accidentally knocked down and hurt in the crowd and whom having nothing better to do I have brought in here."

"If he should recover his senses before I come back," Harry said "please do not let him know it was I who struck him. He will be well nigh heart broken that he could not share the fate of his father. Let him think that he was knocked down by some one in the crowd."

"All right that is easily managed," the man said; "Jacques Hedarter is no fool. Now you had best be off for, see that you are on the run, and leave me to bathe his head. If you couldn't have time or the chance to come back soon you can depend upon it I will look after him until he is able to go about again."

On leaving Victor in the care of the man who had so providentially come to his aid, Harry hurried down the Company Street toward the big long building, then he stopped to think--should he return there or make his way to another prison filled with spies. He could not tell whether these captured spies had been moved to this execution Tribunal building or not. If they had been so it was clearly possible for him to aid them in any way. They already had fallen. The crowd was too great for him to regain the Gallery, and even there he could only witness without power to avert their execution. Were they still at the other prison he might do something. Perhaps the executions had not yet arrived there. It was now nine o'clock in the evening. The Company Street was almost deserted. Most of the army had gone forth to battle, trembling at the horrors facing the Vivian girls of which reports had circulated during the afternoon. At first there had been hopes that the Assembly would take steps to put a stop to the massacre of the captured spies, but the Assembly did nothing what even General Danton and his ministers were absent. The distant cannons resounded perpetually. There was no secret as to what was going on. The Abbeinnian Communists according to the other spies at live liberty had the "insolence" to send commissioners to the bar of the assembly to state that the soldiery was wished to break open the doors of the prisons and this when two hundred spies had already been executed.

A deputation indeed when to the field to try and persuade to the executioners to desist, but their voices were drowned in tumultuous cries. The Communists in the camp openly directed the just massacre. Officers of all rank went back and forth to superintend the execution of their orders and promised the executioners twenty four dollars an hour. On a living in front of the other prison Harry found all was quiet there and with a faint feeling of hope that the massacre would not extend there he again turned his steps in the direction of the long Tribunal. The bloody work was still going on, and Harry wandered away into the quiet streets to avoid hearing the shrieks of the victims and the yells of the crowd. A sudden str thought struck him, and he went along until he saw an old woman come out of a low tent.

"Madame," he said "I have the most urgent need of a bonnet and shawl. We will you sell me those you have on? The shops are all shut on account of a battle regarding in general vivianians for it to you, would not trouble you," he said as he ran up to her to hear "You have only to name your price and I will pay you."

The woman was surprised at this proposition, but seeing that a good bargain was to be made she asked twice the cost of the article when new, and this Harry paid without question. Wrapping the shawl and bonnet into a bundle he retraced his steps, and sat down on some log within a distance of the long Tribunal building which would enable him to observe any general movement of the crowd in front of it. At one o'clock in the morning there was a stir and a large body of armed soldiers moved down the street.

"They are going to else where," he said after following them for some distance. "Oh if I had but two or three regiment of Glandelinian soldiers here we would make mince meat of those fools."

He found they were going toward Prison camp number two, he did not enter there where the scene was taking place at the execution field--for in spite of the speed with which the trials were hurried through--these massacres of spies were not finished there--so great was the number of prisoners--we were peated. At this prison number two there were a spies. They shared the fate of the others being hung on trees.

Also here were many Glandelinian lady spies imprisoned who had also had a hand in the wicked and cruel conspiracy to help in the murder of the Vivian girl princesses among them one called Princess De La Morido, they shared the fate of the male spies, also being hung, but the head of the princess was cut off and stuck upon a pike and was carried in triumph under the windows of a building shaped like a temple, where a man and woman spy husband and wife were confined, and was held up to the bars of the room they occupied for them to see. Harry remained a little distance from here tramping restlessly up and down half mad with rage and horror and at his powerlessness to interfere in any way with the proceedings of the soldiery who were carrying on the work of execution. At last at about eight o'clock in the morning a boy scout ran by.

"They have finished with them at the execution field," he said with fiendish glee as it seemed. "They are going from there to the main spy prison camp at the south."

Harry with great difficulty repressed his desire to slay the boy scout, and hurried away to reach that prison camp before the band of executioners from the execution field arrived there. Unfortunately he came down by a side street upon them when they were within a few hundred yards of the prison. His great hope was that he might succeed in penetrating with the executioners and find some one he could aid in escaping through the mobs of soldiery in the disguise he had purchased. But here as at the other prison camps there was a method in the whole sale execution of assassins spies. The agents of the Communists took possession of the hall at the entrance and permitted none to pass further into the prison, the warders and officials bringing down the prisoners in batches, and so handing them over to execution. In vain Harry tried to penetrate into the inner part of the prison. He was roughly repulsed by the soldiers guarding the door, and at last finding that nothing could be done, he forced his way again into the open air, and hurrying away at some distance threw himself on the ground and burst into a passion of tears.

After a time he arose and made his way back to the house where he had left Victor Heigo. He found him in a state of delirium arising over and over again the scene in the execution hall, cursing the judges and executioners and calling them all Christian dogs, and crying out that he would die with his father after killing the Vivian brats.

"What does the doctor think of him?" he asked the woman who was sitting by Victor's bed.

"He did not say much," the woman replied. "He shook his head and said there had been a terrible mental shock, and that he could not give an answer for his life or reason. There was nothing to do but be patient to keep his head bandaged with wet cloths, and to give him water from time to time. Do not be afraid if we will watch over him carefully."

"I would stay if I could," Harry said, "but I have other things I must see about. To avenge this slaughter of spies I would give anything to kill those brats of the Vivian girl princesses."

"The little brats," the woman said. "It is terrible. My husband was telling me what he saw, and a neighbor came in just now and said it was the same thing at the other prisons. My brother too, he was dragged away and executed. How is it that things can be Christian spies get away from us. Don't you see?"

"We cannot tell," Harry said sadly. "As for my self I cannot hardly believe it. though I was an eye witness of it. They say there are over four thousand prisoners captured who could not give satisfactory answers and if evidence are against them that they had a hand in the attempted murder of the little brats they will all be executed."

Such a thing was never heard of within such a camp of these Christian dogs. I can hardly believe that I am not in a dream now."

"You look a most like one dead yourself," the woman said pityingly. "I have made a stew for my husband's breakfast and mine. It is just ready. Do take a mouthful before you go out. That and a piece of bread and a cup of red wine will do you good."

Harry was on the point of refusing but he felt that he was utterly worn and exhausted and that he must keep up his strength. His husband therefore took his place by Violet's bedside in readiness to hold him down should he try to get up in his savings, while the woman ladled out a basin of the broth and placed it with a piece of bread and some wine on the table. Harry forced himself to drink it and when he rose from the table he already felt the benefit of the meal.

"Thank you very much," he said. "I feel much stronger now. I must go and try my duty."

So Harry first went back and waited outside the prison until the execution work was over, but found on questioning those who came out when all was done that the spies had all been executed for their dastardly plots upon the princesses.

"But good night," the man whom he was speaking to said; "But these wicked accursed Glandelinian assassins in spies have courage. Men and women were alike there was not one of them but faced the judges of the court manfully and bravely and went to their deaths as calmly as if going to a meal. There was a man and his wife. They brought them out together. They were asked whether they had anything to say why they should not be punished for their crimes of attempted assassination of the Vivian girls. Princesses. The man himself laughed aloud scornfully.

"Crimes of attempted assassination," he said. "Do you think I am going to plead for my life because it was my duty to slay those little brats. Come my love. We go together."

He gave her just one kiss and then took her hand as if they were going to walk a minute amidst together and then led her down between the line of guards with his head erect and a smile of scorn on his face. She did not smile but her step did not falter. He watched her closely. She was very pale and she did not look at all proud but she walked as steadily and calmly as her husband till they reached the door where the soldiers waited. He was hanged, she faced the firing squad, and they died without a cry or a groan. They are foul bodies were these Glandelinian assassin spies. They have fattened on the life blood of countless little children no doubt, but they knew how to die these spies."

Without a word Harry turned away. He was deciding that spy ing within the Christian lines was as fatal as suicide. What should he do, give it up. He was too determined. He decided to get revenge and therefore he wrote hastily on a piece of paper of some letter he had stolen from one of the Vivian girls; com copying Pen's old hand writing!

"Come at once and lead me into the Christian lines. I have sent this messenger to you my dearest sister Violet."

Penrod!

Her sisters were not at home when the man who received the note presented it to Violet, and she was so anxious to see her brother Penrod that being deceived by the hand writing she couldn't resist the call, and with a prayer of thanksgiving to God she set out with the spy Harry. At first she didn't like his looks, but as looks usually do not betray character and as he spoke civilly enough she was not afraid of anything. He walked with Violet and soon was close to the outer limits of the west end of the Christian camp, when a officer of high rank on horse back wearing a large red sash, which showed him to be a general of the Abyssinians came along at foot pace. It was general Fred Wick Nance. His eyes fell upon Violet's face, and then charged to that of the man and rested on both, at first with the look of doubtful recognition, followed by a start of surprise and satisfaction. He reined in his horse instantly with the exclamation;

"Two more dirty spies looking for the Vivian girls. Princesses."

For a moment Violet shrank back, her cheeks paler than before and her hand flew to her mouth as a stifled gasp escaped her. His eyes were burning into her like two fiery coals. For a moment she turned away unable to meet the terrible look in his eyes. His face was ashen, his lips tight and bloodless, his eyes blazing with an insane fury that made Violet feel dead. His expression fairly frightened her. Fred Wick Nance was a dangerous man to spies who attempted murder of the little girls and he had mistaken her for one in her disguise. She had heard what happened to the spies and she was horrified. Then recovering herself she said calmly;

"I'm princess Violet not a spy."

His voice from her horse didn't sound natural to him.

"It goes to my heart," he went on with a sneer "to be obliged to do my duty, but however unpleasant it is it must be done. Claiming that you are Princess Violet will go harder on you than before. Good-bye," he said waving his voice "I want two men."

Several soldiers within hearing came forward willingly.

"This boy scout is a Glandelinian spy in disguise and claims he is one of the dear Princesses. He went on pointing to Violet. "In virtue of my office as deputy general and member of the Cmo Committee of Public Safety of the Vivian girls I arrest him and give him into your charge. Where is that scoundrel of a man who was with him? Recognized his face instantly? Seize him also on a charge of using the boy as an accomplice."

But the spy Harry was gone. The moment general Nance had looked around for assistance he was gone. He knew the general being a true Christian was only making a mistake, and would find it out in time, but as to himself he would be out of luck and get it worse for having her in his possession. He would have to give an account of that and he had intended as soon as he got her to a lonely spot to kill her. Seeing what had happened he had instantly slipped away among the crowd, whose attention had been called by general Nance's first words, and dived into a small quarter-master store, where he at once began to bargain for some neck ties.

"There in Henry's name is that man!" the general repeated angrily. "His name and person, know well. Had he got to their headquarters he would have murdered the princesses. I'll bet this brat was luring him there."

"What is he like?" one of the bystanders asked.

The general gave a good description of him for he not only noticed that Violet had been speaking to the man but knew him personally but his description did no good the scoundrel was gone.

"Confound it," he said in a tone of vexation. "Never mind we shall find him later one. His capture is most important. See that no one leaves the camp."

So as yet he set out with Violet walking beside him with a guard on either hand. In the next Company Street he came on a party of four soldiers of the Assembly and ordered them to take the place of those he had first charged with the duty, and directed them to proceed with him to the prison where enemy child scout captives are kept. Violet was taken at once before the Committee sitting on permanence for the discovery and arrest of all suspects trying to harm the Vivian girls. Princesses. It seemed a lucky thing for Violet that she was arrested by mistake but unless she could get herself identified she would face dire peril for if any one was trying to murder her and he insists on not even a child spies would be exempt from death.

"Charge this boy with not only being a Glandelinian spy in disguise and leading one of those Glandelinian spies probably two of the Vivian girls head quarters but also with claiming he is Princess Violet. Have him examined and cross examined. He is one of the followers of whom were executed only early to day because they would not leave the princesses alone. I am sorry that it should fall to my lot to denounce these sort of spies but I feel that my love and duty to the princesses who army best of friends stands before any private considerations. Have the little imp examined."

"You have done perfectly right, General," the president of the Cmo committee said. "As I understand the Vivian girls have been in grave peril from so many of these secret spies I will at once sign the order for that little fool's commitment to the prison. There is room there still and she can be among her own kind if that little spy is a real girl in disguise."

"We must have another jail delivery of spies," one of the committee laughed and a murmur of assent passed through the chamber. Violet was brought for an Abbis Abbaianian detective soldier by the guard. They brought the accusation and the detective leaned across the desk to her.

"Now look here," he said sagaciously to her shaking a pencil two and her.

"It does no good for you kids to lie. We know all about it. The general was looking every where for you. A hundred of my followers all swear you were the last person seen out with that man spy. You better make just what happened. Were you not leading him two of the headquarters of the princesses?" "No," said Violet. "I am princess Violet." They arrested her by mistake. "The office looked more savage. He felt indescribably lonely as she sat there and faced him. If she could only say the word of prove her identification she would be released with plenty of apologies but through some cause she had temporarily lost her natural voice so it could not be recognized. He knew now that who had brought the message was a fake, that she had been with a real Glandelinian spy luring her to death and that this mistake had saved her life. But if she couldn't prove her identity she would go to her death any how."

Ever since she and her sisters were in such danger the soldiers were apprehensive and in savage fury and spies would be put to death in a short time and children spies of her own age too if they were at her and her sisters. She knew now that companion with the note was guilty, and knew he had now added to his other war crimes that of attempting to murder her and the timely arrest by her friend Nance had saved her. Deliberately she twisted the truth and then telling it better saying that the man who had been with her was the real spy and she showed the decoy note which she still had in her possession. Yes she had been lured by this man with the fake note but she was no decoy of him his knowing nothing of his intention. The military detective leaned across the desk at her.

"Then I'm to understand this man was a spy," he snapped sarcastically. Then pounding the desk with his fist he thundered:

"One of our officers was shot with his own gun--and you held that gun. That gun was found in your possession. Then began an ordeal of cross questioning as he tried to shake her story. After a long ordeal of this in which he won nothing for the agents upheld her--she was taken into another room where a number of officers bombarded her with many questions. Finally when they got tired of third degreeing her that day feeling her she was fed a latex and hysterical, to a cell."

3 He spent a ghastly night with his thoughts wondering what his sister would think and do and could they dare cast their disguises go to Fredrick Nance and prove to him his mistake. Sleep was impossible, although she was physically exhausted. He never needed Penrod's company so much in his life as she did now as she tossed upon her jail cot. But Pen - Penrod was many miles away. He buried his face in his hands and cried bitterly. It was all because of that treacherous spy who had hoodwinked her with that fake note. It was all so unexplainable so impossible to believe. And she was accused of shooting down an officer who had never even seen the gun before. Her exhaustion must have finally claimed her for it was now the next day when she felt some one shaking her as she opened her eyes. A Matron was standing over her, a soldier by her side.

"Well my spy had you a-re going to be cross examined again. First we a-re going to find out who and why you a-re here as a spy!"

Poo-Violet didn't believe him. Feeling she was to be grilled further she was taken into the chief of the military detectives office. He waved her to a chair his manner as beque as before.

"mother of the spies has confessed so we are holding you for investigation [in] investigation. We are sure you are a decoy of the spy who got away and he wouldn't give himself up so they are searching for him high and low. Even though you are a spy and face the penalty of a spy I cannot help but admit it even though you were trying to shield a criminal criminal who would have murdered the princess through your help."

Violet found herself too weak to answer. Then her emotions got the best of her and thinking how her sisters would feel if she were to die as a spy the tears came streaming down her cheeks copiously.

"When she had gained control of herself she asked if they would not get proof from her sisters that she was telling the truth. The chief detective hesitated a moment, then nodded his assent.

"If the Vivian girls can be located and prove our mistake all will be well" he answered.

"Is there not anything I can do?" she asked wildly wishing fiercely there was for she could imagine a feeling of the rope already around her neck, and to be killed by her own followers was the saddest thing of all.

called by her own followers was the saddest thing
 "No, I'll have to find proof." He was led away to his desk to where the telephone was and she started miserably back to her cell. She was led to the bench and she tried to pour out the whole truth of what had happened and saying that she was not a boy but a girl, and the Princess Violet. He listened grave and silently respectful. She could not seem to understand why then she had so foolishly gone with the spy in the first place.

"How can we believe it when we do not know whether you are telling lies or not just to save you -self from hanging," she said expressing doubt yet.

"But I am princess violet" she cried passionately passionately. I am no Glandelinian boy spy. How could I fail to think when my brother is so far away and I'm so lonely for him and revealing that note."

"Well I can't do nothing as you have no proof" she said. "The general would not take my word for it without a proof. General Nance found you what that spy Harry Donohue a notorious Mandelminian spy who is bent on killing the Princess and you being with him as a decoy put you in very hot water. How could you expect him to believe otherwise. And your voice doesn't sound like that of the Princess."

Violet dreaded the coming of the next day execution day. Would she really hang. Would not there be a way to safety before it was too late. For the woman was. For the woman was right. Just at that time too the detective came and said no trace of the princesses could be found out where they lived. Violet listened to him in silence and grief and dread, the one little spark of hope she had no desperately clung to snuffing itself out like a candle. Now that her sisters were her sisters could not be found she felt completely out and she prayed desperately for the guardian or possession angels to shield her. Captured by the Glandelinians was sport. She could easily get away nearly every time. No escape. To escape when a prisoner among the Christians was impossible. And she was to hang to morrow on the charge of deceiving a spy was the vivian girl Princess head quarters. The hours dragged toward the dreaded time. Just two hours before the time set for the short trial she had an unexpected visit from a military court marshal defendant. He had introduced himself. He introduced himself and he was ushered into her cell, and he came at once to the purpose of his visit.

"This is a rather delicate mission he ; come on" he began watching her closely. "you have as you know being captured with a spy named Harry Little or no defense at the trial, and ; come to ask you to come out truthful with you and or and it may be better for you."

and it may be better for you."

"I hear as id" in what way can I help myself? I'll be only too glad to do all I can to prove that not only am I innocent but that I am what, say."

"G od that is what I wanted to hear. Now here is what you are to do. I'm building a scaffold for your defense on an unwritten law plea and, want to cooperate with me by testifying to that effect at the trial."

"You mean to swear that I am to swear that I---"

"Exactly" he said quickly sparing himself from putting it into words. You are to tell the truth that you did kill that officer to save you - whom when you surp

He surprised him in his tent. It's your only chance of saving you - self."

"She stared at him dully."

"No I came of my own accord," she answered. "You could plead that you went with that spy under stress of compulsion, that you confessed under duress, and that you had no intention of leading him toward the headquarters of Violet and her princess sisters. But the fact that you almost got caught red handed with him makes this ridiculous. That one chance of your acquittal rests in you rhania."

"but I can't do that," she said slowly, desperately. "I cannot say that, I am some one else when I am not."

"You mean you wouldn't do this to save you a life kid. Do you realize you may go to hang on the charge of harboring or being accessory to a spy and shooting to death an office man?"

"You don't know what you are asking me!" she cried out protestingly.
"Oh yes I do," he returned calmly. I am merely doing what you want me to do what any one else would do under the circumstances if they had the opportunity. You were arrested by General Knes Nance and he is terrible to those who try to harm the princesses in any way."

"Oh let me let me be..." she cried suddenly jumping to her feet. "Do n't you know, I know that --- I, a little girl in disguise as a boy and I can have it proved that I, m Princess Violet herself, a rrested as a foe spy by mistake." He got up from his chair picking up his brief case. At the door she hesitated as she sank back on the cell bed.

"Then you will have to prove it. If you can't and am really what they arrested you for, I'm so sorry. I gave you a chance and you refused it." "God help me that I can prove it" she said. If only she was not so broken down and excited she could have thought of her disguise which she could have removed in a hurry especially her head disguise.

After she left the matron came. Violet turned a tear stained face up to hers.

"What else can I do. I cannot be somebody else. Et the spy pay for the crime for which I am not to blame. Oh I feel it was my fault."

for which I am not to blame. On the other hand, if you are innocent then I will be the happiest woman on earth for I'd hate to see such a good looking little boy like you strangle by the rope.. But where did you get the perfume."

"You must have had some on you" she said as she prepared to leave. "That afternoon the trial started. Through it all another spy sat unmotional and dare devil and stolid never once betraying what was going on in that passible and passive face of his violet could not help from crying. Two hours after the two hours after the trial if she could not prove her identity she would be gone from her sister's forever. He feared not for her self but for them. If she was dead they would never recover from the shock. She knew that that spy himself was no man to deserve any sympathy. Then she was called to the defendants post. She never shall she forget her feelings as she took the stand in the front row of spectators as her eyes fell on the matron. Her eyes were all sympathy for the poor little "boy". The prosecuting attorney asked her a few questions and she could see that he was trying to keep her in the background to disconnect her altogether from the actual murder of the officer. When he finished another soldier stepped forward a smile of confidence on his face. He began shooting questions at her. Defiantly he led up to Violet an admittance that she had received the fake note and whether she herself had not compiled Penrod's handwriting to cause trouble for the prisoners. Then suddenly he let fire at her in a piercing dramatic voice;

"Tell us frankly, in your own words--just what took place in the road when General Vance arrested you."

A tension gripped the court-martial room. She was the cynosure of all eyes. Altering but not ashamed, she began her story, of how she had received the note and went with the man thinking he was leading her to her brother Penrod.

"And you were in that man's possession when you were arrested." The man flung at her. A hush had fallen over the court room.

"Yes."

"Then what have you to say for yourself?" he demanded his eyes searching her. "Or have you thought up any more allies to stuff the court room with?" Violet couldn't answer. She felt too choked up.

A few minutes passed and the trial was over. She didn't know what would happen as she wasn't proclaimed guilty or not guilty. Maybe the judge was a little suspicious and determined to find out facts before going ahead. The other spy was declared guilty, and sentenced to die.

In the meantime James had seen the disaster overtake Violet just at that appointed hour. He saw the general check his horse before he and the man. He for some reason or other recognized the man instantly, but did not recognize the general. His first impulse was to rush forward to her assistance but the hopelessness of any attempt at interference instantly struck him. The only hope was of getting her sister to follow. He must tell them as he knew where she would be taken. To the National Assembly jail.

At first when he reached the house he could not assume courage to enter it but stood for a short time outside until Mrs. Jerry put her head out of the window. He succeeded in catching her eye and placing his fingers on his lips signed to her to come down. A minute later she appeared at the door.

"Is it all true James? They say they are executing the wicked spies who attempted to harm the little girls."

"It is true Mrs. Jerry. I have seen some of it myself and though it was horrible God knows it was justified. If they can't leave a little holy child alone alone it would be a sin not to. But Violet is captured, she's a prisoner."

"Oh my Dear Blessed Mother!" the old woman cried, bursting into tears. That pretty good little girl, the pretty holy transfigured little baby I nursed. To think of her murdered and soon captured by Glandorians and the poor young things up stairs but not yet home. They are at general Double Day Federals. Oh what shall I do, my God what shall I do James. Oh angels that possess her protect her."

"The situation is not bad if they can come and identify her," said James. "Just east easy Mrs. James. She is not captured by the enemy but by a Christian general who mistook her for a spy. If they know they can go to her rescue. You must break it to them. Do they know how great the danger of the spy house was?"

"No I have kept it from them. They could see from the windows that something unusual is going on every one can see that. But I told them it was only the soldiers were advancing. They are anxious very anxious but quite unprepared for this."

"Break it quickly to them Mrs. Jerry. Tell them that Violet is captured not by the enemy but by the Christians and that to save her they must go to the assembly dressed as the lowly selves and identify her."

"But will you not come up James, they will be back soon, they must in you so much. Your presence will be a support to them."

"As long as I do not know when they will be back I can do nothing. Nothing now." Har James said sadly. "All they must do is to stay and identify her. They know the way to the assembly. I will come this evening. The first burst of grief will be over then and my talk will aid them to rouse themselves to her rescue. As long as they can prove she is their sister I do not fear for her as her arrest is only a mistake. It is deceiving that even her thousands of spies who were bent on murdering her and her sisters would be put to death, but it must not be that she should share the same awful fate when she is not an enemy. It would be even disastrous to the cause."

Finding that she could not persuade James to enter Mrs. James turned to perform her painful duty, while James throughout exhausted made his way home and throw-328 the throwing himself on his bed fell asleep and did not wake until evening. His first step was to plunge his head into water, and then after a good wash to prepare a meal. His sleep has used his energy, and with brisk steps he made his way through the company streets to the headquarters of Violet and her sisters. His knock with his knuckles at the outer doors of her apartment. The old nurse opened it quietly.

"Come in," she said and sat down. They are in their room and think they have striven hard to find traces of her sister but could not. They are in their room and have cried themselves to sleep. My heart has been breaking all day to see them. It has been dreadful. The youngest of the little girls cried as if they were lost angels and sobbed for hours and could not be comforted, but Jennie Joice and Angeline did not cry. Joice fainted, and when I got her round she lay still and quiet without speaking. Jennie poor child she is the worst of all believe she still is sitting on her chair with her eyes staring open and her face may still be as white as it was. She did not seem to hear anything I said at all but at last when the sobs of the young ones were stopping I began to talk to her about her little sister Violet and her pretty ways, and telling her that surely she would be saved in time by the possession angels and that her arrest only showed the soldiers were more vigilant than they then supposed and really would mean that such a mistake shows no spies will be able to do anything. But I could not comfort her. She said her sister would be hanged before she could prove her identity, that she had no means to do so and she broke down, and cried so terribly and wildly that I was frightened, and then Angeline and Joice cried too, and after a while I persuaded them all to lie down and as I have not heard a sound for the last hour I hope the good God has sent them all to sleep.

"It may be good but I must see them as I know where she is having found out and they must get to her before it is too late," said James. "He hanged to night at six o'clock. It is now two in the afternoon. I must see them. They must get there with me and identify her."

He entered carefully and found they were not asleep. When he entered Daisy Hettie and Catharine ran to him, and one of them throwing her arms around his neck burst into a passion of tears once more. James felt that this was the best thing that could have happened for the others were occupied for some time trying to soothe her crying quietly to themselves as they did so. At last her sobs became less violet especially as James sat in a chair and held her in an embrace.

"A nd now James," Joice said turning to him. "Will you tell us all about it?"

"Do not I pray you ask me any questions now. We must think of saving her while we have time. I know where she is. I must lead you there dressed as your own selves in your own uniforms to identify her. Fortunately you must remember that these human tigers have been executed and that you can probably go the company streets without disguise. Come. Forget your crying please and for God's sake act girls. She'll face the rope at six o'clock. It is ten after two."

"What are we going to do James. How can we get there in time?" Jennie asked.

"I know what I am doing, Jennie. I will tell you presently."

They quickly discarded their disguises and then in their best came out.

"Oh James for God's sake do you think we can really save her on time?" Hettie exclaimed bursting into tears again while Jennie stood outside in the company street motionless.

"Oh for goodness sake don't be so despairingly," laughed James.

"Oh we won't be said trying to smile through her tears. "Our place is with her, and where she goes we will go. You are so good to lead us to the prison. Let's go to her at once."

"We can do her good if we get to her in time dear princesses." James said gently.

"We all can help if we are in the hands of the foe we could not do so and then it would only add to her misery if you were also in their hands. But she is a prisoner of those who even really love her because they do not recognize her in her disguise. Trust to me girls, we will do all in our power to save her and there is no risk."

Little Daisy was still weeping as they started along. "Our dear Daisy do not give way, I depend on your dear little head to help me take the shortest routes to the prison, and Jennie till we get her back you have to fill Violet's place and look after your younger sisters."

The appeal was successful even though Jennie burst into a passion of tears at her words. James did not try to check them and in a short time the sobs ceased as they came toward a large building and Jennie raised her head again.

"I feel better now," she said. "Come sisters, dry your eyes darling. We may not need to cry any longer."

"That's the building," said James pointing.

They soon reached the structure and being known well by the guards were as the law required challenged but allowed them to pass. They were soon before the President of the Military spy Committee. He and the members welcomed the little girls as if they were his and their own beloved daughter and then James spoke up.

"I'm positive sure he said that the boy that General Nance arrested if that sister violet in disguise. Could not allow these little girls to prove her identification."

"If we have made a mistake and the general too we can be heartily sorry," said the president. "But you understand princesses we made no wrong. You little girls were in such dire danger from assassins in spies that we arrested any one who couldn't identify herself or himself. The little spy doesn't speak like a girl though he claims he is your sister violet. Is she missing?"

"Yes," said Jennie. "But James can prove it because he knows the disguise she wore and saw General Nance arrest her."

The president gave an order and the marshal went out to go to the prison quarters of the assembly. He found violet praying and weeping on her bed in her cell. He roused her and said more gently:

"You have a chance to identify yourself my child. Tell me the truth. Are you Violet Angelicivian?"

"Yes."

"Positive?"

"Yes Yes."

"All right you have a chance to prove it. If we made a mistake we are dreadfully sorry but it was for your own good. Come out to the Assembly Hall. There are little girls out there who too claim they are your sisters and a boy says he too can prove it. If you are we will give to all the redress possible for our mistake and treatment we accorded you."

She was sobbing out she was led sobbing out and when she was given time to control herself she was brought out into the assembly hall. James said nothing. She only looked at her and then gently snatched away her head and disguise and she stood the unmistakable likeness of violet herself a little girl whom no one could really truthfully duplicate. It seemed from the crowd she suffered that she looked more prettier and transfigured than ever.

"He is our sister," said voice. "We can prove it in other ways."

"I believe we had better notify General Nance so he won't think we gave up her by mistake," said the president. "He holds us responsible for her."

The president went to the telephone and getting connected with the general headquarters called for the general. When there came Hello the president said:

"General the Princesses are here and they have proven you have made a mistake and arrested Violet Angelicivian in disguise as a boy. Unless you come quick and suspend the sentence you'll be in trouble. This is the president speaking. Yes come quick. It is Princess violet you had arrested. All right. Good bye."

He turned to the little girls.

"He'll be over only by six o'clock. He said he cannot get off his duty now. But he'll withdraw the sentence, but if she is really violet he said she must get rid of her disguise and wear what she usually does, put on the disguise in her possession. Have you brought anything along for her?"

"I have my original uniform under my disguise," said violet. "It's only a matter to change my hair to its original."

"Then do so, but you'll have to wait here until six o'clock. He hardly doesn't believe because his voice was very sarcastic over the phone and he wants a proof. He believes too you little girls could also be hoodwinked by some body. As you are in such a corner in such dire peril every one of us have to be awfully watchful. If we do not be you could hold us responsible if any thing happened to any one of you."

"Yes that is so," said voice, "and despite the mistake we appreciate it very much for that shows no one who is disguised can get through any where and so we know we are safe, put violet dear" almost reproachfully "why didn't you stay home. How come you were out in the open where you got arrested by mistake."

Violet who still had it showed the daisy message.

"That man fooled me," she said tearfully, and spitefully. "I found out later had General Nance not arrested me by mistake he would have tried to murder me in the open, but I don't believe he would have. I could flash my knife in a hurry. He escaped when I got arrested. But General Nance knows him."

"So," said Jennie as she looked over the note as she thought for a moment of her experience once and of Fredrick Lowden. "It was Fredrick Lowden?"

"No," said violet. "It was a man, by the name of Harry Donohue. He was not old though and did not look suspicious. I would not have thought anything if when I was arrested General Nance didn't mention it. He ordered his arrest too, but he got away."

"I'm surprised though you fell for it after knowing of my experience," said Jennie.

"Oh but I was so lonesome for a friend that all other feeling got the better of me," said violet tearfully. "I never suspected treachery. I believed it was my angels that caused the general to come along at that time and arrest me in my disguise. But justly I sure wish he had captured that snake too. But he got away the coward."

The little girls were motioned to benches to sit on by the president who said "You may be hungry. I'll order some supper for you which you can eat while waiting. It is too bad your sister was taken by mistake but as Violet said it was probably the designs of the angels who possess her though why they would permit his escape is a mystery to me. So his name is Harry Donohue. Sounds foreign to me, like I wish. If he is a foreigner and is captured he'll get it worse for spying for the enemy. He has no business being with them."

As if to make up for all the trouble Violet suffered the president had a pretty good supper prepared for them, and then they were called into the dining room used by the officers of the assembly where they had one of the best meals they ever tasted for a long time. When they were finished, as Violet and her sisters are always very slow eaters it was just about half past five. Though they came not for it, just to accuse them in better spirits the president insisted that the children should drink at least two small cups of strong coffee without anything in it, especially if they have to drink it it is the only way they will, and after some considerable coaxing, Violet and her sisters did, but James wouldn't saying he didn't need it but would take a little wine which he did. Of course the Graces before meals and After James led.

When they were through the little girls offered to wash the dishes but the president declined the offer saying:

"We have employees for that. Don't cheat them out of a job in these times." However it was not a long wait, for some how or other General Nance came sooner than he had predicted. However violet alone first was called to the Detective quarters and her sisters had to wait, in the Assembly.

When violet was taken into the chief detective's office again he waved her into a chair looking intensely surprised at her features, his manner not at all brusque this time and he was more respectful than anything else. Standing near him was General Nance and he looked sad and embarrassed.

"Well Princess violet," said the detective you can go home now and sleep all you want to," he said. "We are sorry for our mistake and hope you'll forgive the general for her. You disguise, and the fact of being with that scoundrel whom he knew as well as he knows himself completely deceived him, and your voice too didn't sound like you. We are going to let you go."

At first violet couldn't hardly believe him. Still thinking she was to be killed for the she still stood and did not sit down.

"A little after you were captured why didn't you reveal your true self by discarding your disguise," said the general himself slightly reproachful. I could not help it if I made you a prisoner when I thought you was a Glandelinian boy spy, and you being with that scum of Glandelinia entirely fooled me and your voice sounded stern at range. You know you and your sisters were in danger any minute of being killed as many spies were discovered with all sorts of murderous implements in their possession even bombs powerful weapons powerful enough to blow the house up at one explosion and they were all put to death for that reason. We ordered that to show the enemy he is going to fight. The fact that orders were to arrest all in disguise and who couldn't give a satisfactory explanation of themselves caused this blunder so that is the reason I arrested you."

"What happened to your voice. Have you got a cold," he added.

"No, I lost it by so much talking before," went out, said violet.

"Well it grieves me that I made the mistake, but you must pardon it Princess by knowing it was my duty when you and your sisters are in such a danger and no one can be free who cannot explain themselves. The reason why you were not sentenced as it seemed was because the president wanted to investigate and find out who you really were so that even though rumors were you a harg at six o'clock was false, put as it is you fathers orders we cannot exempt Glandelinian child spies from the death penalty because of the wickedness of Glandelinian cause, and because they won't exempt you from the death penalty. Let them quit persecuting you and we'll withdraw the death sentence for their child spies too. We hanged three hundred of them to day and many were girls."

I would suggest that you little girls go now and stay at my own headquarters and do not disguise again as spies know you any how, and besides it is too dangerous if you were mistaken for spies again or your sisters. Disguise only when going out for your sakes don't let us make the mistake again. When I saw so many child spies were also here to try and slay you little girls my fury was beyond control and princess allow me to commend, that good forbearance of yours in this trial you had the most dangerous of all. I can't help but admire it, even though you know you saved a chance of death without any escape whatever but listen to reason, and don't wear disguises within the Christian lines, and stay at my place and have your house kept the same too. My place is more strongly guarded and as most of the spies are totally disposed of you are safe now. And another thing why disguise. If it is true that your little girls are angel possessed, all Hell will try against you and cannot even touch you. Don't be alarmed. Danger can threaten but would not come. Don't be alarmed. We'll keep up till we capture every spy still at large."

Violet who had finally seated herself found herself too weak to rise for a moment. She was free again. Then her emotions got the best of her and the tears again came streaming down her cheeks, but the general produced his clean handkerchief and wiped them away saying:

"When you are turned to your sister please don't go in crying. Let them know that all is forgotten, just take my advice and for God's sake don't wear disguises within the Christian lines. It is extremely dangerous when no one knows who you are, and you too my boy James. Get that off you got on and wear your own."

"And said the Chief Detective you must remember what a lot of trouble we go through for nothing when we get fooled. Six times persons have been arrested who were no enemies because they were disguised. Not only should you little Princesses cast off disguises in the Christian lines but should issue orders positively forbidding the use of them under penalty. Wearing disguises here may cause serious complications and you know Violet you had a very narrow escape from being hung. Think what would have happened had we done that. It would be disastrous to us all. Go if any one wears a disguise within the Christian lines and we arrest any one by mistake remember it is absolutely not our fault, even if we happened to hang that party. They take their own chances. Those spies can't get you. I know it. If they could they would have gotten you long before this. So dear take our advice and cancel wearing disguises within the Christian lines. It would only put you in hopeless peril should you be arrested by some one who knows you not, and who would not even believe any one claiming either one of you is a spy and take good advice and leave off disguises within the Christian lines. And I believe Princess Violet from what you went through last night is a less lesson by experience which I hope you won't forget. That shows it is more dangerous to be caught within our lines with a disguise than within the enemy's. In our lines you know well escape is impossible."

"We will take your advice," said Violet, and my sister will too."

"And I better take up quarters at my place where you will be safe until the reign of terror caused by this Depressionville battle is over."

said General Nance, "as he gave her a kiss on the forehead. "That is a dress for my mistake. My place is much better than that old ramshackle place you are in now, and I'll try my best to see to it too that you'll be able to regain your place in General Nance's army until the army moves. My spies will hardly paste you any longer."

"I will do so," said Violet. "We won't wear disguises in the Christian lines again. I had enough of last night's experience and feel awful shaky yet."

She was soon back to her sisters.

"I'm free," she said. "The general is heart broken also that he made the mistake but he says we are foolish to wear disguises within the Christian lines. He advises to reside at his headquarters and have our house kept with us and James there. He said it is a better place and cleaner."

"Are we to go to our old home first?"

"Yes. We must tell Mrs. Jerry."

"Have they taken that spy too?" she asked of James.

"I do not know Princess Jennie, that is the first thing to find out, for if they have, other spies will be full of vengeance, and then General Nance's advice is true, it would not be safe for us to return. Let us push on now get home and pack up and go to his headquarters, and let off the disguise business within the Christian lines. I'm going to discontinue mine before I even go out or I might even be arrested and you would not even save me."

Mrs. Jerry was out when you was captured Violet and she went out when we came to get you believing to make a good hot supper for you. Here Violet you need something to steady your nerves. Take a little nip of this brandy. It won't hurt you and will do you good. There, oh not such a little swallow. That's right. Now you'll feel better. We will go inside the house and wait for her but I recognize that spy. You go in girls I will place my self at the corner and wait for an hour while you and the house keepers make preparations. The spy may be mad and will spend some looking for the many of your little girls or Violet, but if he does not come by the end of that time, I shall feel sure it is because he cannot come, and in that case he may be captured, but if he does come believe me I'm going to open upon him good."

They hurried on until they were nearly home, the brisk walk having as James had believed it would do had the effect of preventing their thoughts from dwelling upon Violet's capture even though she was now free for fear of the after-effects of it. They went in and he had been not more than a quarter of an hour at his post, when James gave an exclamation of satisfaction, stepped behind a tree and shouted with all his might:

"Halt there Mr. Donohue. I know you."

The man however did not halt but fired a shot, and then disappeared down a side company street, James having answered the shot but missing. Violet and her sisters ran to the windows at hearing the shots with their own pistols ready for they too would have opened fire. They saw the man run down a side street, and they poured in their own fire downing the man dead in an instant from even that distance. A great crowd of soldiers ran to the spot, some going toward their headquarters in dismay.

"They killed the spy who deceived Violet," cried James. "I fired first but missed."

"Good old James," laughed one of the soldiers. "Don't bother yourselves about him. He was getting it coming to him and got it. Some of us will move his unworthy carcass. So at least as can be seen those who do harm to the little girls."

Then while the soldiers were taking the body out of sight, came another report that a spy was found in the care of two others, one delirious, the ill one was of course disposed off into a hospital the two others arrested. Then came the house keepers laden with something to eat while and the little girls left the house and hurried to meet them.

"Thank God and His Blessed Mother your sister Violet have been spared you and you are all safe dear," she exclaimed with tears streaming down her cheeks. "I thought of you poor Violet in the middle of it all but I was sure James would see what was being done and get Violet out of it. And Violet didn't deny, how did you double cross her away. I have been terribly anxious thinking that he might come here and shot as you through a window or bomb the house, and that would have been dreadful."

"So he might have done," said Violet "but James got him."

"James got him," said the boy. "You are greatly mistaken princess. I detected him and you shot him."

"We shot him but you got him it is true," said Jennie. "But for you he would have escaped. You shooting brought us to the window and he was within easy sight of us going down a side street. We had handy rifles ready and plugged the treacherous snake."

"How did he escape when you was arrested by mistake?" asked the Housekeeper.

"My said Violet, when the general looked away for a moment, he to create confusion almost knocked me down, and slipped away into the crowd of soldiers. I didn't see where he went or I would have caused his capture which would have been bad for him when I succeeded in proving who he was. He shouted to the soldiers to seize him too as the general recognized him but he was gone, the soldier even getting descriptions of him couldn't find him."

"I felt sure," said the housekeeper that your possession on angels guided you and that James would come home again with you."

"It is General Nance's advice that none of us use disguises within the Christian lines so as to avoid another mistake," said Violet. "He also must lodge with General Nance he is one of our dearest friends, and was broken down because of his mistake but it ain't our fault. That snake was responsible. What made it hard for me is because I was with him, my voice could not sound natural when I spoke and so he thought I was a clandestine boy scout acting as a decoy, and then impersonating myself when I said I was Princess Violet."

"General Nance has the best idea," the old woman said. "But I don't think Princess Violet you would have very quickly met a tragic death. Some one would have some how by the protection of your angels found out the truth for they would have been sure to publish the fact that you had been taken and with you missing from your sisters and knowing you had not gone out of camp, all soldiers would begin to say, 'The dear Princess Violet is missing and she has not left camp.' And then they would have talked, officers and generals would have investigated, gone to your sisters for details and so on, ask you of the nature of her disguise and the end of it would have been you would have been discovered and freed. Will you accompany them to Nance's headquarters."

"I will come after it is dark Mrs. Jerry. I have to go home also and pack and I have to see by boy scout friend Louis. He was wounded yesterday by a shell concussion and is delirious."

"I hope you do soon. What will be your plan?" asked Jennie smiling sweetly through her tears of gratitude and placing a loving arm around his shoulder.

"As soon as possible I can make up one more than that, I cannot tell you now. Some day further on when you and your sisters are together I will tell you the events of the last forty-eight hours. Fortunately your sister Violet escaped the dreadful peril she was in because I saw to where she was taken when arrested, but it may not be so another time so we'll take the general's advice and not wear disguises here. I know how lonesome you are too for your brothers and Penrod but we cannot turn our thoughts to us making our way to the Vivian army when there is such peril every where outside the Christian lines that it may cost a miracle to save you. The enemy no doubt has cut off all communications so that even you can't get word to your parents and brothers. They can't get word to you. Do not believe any notes sent to you. I think it will be useless for us to try and reach the Christian army under your father and mother just yet. Men in towns possessed by Christians they will be on the look out for fugitive spies and so forth and no matter what the you wear your own clothes or disguise you could not escape observation and if they arrested you and didn't know you you would have a lot to do to prove your identification. I think then if you really late on desire to try and get to the Vivian army we must make for the McHollister Run river and to go so by an under-sea boat too. That would be only the way, but as there is so much danger we must not hurry. In the first place we must settle all our plans carefully and prepare our disguises and find where you can get a submarine and allow you can trust to operate it, in the next place there will be such tremendous excitement when the news of what has happened here is known that it would be unsafe to travel. I think my self it will be best to wait a while till we find out the termination of this battle now raging. Or until there is a lull. That is what I want you to think over and decide. Now that so many deadly spies have been caught and executed you will not be in any danger and those who are still at large will be too scared to pester you, and from what I hear thirty others have been captured and are marked out as the next victims. They say Stanton has denounced them and proof has been found on them. At any rate it will be better to get everything in readiness for to go to General Nance's head quarters as he suggested and we might get him to find a way to get correspondence with General Vivian who can communicate to your father and what ever brothers are with him. Then when all is safe we can leave at once for the Vivian army. I believe too Penrod is as much upset over the separation as you are if not more so. A boy loving his sisters as he does really may feel more lonely. Often recently I have heard that song played by bands "God be with you till we meet again" and it was my favorite piece I used to play it on my Phonograph as often as I can. But girls don't look reproachful if I say that since all this, I can't bear that song, hate it it brings a lump right into my throat and often I see the tears in your eyes. If such a band plays that command it to be stopped or you will feel worse and worse till you can't stand it."

James was pleased to find that his suggestion answered the purpose for which he made it. The little girls helped the housekeeper get everything in readiness for the moving and their thoughts were turned for a slight time from the separation from Penrod they had sustained. After an hour's talk he left them greatly benefited and before going to his place to pack up went to see his friend Louis. The fever was still at its height, and the doctor gave but small hope for his recovery. The doctor said that the boy had been struck by a good sized shell fragment in the hip. He was glad too to be main within the Federal army, and this was more than easy for the new army from some provinces showed that the situation was a very where as bad as it was at Depressionville, even though the camps had all ready been recaptured, and reestablished, but the battle was still on, and the enemy was making attempts with insane fury to retake it and the conflict was more severe and bloody than ever.

Indeed just for the sake of Violet and her sisters all Glandelinian prisoners found General Double Day Federal army a perfect sign of terror more than the reign of terror in France during that dreadful and bloody revolution. The Abolitionian Commune had sent to all the military committees within the still safe portions of General Vivian's lines and other committees acting in connection with them throughout the whole extensive army the news of the execution of the deadliest enemies of the Vivian girls captured with evidence against them to destroy the prisoners, and urged that a similar step should be taken at once with reference to all spies who it could be proved even there had entered the Christian lines with the same deadly purpose and they had the evidence against them. The order was promptly obeyed but no such spies however were detected there. The rage of the battle itself was a carnival of massacre of soldiers on both sides and horror beyond description, and the madness and madness of the battle raged as it seemed through out the whole country. Such being the case James had found it had found it by no means difficult to dissuade the little girls from taking instant steps to try and get to the Vivian army lonesome as they were for their parents and brothers. He however was in a state of great glee and easiness now. He knew within the Christian lines they were safe. Deputies of Glandelinian spies had been seized, others being discovered had sought safety in flight, and the search for suspected persons was carried on more vigorously than even Van in the face of being captured again by mistake it was difficult and dangerous to travel through that part of Calveinia with the little girls, and therefore he would not attempt it unless it could be done by river and in a submarine. As soon as he had about packed up his belongings, he received another surprise and at first a shock too. He had bought a paper from one of the soldiers shouting them for sale in the street, and sat down in the garden to read it. A great portion of the space was filled with lists of the enemies' deadly enemies of the Vivian girls who had been caught with dreadful evidence of their intentions and had been justly executed by the whole sal, either by shooting, sword or hanging.

James from curiously glanced at the names his eyes traveling rapidly down the list until he gave a start and low cry. Under the heading of persons executed were the names of Francis Ernest, Jules Ernest his brother, and Peter Tullery, chief and conductors of the spies arrested and executed in the act of endeavoring to leave the Christian lines in disguise after having been accused to try to blast the Vivian girls' headquarters with a high explosive bomb. The shape and size of the bomb was shown in the paper and the faces of the three ring leaders of the spies. For some time at thinking of their narrow escape the little girls sat as if stunned. He had scarcely given a thought to spies of this kind before. He knew of the escape of these spies before their capture however, and when he thought of their escape it had been already as in the fog lines. He had thought that if they had been arrested on the way he should have been sure to hear of it, and the leading spy Peter had such sagacity that he believed he luckily that he would certainly be able to escape with his two companions through any difficulty and danger justly against them which might beset them. And now he saw that his fears of their escape had been ill founded—that these arch scoundrels had been arrested when almost within sight of the Glandelinian encampments, and had been executed.

At first he felt crushed by the news of the narrow escape of the little girls. A very warm affection had sprung up between them and him, while from the first the dear good little girls had attached themselves to him, and now their possession angels were working, their three worst spy enemies were dead. Upon one thing he determined at once, and that was until his charges were safely in the army of their father and mothers they should not hear a whisper of this narrow escape or they would not sleep at night for fear of some one trying to repeat where the three scoundrels did not succeed. Indeed it was good too that the little girls had discarded their disguises through the mistake of General Nance for also before this because of their disguises and the soldiers not knowing who they were in that house, their suspicions had been aroused, and they might have been arrested there as little spies in disguise.

After this he went again to his little injured friend.

"He is quieter, much quieter," the red cross nurse replied. "I think he is too weak to have any longer, but otherwise he is just the same. He lies with his eyes open, talking something to himself, but I cannot make out any sense to what he says. The doctor has been here all morning and he said to me that another two days will decide. If he does not take a turn then he will die. If he does he may live, but even then he may not get his reason again. Poor young lad I feel for him as if he were my own son, and so does the doctor."

"You are very good both of you, Nurse," James said, "and my boy scout friend is fortunate indeed to have fallen into such good hands. As it is some time before my princesses' friends will be ready I will sit with him for an hour, and you had better go and get a little fresh air."

"That I will my boy. The lady brother is asleep. He was up with him all last night, and I had a good night. He would have it so."

"Quite right," James said, "you must not knock yourself up, Nurse. You are too useful to others for us to let you do that. To-morrow night if I can I will take my turn."

After dark James presented himself at their headquarters and then they went to General Nance and got there in the proper time not saying a little ahead of time.

All that time during the trip Violet and her sisters could not help express their loneliness for their parents and brothers and to make it worse they passed a band that suddenly for some reason or other started "God be with yes, till they get again you till we meet again." James was so really tempted to shout at them to stop it and Violet reading his mind said;

"Don't we can o r have to bear it. If you do you'll commit an offense and we couldn't even ou r selves save you f rom a punishment. They have to play that."

At e r they were settled down in the new h a headquarters, the little gi rls excepting Violet herself went to bed to try and sleep. Violet wished to solve a plan with James if possible and as soon as all was quiet and she was sitting with him alone;

"Have you thought of anything James?" was Violet's f i r s t question. "He was now alone for he r elds r sister s had i n down and he y oung e r ones had c ried themselves to sleep in the loneliness."

"Thought of what?" he asked.

"Of how we can get any commu n i c a t i o n to Pen r o d o u r p a r e n t s. Neither seems to have written a single note and I believe no l e t t e r s can get through to us."

"I have thought of a number of things," he r e p l i e d, f o r while he had been sitting by Louis's bedside he had turned over in his mind every sort of scheme by which he could help Violet, and he r e s i s t e n s g e t a l e t t e r to the p e n r o d and Pen r o d, "but at present I have f i x e d upon nothing. I have questioned many officers and they said they and the whole army of soldiers have been expecting l e t t e r s f r o m home and elsewhere and nothing comes. I cannot carry out any o r i g i n a l plan of telegraphing unless it can be w i r e l e s s and I found out there is not one wireless station in the army so far and none to r i g i t up. It would r e q u i r e more than one to carry out such a scheme, and the f r i e n d whom I r e l i e d upon before can no longer aid me."

"Who is it?" Violet asked quietly. "Is it Walter John Star r i n g?"

"Why blest me angel child?" James exclaimed in surprise. "How in the world did you ever guess that. Did you r e a d my mind?"

"I felt sure it was Walter all along," said the little gi r l. "In the f i r s t place I never believed he went away. Jennie told me she had begged and prayed him to go, and that she believed he had just pretended to go to please her, f o r she thought she did see him once. She seemed to think it was r i g h t that he should go f o r his safety, but I and my other sister s didn't think so. A boy like him would not run away and leave even a stranger in danger behind, even if they told him to. I felt sure it was not likely. Why here you a l i t t l e foreign boy are staying here and d e s k i n g r i s k i n g your life f o r us, though we are not r e l a t e d to you, and have no c l a i m upon you, while we believe you have a c l a i m of our love f o r you."

"I have no such claim," protested James.

"Oh yes you have f o r what you have done f o r us. And how could Walter Star r i n g run away. But as Jennie and I seemed please to think he was safe I and my younger sister s said nothing; but I know if he had gone we should never again look upon him as a f r i e n d. But we all felt sure he wouldn't do it, and that he was here within the Christian lines, having secretly followed us. Then again you did not tell us the name of the f r i e n d who was helping you, we knew at our f i r s t question you almost slipped and mentioned the name, and we felt sure you must have some reason f o r your silence, so putting the two things together I was sure that it was Walter Star r i n g. What happened to him? Is he mistaken f o r a face in his disguise and arrested and can prove his identity?"

"No he is not arrested," James said "but he is very seriously wounded. He got wounded in defending some of the girls when he went out scouting with them," and as far as he had heard he r e l a t e d the whole c i r c u m s t a n c e s to her. "I blamed myself f o r having let him go, as you may suppose Violet, but the doctor said it was his duty to scout to shelter you and your sister s, and he was responsible a great deal f o r the capture of so many of our deadly assassins who had tried to kill you and your sister s. He is not delirious and not injured enough to be prosecuted in bed but his doctor won't let him remain on duty f o r several days. I may try and see him if possible but he is in a hospital some distance off. Still I should like like you r sister Jennie to know it. I am very glad you have guessed the truth, f o r it is a comfort to talk things over with you as they all say you have the clearest head."

"Poor Jennie and my other dear sister s," Violet said softly "It is well they never knew about it. With their readiness f o r the return of father and our brother s, the thought that Walter had got safely away kept them up, and now tell me about your plans. Could I not in disguise dress myself up in a sort of make up of Adaldefob like my brother did, and help you seize a guard of the enemy's lines so I could get through and sent off a l e t t e r to Pen r o d and father?"

father and an angel little gi r l

father. It is true, I am a little gi r l and I don't look it f r o m my shape and size and the delicate appearance of my arms but I could prove I have the strength of a man. Angel possession gave that to me. I am good at a knife and I wonder if I couldn't flash one and tell the guard I would kill him if he c r o u c h e d o u n s o u n d s the alarm, surely could do too James f o r I could prove it."

"In case he would not know that though he would show fight and so I'm afraid that wouldn't do Violet," James said with a slight smile shaking his head. "It would be a most desperate enterprise f o r even sixteen others with us. But too it would never do f o r you to run the risk of being separated f r o m your other sister s who are so broken up about their father and Pen r o d, and---and---confound that band passing by. I wish they would stop that song. I ought to tell them not to do it here, but remember you are leader to them and they can not get along without you. The next plan I thought of was to try and get appointed as a sentry boy scout at General Doubt Scoble's headquarters, but that seems full of difficulties, f o r I know no one who could get me such a berth, and certainly they would not appoint a boy of my age unless by some extraordinary influence."

"Oh yes they would," Violet decided. "But why be a guard. That would not get us a chance to pass a l e t t e r through enemy territory then; thought if I was to go to the fox lines and pretend to give myself up saying I desire to desert the Christian lines I might get arrested, and put in some prison camp at the rear of the fox lines, and might then get out later and sent off the l e t t e r f o r what, hear the prisoners are not separated but live altogether in the fox lines."

"No, no, James," Violet exclaimed in a tone of sharp pain "you must not do that of all things, f o r it might look too real and you would get in bad by our side too. If they thought you deserted us even if it was your scheme to help us the army would never forgive and I could not save you o r my sister s and f o r the reason we cannot under any conditions cancel the degrees f o r desertion. We too only have you now and if you are once captured even in that fashion by the glandelinians you might never get out again, and if you did, you would not dare return to our arms f o r you would be arrested on the charge of deserting to the enemy, and unless we could prove your real purpose we would be absolutely helpless to save you, besides there are lots of other glandelinian prison camps, and there is no reason why they should send you to one in the rear rather than any where else. I will never consent to that plan to send a l e t t e r through to father and mother and Pen r o d. That is too rash too dangerous."

"I could reveal my plan to the generals first so they would know there is no real desertion on my part but only a scheme to get a l e t t e r through." "No no," said Violet. "The enemy is too dangerous. You know the glandelinians too well to try that."

"Yes you are right," thought it seemed too doubtful to myself James said "Of course if I knew of some other plan to get into the fox lines and out undetected by night I might risk it. But as you say they are dangerous and I know them well, I am glad we killed that dirty snake who played that treacherous trick on you and caused you to be arrested by General Pence by mistake and ran off the sound belly coward, after being a guest at your last headquarters--but I don't see that, that would or will do you and your sister s any good. The most hopeful plan seems to me to try and bribe some of the glandelinian sentries. Some of them no doubt would be glad enough to take money if they could see their way to letting me through the glandelinian camps to sent off the l e t t e r without detection."

"But you know we thought of that before, James, and agreed it would be a terrible risk to try it, f o r the very first sentry you spoke to might shoot you down like a dog f o r it. If you could get an Omani on guard there might be a chance, chance but there are no Omanians in this army. They're mostly Moabites, Amalekites and Qamarians and they're dangerous."

"Of course there is a certain risk Violet any way with even a Merab Omani even though they're more humane. There is no getting any sort of l e t t e r through to the Omani army without running some sort of risk, the thing is to fix on a safe plan as we can. When I did get discovered and escaped then what would it do, the l e t t e r would be lost, however we must think it out well before we try so Pen r o d will know you and your sister s are safe in Double Days army, an army as strong as your father's. A failure would not let the l e t t e r through, it might be fatal, and I do not think there is any pressing danger at present of failing in sending it off if we hit upon the proper plan. It is hardly likely that any of our soldiers are clever at any letters, I have not even heard f r o m my own parents yet, and likely too I hope there will be no repetition of the whole sale slaughter of this battle to me now, and if there is anything like a conflict there will be such numbers engaged, that that even may give us a chance. The battle may be a blessing to me now. I do not mean that we should trust to that only there is time for us to make our plans properly. Have you or your sisters thought of anything?"

"I have thought of all sort of things since you left us this morning James and while even in prison when mistaken for a foe despite my grief, but I was so excited by my peril as being suspected as a foe by spy that they are like you as just vague sort of schemes that do not seem possible when you try to work them out. I do not know whether the soldiers of the enemy would let you inside the lines to sell everything to the soldiers because if they did I might go in with something and see if there was a chance to slip a letter through, or find out how it could be done. Often I spied on the enemy and never failed."

James shook his head...

"I do not think the Glandelinians would allow any one in even for that, nor how good the material you sell, but if they did it would only be a few to whom the privilege would be granted."

"Yes I thought of that James, but one of them might be bribed to let me in and sell something if I give the sentry some of the things for nothing."

"It might be possible" James said. "but there would be a terrible risk, and I don't think there would be any advantage gained by it. Even if you did get in you would be no nearer near getting any letter through. Still we mustn't be disheartened. He can hardly expect to hit upon a scheme at once and, don't think either our heads are clear to day, and you're especially because of the dreadful horror of your imprisonment by mistake, so let us think it over quietly, and perhaps some other idea may occur to one of us. I expect it will be to you with God's help. When you pray before going to bed pray pray for help in your plans and I will do so too. Now good night, you and I must get some sleep, I keep you awake up. I rely very much upon you, Violet, and you don't know what a comfort it is to me that you and your sisters are as calm and brave as you are unusually good and that I can talk things over to you and them. Speak of it to your sister Jennie to morrow morning. I don't know what I should do if I had it all on my own shoulders."

Violet, made no answer but her beautiful eyes were full of tears as she put her hands into that of James, and no sound came to her lips in answer to his good night. She was too overcome.

"That little girl and her sisters are real angels and as brave as they are, and no mistake?" James said to himself as he went to his own room. They have got more pluck than any girls I ever knew of in my own country and are as cool and calm as if they really did come down from heaven. Most little girls would be completely knocked out if they were in their place. Their father and mother far, far away and their brothers too, she and her sisters still set secretly threatened by those dirty Glandelinians lower than the worst gutter-snipes to me, and danger hanging over the little princesses no matter where ever they go, and even within the Christian lines. It is not that they don't feel it. I can see they do quite as much, even far more than people who sit down and howl, and weep to raise the ceiling scream and carry on, and wring their hands. They are a trumps those little girls are and no mistake. I believe it the first time I overheard of time in news papers and from my father but see more now than ever believed. And that is no mistake either. I wonder how it can be when they are as good as people in Heaven itself and all the nation too, but I suppose questions would be raised as "Well why did our Blessed Lord and His Mother suffer so when they were never guilty of any sin either. Some enemies of God I know will persecute His friends to the extreme. This is different than the pagan times. In those times no doubt God said "Father forgive them for they know not what they do." But Glandelinia curse he does know better. He is know no more than Abbiennia does. He knows the Will of God more than any pagan Nationality does and yet she is a foul enemy of God, Heaven and all my own Nationality. Why does God allow this? wonder I suspect God knew what was coming, and that is why he possessed his little beloved ones with angels. I didn't understand such a mystery at first and was almost inclined to doubt it but Heaven I have seen enough of it. That smell of perfume from the little girls is no earthly perfume. I've found that out for, have many various perfumes in my old headquarters which I finally gave to them and they have given it to the more needy ones God Bless them instead of using it all themselves. And how about getting that letter proposed to their parents and Penrod. Oh how sad they looked and they tried their best to hide it from me. I saw it with my quick eye and it cut me to the soul. Damn it there goes a band with that confounded song again. Ain't there enough grief without that reminder's mind. I'm going to take a chance." J Hey "he learned out of the window "Will you fellows of the band can that piece. At least for the sake of the princesses. That song brings memories they do care for and grieves them. Have a heart."

To his surprise the band stopped the piece and marched on silently. Getting over his excitement he then thought, how about the letters to their parents and brothers. They must be got through some how, but how? That is the question. I don't see any possible way except by bribing the Glandelinian sentries to let one go through, and, have not the least idea how to set about it. I think to morrow, will tell the doctor and the red cross nurse who attends the boy Louis all about it, they may know how to accomplish something like that, though it isn't likely that they do, any of three heads are better than one. Maybe the doctor may know some one who knows how to dig up a wire less."

A good Accident, the next morning, he took the doctor and the kind hearted nurse into his council. When they heard that the little princesses wished to find some way to send a letter through the enemy lines to Penrod they were greatly interested and full of sympathy, but they shook their heads when he told them that they were determined at all hazards to get a letter through to their parents and brothers.

"It isn't the risk so much" doctor Jacques said. "That I look at. Life doesn't seem so much account in these sad days of bitter war but how could it be done. Even if you made up your mind to risk your life to get a letter through, I don't see that you would be putting any letters any nearer to Emperor's army. Viviane's army--and the Glandelinian armies are too strongly guarded for anything to get through, except a head long irresistible assault, or a violent wind storm."

"No I don't think it possible to succeed in that sort of way; but if the guards could be bribed, and some other guards put soundly to sleep by drugging their drink, it might be managed. Or we could communicate with somebody who knows how to rig up a wire less station that need not be so high as to be seen by the enemy scouts."

Doctor Jacques looked sharply at James, to see if he was in earnest, and seeing that he was so said dryly:

"Yes if we could do those things, we should no doubt see our way, but how could it be managed."

"That is just the point doctor. In the first place it will be necessary to find out where such a wire less station can be erected without drawing the fire of the enemy, in the second to let Violet, and her sisters know we are working for them, and to learn if possible from their eldest sister, if they know of any man who could know how to erect one, when that is done we should should of course try to get hold of him. Of course if there is such a man he doesn't remain in the prisoner camp all day. However we can see about that after we have found out the first points."

"I know a refugee woman who was ill who is a mother to one of the electrical engineers of the army." the Red Cross nurse or red cross nurse said.

"I don't know whether she is there now or not. Martha is a good holy soul and I know that she herself has often been inside the base hospitals to attend to wounded soldiers. Here her son is at, I don't know, but he is an electrical Engineer's office in the Christian army, and if we can find him he would be just the man to help you."

"Yes Doctor Jacques assented. "I didn't think of Mrs Martha. She is a very good soul and would do her best I'm sure."

"Thank you both" James said but, do not want you to run any unnecessary risks. I don't want spies to learn my intentions. This woman may say you say be ready to help us, but hard to tell her son might have fallen in battle long before and even if we did get him and we ain't on a safe and spies learn of our intention they may betray or frustrate the whole of us."

"We all risk our lives every day." doctor Jacques said quietly. "I am sure Mrs Martha's son is still alive, and she can surely rely upon her brother too if she can locate him, and also her husband as they too are electrical Engineer's office. We will set her to sound either one of the, them. My little girl scout will go and see her to day and you shall know what she thinks of it when you come this evening for your nights watching."

Greatly pleased with this unexpected stroke of good luck and thanking God warmly for His help James went off at once to tell Violet and her sisters that the outlines of a plan to get a letter through had been fixed upon.

To his surprise and at first by her tearful face he saw only violet and feared something wrong had happened to her sisters. But no they were still in bed feeling a little ill from their worry over their parents. Violet had brought them something to eat but they had not eaten much. put the little girl's face brightened up at the news.

"Perhaps even now we may be able to wire a letter to help them. I should like to send them just a line to say that my sisters and I are well but oh so lonely some for them. Do you think it can be done?"

"I do not know unless we find the man who can set up the station violet. At any rate you can rely on that if it is possible and all goes well, we will attempt it, but be sure to give no clue as to why which other Glandelinian spies might find you at, if the letter falls into wrong hands. Tell them we are working to soon try and get to them when every thing quiet is down, and ask them to brother Penrod if he can suggest any way of getting to his army safely, knowing the country he may see opportunities of which we know nothing whatever. Write it very small and in English--by the way does your parents understand English, no, well write the one to Penrod in English, the one to your parents in your code for only on small pieces of paper, so that the engineer can hide it anywhere in case he suspects spies and then sent it for you."

Violet wrote the little note--a few loving words, signed her sisters names to it and the message also James had given her.

"Do not sign your names to it," James said as he saw the names written down. "They will know very well from your handwriting who it comes from, and it's better in case it should fall into the hands of some Glandelinian spy."

And with a rubber she then erased the names. That same morning but later James was sent for by the Red Cross Nurse to his surprise and learned that the nurse had found the woman and she had consented to sound her son, who was really a mechanical engineer.

Then the little girl's pipe up.

"I am to see Mrs. Martha this morning. He will go straight from me to see her son. He says your little princess friends are safe for discipline concerning those usually spies are strict to day than it used to be. There is a close watch kept over all strangers. He says her son is a very good man and very fond of helping your little girl friends out. He is always talking about the little princesses, saying he'd give anything if he had little girls of his own like them, and she said that he would do so at any risk, for he hates the Glandelinians more than ever for the terrible things that are being done now."

"He seems just the man for us," James said. "Will you tell your friend, when you see her in the morning, that I will give her twenty pesos and her son a hundred if he can succeed in communicating with the Impero-Vivians army."

"I will tell them my boy. That offer will set his wife to work, I have no doubt."

James then gave her the note Violet had written, for the woman to hand to her son for delivery if he proved to have the ability to be able to erect the signal or wireless telegraph station. James had a quiet night of watching for his friend Louis lay so still that his friend leaned over him several times to see if he breathed. The doctor had looked in late and said the child was at hand.

"To morrow your friend will either die or have a turn for the better. He is asleep now and will probably sleep for many hours. He may never wake again, he may wake recognize you for a few minutes, and then go off into a last stupor, he may wake at ringer and with a chance of life. Here is a draught you will give him as soon as he opens his eyes, purposed as there of our spoonfuls of soup down his throat, and if he keeps awake do the same every half hour. It was not until ten o'clock in the morning that the boy opened his eyes. He looked vaguely around the room and there was no recognition in his eyes as they fell upon James face, but he had lost the wild expression they had worn while he had lain there, and James felt renewed hope as he raised his head and poured the draught between his lips. Then he gave him a few spoonfuls of the soup and had the satisfaction of seeing his eyes close again and his breathing become more and more regular. The doctor when he came in and felt the boy's pulse, nodded approval.

"The fever has quite left him," he said. "I believe surely he will do now. It will be slow, very slow, but I'm sure now that with God's help he will regain his strength, as to his hand of that I cannot say anything as at present. That stone that hit him when hurried by the explosion hit him hard on the head and left an awful bad scalp wound."

About midday little Marie returned.

"I have good news James," she said. "I waited outside the Hotel de la icars headquarters until Mrs. Martha came out. Her son has agreed to help if he can but he said that he did not think that it would be at all possible to get a letter through until he can first see the lay of the land and where to erect the signal tower without the detection of the enemy scouts and observation posts. There are many of the Glandelinian scout patrols sweeping the whole country every where and they are watchful, but you need not fear spies passing your little princess friends for there is greater vigilance than ever to insure that none of their worst enemies escape. He says he will think it over, and if it is in any way possible he will risk it, but he wishes first to declare that he does not think that there is any way of you or your little friends ever reaching Impero-Vivians army for months unless it comes here itself as there are too many enemy patrols. He will send the letter on the first opportunity, and get an answer from your parents and brother, which he will send to his sisters as soon as he gets a chance. But the good news is this. A letter from their brother Penrod had gotten through to this army by some miraculous chance and here it is!"

"Thank God," said James as he took the letter she offered him. "God is good indeed to those poor little girls who in my opinion ought not to suffer this. I did not expect that it would be an easy business, or that the man would be able to hit upon a scheme at once for the erection of the station, but now that he has gone so far as to agree upon it, the thought that he may if he succeeds, soon have a better commission, will sharpen his wit up wonderfully."

Little Louis too was better. Better.

Little Louis was better he was no longer unconscious, but followed with his eyes the movements of those in the room. Once he had said, "here am I!" but the answer you are with friends; you have been ill, you shall hear all about it when you get stronger," had apparently satisfied him. At James he looked with doubtful recognition. He seemed to remember the face, but to have no further idea about it and even when James said cheerfully:

"Don't you remember your friend James, Louis?" he had shaken his head in feeble negation.

"I expect it will all come back to him. Doctor Jacques said as he gets stronger and after all it is much better that he should remember nothing at present. It will be quite enough for that when he is better able to stand it."

"I agree with you there," James said. "And I am really glad that he did not remember me for had he done so the past night might come back to him at once, and feeble as he is, that would have completely knocked him over."

Upon the receipt of the letter just as he closed James at once started off at full speed (ahead) and soon had the satisfaction of handing it to Violet who was the first to open the door for him.... she tore it open.

"Do you know what it contains James?"

"How could I, Princess?" James replied. "As you see the letter is addressed to you and your sisters. Of course, should not think of looking into some body else's letter."

"Why not in our case? We would exempt that. You are as much interested in it as I am. Sit down between me and my sisters and let us read it together. Oh goody, see it is from our dear brother Penrod. By it is quite a long Epistle."

It was written by typewriter. Type written upon a long type writing paper, and ran as follows:

"Big Girl Knool Road,
May 10 1914.

"My darling Violet and my other dear sisters;

"You can imagine what joy I felt and so did our parents and the whole of our armies in general when we observed in the National News papers and heard that you were not only still safe, but what was being done to spies who tried to do you up in double day Federal army. Father said it was perfectly right. I could hardly believe my senses when buying a news paper which one of my sentries thrust in my hands, I found that you through the boy James had escaped the clutches of disaster in general. Vivians right, and that you were all safe and well. Tell James that there is very little chance for any one to reach us from here there as the enemy patrols watch every thing too closely. I took a long time to write this long letter as I was so busy with Father that I could only write a few lines at a time. We are advancing swiftly but we meet a lot of opposition. We were engaged at Elverson and on was it a bloody battle.

We have captured a bunch of murderous spies in our lines who were here intending to assassinate you believing you were with us here. It is a strange mixture. Here are many of the best blood of Glandelinia, together with deputies Glandelinian spy agents detectives, advocates, and writers. Very day some names are called out, and these go and we never see them again. Do not fret about me or how our army is advancing my dear little sisters, we are all in God's hands and as you really a angel possessed no harm can befall you. If it is His Will he'll select a day whence you can be able to travel to us, if not we must face bravely what ever happens. We are pushing on toward Depressionville but we fear we'll never get there. It is a dry since I wrote last. A strange thing has already happened which will make you a blood boil as it did mine. I had line min-I was called out this morning to a little council room where we usually see certain visitors, and who do you think was there. My arch enemy that spy who looks so much like "Matt." He's Panj, a man the dangerous wicked into national spy the man who once denounced and almost caused by capture years ago because I defended the girl Jennie from him. He had been brought in to see me under a flag of truce and what do you think this wicked had the insolence to say?

 That if I would consent to leave the Christian army and go back to the United States until this war is over and take you little girls with me he could get Manley to withdraw his persecution of you little girls. He said that his influence would suffice, and he told me that he would give me time to consider the offer, but that I must remember that in time nothing could save you little girls from the Mandelins if I refused. What do you think I did? I said I was something very much not like the act of a gentleman, I'm afraid. I made a step closer to him, and then gave him a wallop across the face with my riding stick and the stick broke; then I made him a deep profound courtesy bow and said;
 "That is my answer. He's Panj. Get out of the camp before it is too late. You truces expire in twenty minutes." and walked into the great hall again.

Do not however let me waste a line of this precious letter that I should be writing to you more about this watch. So far, cannot see no possible way dears for you little girls to get to our army, so do not buoy yourselves up with hope.
 The only hope is that Father makes a junction with Double Day's Federal which he is striving to do. I have no hope other-wise and if you only imagine how fiercely and savagely we were resisted at Plattsburg. It was a terrible battle and the losses of our army something dreadful. Yet strange as it may seem to you we are not very unhappy here except of course father and I are very lonesome for you and wish that we had not got separated but the cruel fortune of this war did it. I have a plan that can be carried out so it'll never happen again once we get the united ones more. There are many of our old friends and some of the generals once under Evans. In the dreadful battle we kept up each other's courage and held our own against the terrific attacks of the enemy. We talked of other things too just as if we were in a drawing room.

So do not think of me as wretched or unhappy even though I am equally as lonesome for you little dears as you are for me. And now my sisters I must say adieu.
 You must trust your lives entirely to your brave good possession angels and a lot to you brave American friend and friend as you would trust me your brother. He will do all that is possible to take you and your dear sisters out of this unhappy land if General Double Day does get so badly engaged with the enemy that it would be dangerous for you to stay, and conduct you further north, and if for a time he cannot find a Christian army he may take you to his own home at Pandora. Thank our friend and others from me, and from our dear parents for their goodness and devotion. That your lives may be forever happy my dear sisters, will be my many prayers and the prayers of your loving parents...."

Your beloved brother
 Fenrod Vivian."

Inside the letter was a nothe r tiny note addressed to Jennie Vivian private. "Private." Having read the other Violet handed that one to Jennie herself, who took the little note and walking to the window opened it. As she did so a burning flush of color swept across her face to her very brow to the surprise of her sisters and James. She folded it carefully again but with trembling hands, and stood looking through the window silently for another half an hour before she came slowly and with faltering steps back to the table.

"What is it Jennie dear?" Daisy herself asked. "Have you been crying Jennie dear you look so flushed."

Jennie didn't answer and Angelina herself said;
 "You mustn't fret. James says we must not give up hope for he believes he may hit upon some scheme for getting to our dear brother yet. He says that it is only natural that he should think there was no means of getting through the enemy lines, but it was only what we expected. We have accomplished many difficult spy work on the enemy before and can do it again. It is we who must invent something something."

"Yes dears we will try but it isn't that," Jennie said with a quiver in her lip.
 "It isn't that," she sobbed. "He--he in that--that note warns us--we have been--been--trayed by a traitor" and then she suddenly burst into tears.

"A traitor?" gasped James his face suddenly turning white. "Give me that note Jennie please."

she with a shaking hand handed him the note and his eyes gave a look of horror.
 "You mustn't give way Jennie," James said when she recovered herself a little and her sisters had sunk back on their couch breathing as if suffocating. You
 "You know how much I trust to your advice, if you were to break down I should lose heart. Don't think too hard of this situation and if the spy is in this part of our army I'll move heaven and earth to get that traitor who do not think either of Fenrod's letter as a good bye. I have not lost hope yet by a long way. Why we have done wonders already in managing to get a letter to go through the foe lines and before that to even have this letter and don't worry about the traitor let me keep the note as it gives a description of him. I'll try and catch him cause his capture will consider half the difficulty is overcome, and you know there are so many child scouts in here who are all our friends. I'll inform General Nance."

"I will not try to break down again," Jennie said. "It is not often I give way, but oh to learn we were betrayed. Oh how it hurts a man some where who had pretended to be our best friend, and is a traitor. And to day I am not feeling quite myself, and that letter, and then the little note finished me and my sisters too. See how white they are. You will see I shall be all right to-morrow."

"I hope and pray so," James said as he rose to leave, but I think you had best ask Louise to give you something--your hands are hot and your cheeks are quite flushed, and you look to me as if you were feverish. I like to see main longer but this must be known by General Nance. Is he the main commander for Double Day?"
 "General Nance is."

Then I'll see him. Good night dears and please for God's sake don't worry over it."

"Ha, ha, ha," said James. "Ha, ha, ha." What next. I see on it all. Now a damn traitor.
 Ain't it enough that they suffered before. What's the matter with everything any how. But for heaven's sake I hope Jennie or her sisters are not going to break down. If she or her sisters were to get laid up now that would be the finishing touch to the whole affair, but perhaps as she says she and her sisters will be all right in the morning. I'll offer my holy Communion for that. I then tion to-morrow at the earliest Mass no matter how hard it is to get up so early.
 I thought at first it was the letter but it was this note. Ha, ha what a shock it gave even me when I read it. I wonder if I'm delirious or what am I laughing for.
 I confound it my heart burns with hate for that traitor. I'll slay him like a dog if I see him. Such a warning note as that would upset any poor little girl, even such plucky ones as Jennie and her sisters. I noticed she looked sick."

"I certainly will have this looked into my boy," said General Nance. "Go that skunk is within my camp eh. Well I have made a duplicate of that note several times and you keep the original and do you part in watching any man in that sort of clothing though I hope he is one of the suspicious characters already arrested. So their intention if they could do so of going to Fenrod through the Big Girl and Knoll was betrayed to General Thomas Federal eh. Ha. Some doings, but rest easy. We'll fix him."

"Yes, but however I'll fix it is of the poor princesses I must think now. It was a brave letter they received from their loving brother Fenrod, and how he found out this dastard deed God only knows but he sent the note. That is a bad business about that traitor and his name is John Lebatte. I used to wonder some days back he used to come so often to their headquarters on business that could have been done just as well by a messenger. He saw how things were going, and thought that when he betrayed their intention he might get a big reward from the Mandelins. General Nance, however it is most unfortunate that he should have had this interview with the poor girls, and strange that they given the gift of mind reading couldn't detect his thoughts, but they may not have thought of doing that I suppose. If it had not been for that it might have passed well. As it is no doubt Lebatte will have all the portions of the Big Girl and Knoll round what died now. I suppose maybe he asked of some favor which they couldn't grant and took unjust revenge. He will flatter himself of course that when the last moment arrives, and they get so lonesome for their brothers and parents they will charge their minds and do the favor if possible. There is one thing I'll see him I will kill him like a dog for he will be responsible for what ever happens to the little girls through his double crossing as much as if he himself had cut their throats. I would do it at once if I saw him."

"I'll give direct orders about him," said the General. As James prepared to leave. "Go to bed my son and do not worry about it."

James however was no upset by the note that he could not sleep. He went out side in the company street and walked about for some hours, scarcely noticing where he was going. It seemed to him that there must be some way of getting the poor little girls to see their parents and brother again if he could only hit upon it. He turned over in his mind every plan he had ever read of, but in one in most of these the party was some one who got inside help from within the lines, some have been helped secretly even by relatives who fought on a foe's side, but did help help their relations nevertheless at any risk, but this was not feasible here. No one had friends among Glandelinian soldiers. The Glandelinian army was not even a place where any one could obtain entrance for to try to do so was quite sufficient in the eyes of the foe to mark any one as being an enemy of Glandelinia's wicked cause. He was suddenly aroused from his reverie by a cry and the sound of curses, and beneath the dim light of some lantern hanging on the side of a tall tent, he saw a short man feebly defending himself against two others. The boy being a strong little lad sprang forward like a phantom, just as the man fell and with his long stick he always carried struck a sharp blow on the uplifted wrist of one of the assailants, sending the knife he was holding flying through the air. The other turned upon the boy instantly and swung at him with a long club but the boy dodged the blow, and drew his pistol from its holster, and then the two men at once took to their heels. James fired twice, three times but the culprits got away. James placed his pistol, and stooped over the fallen man just as a good number of soldiers soldiers having heard the shots stooped or ran up demanding what was the matter.

"Are you badly hurt mister?" he asked.

"No I think not but, do not know. I think I slipped down, but they would have killed me had you not arrived."

"Well let me and this soldier offering to help get you to your feet sir." James said holding out his hands, but with a feeling of great disgust at the abject idea of two big men attacking such a small fellow. He too was indeed trembling so that even when the soldier and James helped him to his feet he could scarcely stand and James felt he couldn't blame the poor fellow.

"You had better lead against the wall of this tent for a minute or two to recover yourself," James said. "I see you have your coat cut on the shoulder, and are bleeding pretty freely, but it is nothing to be frightened about. If you will give me your handkerchief I will bind it up for you."

One of the soldiers at James's request unbuttoned the man's coat, for the poor fellow's hands shook so much, that he was unable to do so, pulled the arm out of the sleeve, and tied the bandage tightly around the shoulder. The man seemed to belong to the class of refugees, and evident was very careful as to his attire, which was neat and precise. His linen and the ruffles of his shirt were spotlessly white and of fine material. The short waist coat was of pink cloth with bright metal buttons, the waist coat extending far below the inner coat being of a light bottle green color, broadened with a small pattern of flowers. He wore in the center of his breast a large crucifix. When he had bound the wound James helped him on with the coat again. He was by this time recovering himself.

"On that occurred double crosser because he knew I knew he betrayed the Princesses to Federal how he attacked me," he murmured.

The word startled James. What was this? He had not interfered, as he supposed to prevent the robbery of some refugees by foreign ruffians in camp. It was an attempted assassination that had been attempted—a vengeance by one of the accomplices of that traitor who himself would lay hands on if he could and by the traitor himself. He was mad clean through that he had not killed those two men. He looked more closely at the person whose life he had saved. He had a thin and significant figure—his face was a pale and looked like that of a student. It seemed to James that he had seen it before but where he could not say. It thought was one of regret that he had not killed the two men he had interfered with, and almost cursed himself for allowing the allowing the opportunity to slip.

"My young lad," the stranger said, "will you give me your name and escort me home? You have saved my life, it is a humble one but perhaps it is of some value to the Christian cause. I live but two company Street away. It is not often I am out alone in these stirring times for I too have as many secret enemies as the dear little princesses, but," was called suddenly out of on business, though I have no doubt now the message was a fraudulent one, designed simply to put me into the hands of my foe."

The man spoke in a thin hoarse voice which inspired James he knew not why with a feeling of repulsion, he had certainly heard it before. He offered him his arm and walked with him to his tent.

"Come in I beg you," the stranger said.

As both went in a young woman and two children suddenly faced them in surprise. Having been seated at a table on which was a large kerosene lamp.

"Why George my dear husband," she exclaimed on seeing his face, "you are ill, you—face is white. Has anything been happened?"

"I have been attacked in the street in the company street," he said, "but am not hurt much though had it not been for this young lad it would have gone badly with me. You have to thank him for having saved your husband's life and for causing my poor children to be fatherless. I knew he was the man who had betrayed the Vivian girls and he with another man tried to kill me."

"Oh the poor little dear," said the woman with real compassion. "and turning to the boy," "And I suppose you were surprised when the two cozeners escaped."

"I only regret that they did more than anything else," said James bitterly. "Had I known sooner who one of them were they would be dead now. I'm trying to get him my self."

The tent was plainly but neatly furnished. There were some birds in cages, which late though the hours was, hopped on their perches, and twittered when they heard the master's voice, and he responded with several words of greeting to them.

"Be it the supper dear," he said to his wife. "The brave boy will take a meal with us. You know who I am I suppose?" he said to James.

"No," James replied. "I have a collection of your face and voice, but I cannot recall where I have met you. I saw you once though in an elegant uniform of a high general in rank."

"I am General Memo, Buster John Memo," he said.

James gave a start of delighted surprise.

This man who he had saved (behaved) was the whom he had so often praised to the little princesses, one of the leaders of those who had caused mainly the capture of all the secret and deadly foes of the princesses, and lightedly deluged the country with the blood of them—the man next only to General Double Day Federal, was hated and feared by the highest and best generals of the Glandelinian side. His family was one of respect and admiration, but at the same moment the reflection through his mind the thought that chance had favored him beyond his hopes, and that the comedy which he had planned with Walter Starling to carry out had come to pass without premeditation, but with General Memo as the chief actor, put so surprised and delighted was he that for a moment he sat unable to say a word. General Memo was gratified at the effect which his name had produced. He was a strangely mixed character, at once fierce and bold, shrinking from the personal danger of the princesses within his command and yet ready to urge the most extreme measures for their protection and for the protection of all his friends. Simple in his tastes, and yet not vain and avoiding all applause, domestic and affectionate in his private character but ready to shed a wife's blood for the protection of a violet and her sisters. Pure in morals; passionate in his resolved against the foe, incorruptible and inflexible, the more dangerous because he had neither forgiveness of mercy on such a foe, that as long as a violet and her sisters were safe the life of Glandelinian spy soldier was nothing, because had he considered it necessary that half a Glandelinian army should perish for the benefit of the endangered princesses he would have signed the death warrant of that half without emotion or hesitation. To him the Glandelinians were the scum of hell.

"You are surprised my lad," he said but the way of late are inscrutable. The intonation of a young lad had thwarted the wicked schemes of the deadliest and treacherous enemies of the princesses. Had you been but ten seconds later I should have ceased to be, and one of the humble instruments by which Heaven is working for the safety of the nation and the princesses would have perished."

While the general was speaking James had rapidly thought over the role which it would be best for him to adopt. Should he avow his real character and ask for an order of a strong escort to lead the princesses safely to Emperor Vivian's army as a recompense for the service he had rendered the general, or should he retain his present character and first obtain the general's good confidence and wait until the time was ripe for such a move. There was danger in such an attempt outside the lines for above all things the general prided himself upon his true incorruptibility, and he might consider that to allow the princesses to go out on such a dangerous journey would be a big breach of duty to the cause. He resolved the better to keep silent at present and saving an appeal to the general's gratitude for the last extremity.

"Pardon me sir," the boy said, "he had rapidly arrived at this conclusion my emotion was naturally great at finding I had unwittingly been the means of saving the life of one on whom the eyes of the whole world are fixed. I rejoice indeed that I should be the means of preserving such a life."

This statement was strictly true.

"He will talk more of the supper," the general said. "My wife and I see in ready with it. Indeed it is long past our usual hour, and we were just sitting down when it was called out by what purported to be an important message from the Vivian and Princesses."

"From the Vivian and Princesses?" gasped James. "At what hour?"

"At six o'clock my lady."

"Why sit I then the young legal guardian appointed by their brother Penrod. I was with them past that hour. They never wrote a note to any one. If you must know they are to send lonesome and gloomy to do anything just now."

"I see. And then the letter was a decoy to get me out in that lonely company street. I see it now."

The general dined continuously as the meal went on, and James asked him self in astonishment whether he was in a dream, and if this man before him talking about the little princesses and their good ways and of their lives before they came into the army with their father the emperor, could really be the Christian general the enemy dreaded so much. After the meal was over his host said:

"As yet I am totally ignorant of the good name of my young princess."

"My name is James Michael Andrews," James replied.

"It is not an Abbeinnian name," the general said in surprise. "I hope you are not English. English. Many of them always double crossed us."

"I am of American parentage," James said quietly, "but have been resident with my parents for some years in Abbeinnia. I have been for some time in the service of the beautiful and angelic Vivian and Princesses who are as righteous and holy as angels themselves, and have been doing every thing for them what I could despite the fact that General Manley has sent so many spies to try to kill them, and, am also on the look out for a spy that had double crossed them."

"Glandelinia is our worst enemy and a wicked senseless enemy of God and all heaven and Christianity," the general said, raising his voice angrily, "the enemy of all Holy Religion, and liberty, and you are such a good American to rigenera on in your plots with our cause and defend the princesses."

"I know plenty about the doings of the Glandelinians," James replied with a smile.

"And indeed about all the way they carry on the wall 'm not complaining but I can't make it out how our Blessed Lord permits it without striking himself especially those horrible child massacres and the dreadful persecutions of the princesses. I don't want to slight the saints, but, I don't believe any saint went through what they did. I am but little past nine and so that I can defend them I do not ask for anything else. It is quite trouble enough to see such things and at times I almost imagine they were my sisters in peril and there fore, defend them as I would my own. If you can put me in the way of doing anything to show these accursed Glandelinians real American ways which it is said they dread the most of all I can consider that I am well repaid for the little service I rendered you."

"Assuredly I will do so," General Nemo said. "I am a poor man in money matters you know, I do not believe in putting my hand into the public purse just for service rendered to my holy cause. And, and my wife where ever the army goes live as frugally as we did when I first became an officer in the army. My only gains have been the wicked hatreds of the Glandelinians and the love of God and the people and the princesses. But though I have not money, I have influence and I promise to use it on your behalf. Until I hear of something suitable you can if you will for the spare time you have work here with me as my aide camp and share for you - solve and the princesses what I possess. My correspondence is very heavy. I am overwhelmed with strange letters from the provinces imprisonment of Christian armies begging me to inquire into grievances against the princesses heard of and receive as they wrong which I certainly will do courses on the rascally Glandelinians. Can you read and write well in Abbeinnian?" for from James words he supposed that he had held some menial post in the headquarters of Prince Penrod and his darling saintly little sisters.

"Yes I can read and write fairly well in Abbeinnian," James said.

"Are you as perfectly acquainted with our tongue?"

"Yes sir."

"And are you acquainted with the Glandelinian tongue which though the same had or has a lot of slang in it?"

"I have known enough of it to speak it but I am not sure about its way of spelling at all," James said. "I can manage it if I have a copy of their crazy language."

"If you can speak it that will do," General Nemo said. "There are sometimes Glandelinian news papers captured, and I should like to hear for myself with what that perfidious people say of us Abbeinnians, and there are few here who can translate the slang of their language. Do you accept my proposal. I won't take up too much time because you must be with the princesses more of the time than with me."

"Willingly," James said.

"Very well then, come here at nine o'clock in the morning, but tell them first before you do so they'll know where to find you if they need you. Put mind you are only filling the post of my secretary until I can find something better for you to do."

"The post will be a better one some day, general. Ere long you will be the greatest man in Abbeinnia, and the post of secretary will be one which the foolish sinners would well envy."

"I sh I see you know how to flatter," General Nemo said with a smile much gratified nevertheless with James words. "You must remember nevertheless that I have no dignities, do not deserve it, that I care only for the welfare of Abbeinnia and her rulers which are our holiest holiest of persons."

"I know general. That you are called 'Nemo the incorruptible' James said, "but nevertheless you belong to Abbeinnia, and emperor Vivian will assuredly see that some day you have such a reward as you richly merit."

"There was no fault in that," James said to himself as he made his way down stairs. "These human tigers who have so often tried to slay the poor princesses have met their doom on account of him. I've often seen it in the papers. He is a strange count as this man, but, suppose he is righteous at it. His food was fit for a king despite the way he lives and, sure have not told the general have of my opinion of him. Emperor Vivian is proud of him and, don't blame him. I'd hate to be a Glandelinian general with a division of even the bravest Glandelinian soldiers and dare try to withstand a charge he would lead and direct. He's like a tiger that could lick a hundred lions that general. But this is glorious. What news I shall give the little angels in the morning. If I cannot insure their full protection now I shall be a bugle indeed. Here I had the planning of the events of this evening, and they turned out better for us than we supposed thanks to our Blessed Lord and His mother."

It was the first time that James had called at their headquarters as early as eight in the morning after keeping his promise of attending the early mass and receiving Holy Communion, and Jennie herself leaped up from the breakfast table as he entered. Her sisters remained sitting at her request.

"What is it James. You bring us some news don't you?"

"I do indeed Jennie capital news. Whom do you think I had supper with last night?"

"Had supper with James," Jennie repeated. "What do you mean. Not with general Nemo surely?"

"Now in the world could you guess it. Sure, I had supper with general Nemo."

"With general Nemo?" the other little girls repeated in absolute astonishment. "You are joking James dear. Violet herself went on but you cannot be doing that; you have accomplished such wonders for us already. Tell us how you came to have supper with that great general who half the time dresses in civilian clothes."

"My dear princesses! regard it as a special providence, an amazing news from our Dear Blessed Lord to our pray prayers for our preservation. I had the good fortune to saving his life."

"Saving his life. Why James who in the world would have dared attack him?"

Jennie exclaimed. "Who attacked him?"

"Two Glandelinians, one who double crossed you. I shot at them but he escaped."

"But I'm a dumb ox if I'll not remember his face."

"What happiness. Then he can help us in our plans later on to get to Penrod and father's army."

"I do not know if I need to promise that Jennie for one reason."

"Said James. "While at supper, saw a news paper on the table and from what I saw there you father without intending to insult should be known as the "human steam roller has crushed all opposition in his path. The enemy has tried every believable scheme to check his advance but it can't or if it can be accomplish, do not yet know how it is exactly to be done. Is army is immense the battle of plavero was a crushing victory, he had swept the enemy before him and is moving forward like an irresistible mountain. One section of it is moving toward Depressionville, and other sections is already within fifty miles of Pandora and advancing on Big Red Road near the Polans. put such a plan of good fortune would never have been sent to us had it not been intended by our Blessed Lord that you must see your beloved ones again. Now sit down quietly all of you, and let me tell you all about it, and I'll give you the news paper to prove what I say, for, have to be at general Nemo's again at nine o'clock. He's some general. I almost wish my father was like him."

"Oh Thanks be to God that is good fortune indeed," Jennie exclaimed when he had finished while her sisters looked over the news. "Naturally he cannot refuse any request you may make now."

"If he does it must be because it would be a miracle to accomplish it," James but to attempt assassination of the general. The general had been frequently interrupted by callers. Member of the Military Committee of the Abbeisnannian public Safety, leaders of the St Michael and St Johns C. Club, and others dropped in and asked General Names advice, ordering discussed measures to be taken, and after a few hours or so, two (not a Jew), James found that it was very seldom, except when taking his meals, that the General was alone while in the house, and as his wife or even children were in the house, the idea of a spy trying to get in and compel the general to sign any thing against his will was clearly impracticable. Each day too after his work was over, and this was generally completed about one o'clock, James called to see how Walter Starling himself was getting on for poor folks had died and was a burden. Walter was gaining strength but his brain

The doctor told James that in time his case was hopeless.

"His strength seems to have absolutely deserted him," he said, "and his mind is now a blank like a one-year-old, but but . . . by no means despair of his gradually recovering, and if he could hear the voices of the princesses it might strike a chord now lying dormant and set the brain at work again."

James decided to have the little girl see him as soon as possible he could get them to go there as the hospital was some ways off, but as to try and find a way to get them safely to Impero-Vivians army James could do nothing, what he would be traveling without encountering enemy patrols, and he could only wait until some chance in the situation might afford some opportunity for action. He had asked the General four times already but the General only shook his head. It was evident that the enemy too was not pushing matters forward but that the preference remained to remain in the provinces provinces and leave the horrors of loneliness work upon the little girls and so break them down as such: loneliness usually kills persons in time. There however had been no lull in the execution of prisoners who were dastardly enough to have harmed the little girls, and then James and violet and her sisters got a surprise. All eyes throughout the Christian nation turned to the spectacle of the trial of Augustina St. Claire in Impero-Vivians lines.

From the time Ferrod arrested the dirty scoundrel he had remained a close prisoner in the internment camp, and because of what he had done to the Vivian, the Princess Jennie the whole army was determined upon having his worthless life for it. Why the trial was so long delayed was that Penrod would not hurry me matters a matter a just to torment the prisoners. The trial had commenced on the 10th of April. There was no one found to defend the culprit and he was condemned before hand. The two elder brothers and Jack Evans led the assault. Evans a witness of the scene and Jennie's plight caused distaste and order when he stated the scene. The question was then put on the Military Assesment Assembly; "Is Augustinia St Clair guilty of assault with intent to kill on the little Princess Jennie."?

With scarcely a single exception the Assembly returned an affirmative affirmative answer, and two hours after the final vote was taken. Three hundred and fifty thousand voted for death at the stake and fire, two million for life imprisonment, two hundred and eighty six thousand for detention, banishment or exile or unconditional death, for hundred and forty six thousand for death by hanging, but after a short delay with a wish that the Assembly should revise the sentence. Sentence of death by burning at the stake was pronounced. After a sitting which lasted for forty seven hours an hour and ten minutes, there was another struggle between the advocates of delay and those of instant execution, but the latter won, and the scoundrel died at the fiery stake. The Glandelinians looked on amazed and appalled at the act which however was justified.

Before Joe James had a chance to bring such news he had asked the Princesses a little history of what their father did in the army out side of military life;

"My Father and mother does a seven, and attended all morning Masses on Week days and goes to daily Communion, then he puts on his uniform and is with our brother till nine, when he comes to breakfast with our mother. After breakfast my father gave us lessons till eleven o'clock, and then my brothers played till midday, when we went to walk or riding together whatever the weather was. Our walk or ride continued until two in the afternoon, when we dined. After dinner my father and mother some times when not busy played at some games. At four o'clock my mother would go upstairs with us because our father usually took a nap of went out to visit the Church. At six o'clock my brothers were in bed, and our father gave us lessons till supper time. After supper my mother soon went to bed. We then went upstairs to our little palace chapel and stayed there a long time. Father came in two times and stayed till eleven. My mother and father worked much at tapestry and had us study or play and frequently read alone and went to mass every morning also with us. My aunt too did mostly the same and so did our Uncle. We all read many religious books, usually aloud, but that was before the war. We had time to play with lots of other children and our lives were sure happy then."

When they heard the trial of the trial and execution of Jennie's arch enemy it had at least the good effect of diverting the minds of Violet and her sisters from their own anxieties.

Jennie and her sisters however were passionate, and Daisy tearful and so sorrowful in their indignation that the traitor who had betrayed them to the Federal had remained at large. Over and over again Jennie implored James to try and cause the capture of that scoundrel. The whole army was shocked and a lienated by this news, and Jennie urged that James might, from his connection with General Nemo, obtain some search warrant which would enable the Marshal to be captured, but James couldn't see how that could accomplish anything on that matter.

"In the first place Jennie, it would be utterly impossible for any one watched as they are to escape the Christian lines, and no pass or permit that even a person could get from any one would be of the smallest utility, but that does not mean that he would be captured by those who know him not for he is disguised as an Argentinian officer and assumes the name of an officer who had recently resigned and which General Nemo knows nothing. You must remember that all though every one unites against you foes, we can't capture every one of the spies. General Nemo is only doing his best, and although the spy is the most prominent because he double crossed you and your sisters, he cannot get out of the lines even though he could win a pass from General Nemo as the pass without being verified would not be respected. I will tell Jennie and we must have patience. In the next place Jennie, I have a name the only one to recognize him. I am staying here to do what little I can to watch over you and your sisters, for the sake of your dear parents and brothers, and because I love you all. The responsibility is heavy enough, and could I could, even capture the traitor I would not do it if the act in the act in the slightest degree interfered with my freedom of action toward you and your sisters and caused you to go into danger which only a miracle could take you out of."

"But that traitor may come and try to molest or do some awful harm to us."

Violet said passionately.

"Hear, pily Violet" James replied coolly I'm positive that your possession argals would prevent that, and as you will lives is in my eyes and your safety too a thousand times not only more of consequence consequence but of practicalness than that of any outside King, and as your chances of safety to some extent depend upon mine I do not mean to risk one of those chances of his trying to come here to do you little girls a hurt. Besides to tell you the truth, in accordance to save your lives, therefore have no liking for my own if I cannot save yours, you have a lot more right to live than the best of these Glandelinians have and I have as much a marked objection to see any thing happen to you as a coward has an objection to losing his own life. You see I have people at home in Pandora who are fond of me, and who want to see me safe at home again, alive and well, but what would they think and say, if because of my slackness in my charge you perished. No, no, don't fear when it is God's will I will get that traitor Nemo leave the rest to God. If you are really possessed of an else have no fear even if the dirty snake is at large. I know him and when he crosses my path God help him."

"I know, James dear I know" Jennie said with her eyes full of tears. "I did not understand that you knew him by face. That is one good consolation to us, but sometimes I and my sisters fear it is awfully wrong that you a foreigner should be staying here asking your life for us instead of going home to those who love you. I think some times I and my sisters ought to go away to the armies ourselves and leave you go home." And Jennie burst into tears.

"My dear Jennie" James said soothingly. "Do not worry yourself about me or your dear sisters either. It would have been just as dangerous at the time we fled from the victorious enemy at Depressionville for me to have tried to escape from the army elsewhere as it was to stay there,--in fact I should say it was a good deal more dangerous--and at present as General Nemo's secret army, I am in no danger at all. It is also not at all disagreeable serving a man like he is, and he is a very decent kind of kind of man, and not at all hard to get on with. As to what I have done for you and your sisters, so far as I see, I have done nothing beyond bringing you here in the first place from General Nemo's captured camps, and coming to have a pleasant chat with you and your sisters every evening. No with the best will in the world have been able to do the slightest assistance to you in my plans to try and get a way to go for your return to your army. These darn Glandelinians, know, wicked as they are cannot be trifled with by any one, not even you brave little girls just now. As we say at home in the United States my intentions are good, but so far the intentions have borne no useful fruit whatever. Of course if you decide to go forth at any risk I'd be willing, but even princesses though you are General Nemo and Nemo says they wouldn't let you attempt it under any condition until the Big Gid Knool, or Yellow Brick Road as it is called is perfectly open. Come Jennie dry your eyes, for it is not often that I have seen you cry and I can't stand it either. Oh I tell you truthfully as much as you know the enemy I know them better, no Abbeismian in any army I'll bet hates the Glandelinians as much as I do and I have good reasons. We have thrown in our lot together, and we shall swim or sink in company. You little girls keep up my spirit and I will keep up mine. Let your possession angels protect you in all adventures forced upon you and do not lose heart. Don't let there be any talk about gratitude. There will be time enough for that if I ever get you safely to Pandora. Only from there can you find a route to get to your Father's army. Then perhaps I may send in my bill and ask for repayment. And that that payment I will ask is your everlasting friendship."

James spoke lightly, and Jennie with a great effort recovered her composure and after that, although their trial and danger were nightly discussed by many officers and lamented, Violet, or her sisters never said a word as to any possibility of the catastrophe being averted and kept up their abject prayers to our blessed Lord for protection.

"I don't understand this" said James to himself as he went on his way toward General Hemo tent. "I have kept these little girls company now for quite a while and their goodness and holiness is about the same as the perfection of the holy ones in Heaven itself. No sin, they can't look at a crucifix without tears in their eyes, and all other qualifications and yet they are treated like this. What I can't understand is how it is possible when they're angel possessed. And do the angels suffer what they suffer. Of course if I would complain of this to some one here they would say 'Well it is awful I'll admit but remember our Blessed Lord and His Mother were innocent too and see what they suffered. But I can't see it that way about those little girls. It certainly ain't right. Some other will say 'Well they ought to have stayed home where they're safe, but then that would have been cowardly when they should follow their Father and Mother and besides in their nation that is at stake and it is their duty to do this. General Nemo was surprised and looked at me in disdain when yesterday morning, burst out indignantly at him and gave my opinion of him before his face because he mentioned the word Glandelinia. But how could I help it. I hate that very name like a child hates Castor Oil. I was surprised too ever since as he never mentioned that word again especially in my presence. I'll get even with those Glandelinians yet."

That morning James felt a thrill go through him, as glancing over the list of persons among the Christians to be warned of personal danger because all spies could not be apprehended, he saw the names of Violet, and her sisters concealing the traitor who had betrayed them, although his knowledge of the character of the glandelinian petrels gave him little ground for hope, he determined upon making a direct appeal to the general praying that the general would see a way.

"I see you, Excellency," he said for that was the mode of address among universal at that time. "That among the list of persons to be warned are the names of B Violet and her sisters."

"Say the Vivian girl Princesses, 'or the Darling s of the nation," said the general reprovingly. "Yes what would you say about them, poor things."

"I told you your excellency upon the first night when I came here, that I had first been in the service of their brother Penrod. Although I know he is a good prince I am bound to say he placed me in his own stead when he was forced to leave for Imperovivians army. Since I knew them the little Princesses showed me many marks of kindness and are so unaturally so unethically good and holy that this I would fa in now re turn your Excellency I did you a service on the night when we first met, and I ask you now as a full quitance for that aid that you will grant me a strong body guard and help us get over to Imperov Vivians army. Whatever they do suffer and have suffered is absolutely not justified they do not deserve it and I feel even their guardian angels would not have it so for some say that at times there is weeping in their headquarters than no one can account for and it is not from them or any one in the place. They are so good more good than they are pretty and therefore I implore you to give me some help which will charge their loneliness and sorrow to happiness."

"I am surprised at your request," the general said calmly. "These little Princesses belong to a race who have for centuries made Abbeinnia what it is to day, and if the angels that possess them cannot find a way for them to go forth safely God only knows I cannot only on the account of the obligation I am under their own care give you even this request which is too perilous, such an act would only sent them to a ruin of which I would be responsible for, and an act of treason to the people and the army, and I hope you know well enough by this time to be aware that nothing whatever will induce me to do such a thing you ask, when I know as I am so far have not even dared go out on a scouting tour which is usually my customary habit. If you say you know the glandelinians as well as you do you must have gone mad to ask me to do a favor which would require a tremendous miracle. If there was a possible way to do it, I would be only too glad. Knowing their loneliness I had recently asked General Nance whether he could make an advance to make a junction with Imperov Vivian but General Nance answered that the situation is so serious he really is afraid to take the chances. Of course is if there is a way open I would do so willingly. Ask of me all I have it is little enough but it is yours, but this thing I cannot grant you, for I did, I would be fully responsible in the eyes of God himself if you and the little girls were captured or went to their destruction at the hands of the enemy."

For a moment James was on the point of bursting out indignantly against the glandelinians in a way that would not have sounded good to Abbeinnians, but he checked himself and without a word went on with his writing, although the tears of disappointment for a time almost blinded him, but he felt it would be hopeless to urge the point further, and that did he do so the general would really believe he had gone mad. Even in the meantime knowing where she was James had corresponded regularly with Angelina Aronburg, and even once seen her and exchanged a few words with her. Having been sent by General Nemo with a letter to her, but she was not able to think of anything to do to him she almost had the features of the princess Violet, her color was the same, she had the same good nature and yet dignified manner and there was an expression of patient resignation on her face. He always had said to him or wrote to him, "hope and pray always, all is not lost yet. Still but little change had taken place in Walter Starvings condition. He remained in a state of almost lethargy with an expression of dull hopelessness on his face, sometimes he passed his hand wearily across his forehead as if he were trying to collect something; he had lost, he was still too weak to stand, but Doctor Jacques and his wife and Red Cross Nurse combined would dress him and place him on a couch, which James pursued chased for his use. The worthy couple surely were taking good care of the lad in the base hospital.

James had many talks with Violet and her sisters concealing the fact that he should do James. "Nannie said over and over again 'If we could get away and all get safely away with him to gather to you home in Pandora until Father's army advances up all would be well, which I began to despair of of our ever doing, but if we should do it what should we do. In case a great attack comes upon Nance would Starving be safe there. Only the other day we sent a letter to him and got no answer. It is dreadful and what would Angelina Aronburg say when she learned on her arrival in Imperovivians army that Starving has all this time been lying broken down and in suffering in the army. Why in the world did he go out scouting. His injury proves how dangerous it would be for us to even go out. We may be even killed."

To this question James for a long time, could give no answer. At last he said; "I have been thinking it over, Jennie and I feel indeed that we have no right to take ourselves away without you little girls first knowing the truth about poor Starving. His misfortunes have come upon him because he would stop within general Vivian's army to watch over you little girls. I feel now that you little girls have the right to choose one of you or if she chooses to do so of stopping in this army to look after him while the rest of you go forth to your Father's army."

"Oh James you would never think of any of us going away and leaving one of us."

"I don't know, girls, if it would not be best," he could stay in disguise or say dressed as a little nurse with the doctor and his Red Cross Nurse. I have great hopes that her voice and presence would do what we have failed to do namely awaken him from this sad state of lethargy. They could stay there for months until General Nance joins you Father's mother."

"But James dear you do not know what you say. Father's mother would not allow it that any one of us should purpoely through our own doing separate from each other. No no we would not consent to that under any conditions. We ought to altogether go to him and stop in the hospital."

"I'm afraid not," James said. "Of course you are safe in the army now from your dreaded assassins in spy enemies for every day the search for suspects becomes stricter, every day people are being seized who cannot give an account of themselves and suspicious things found on them, others are called upon to produce the papers proving their identity, and would not therefore suggest any such thing against you will. There is only hope for permanent safety by remaining in the army, for asked General Nemo for help to get you little girls away and he said it was too dangerous that even he or Nance wouldn't even let you go."

As soon as an arrangement can be made we will try and get you all to remain with Starving. That would be better and stay here until something good turns up. When God wills Imperov Vivian will get here. From the news to day I heard it is impossible to check his advance. Even my letter is afraid to tackle him so there is something to cheer you up by."

It was just early that afternoon before the writing time from his job that James received a double shock. Among the letters of denunciation was the following: "You Excellency General Nemo, I know that you watch over the army. I would have you know that for more than two weeks seven supposed to be girls have been dwelling with one Louise Moullin of rent number fifteen rue Michael, there were eight of them, but the eldest has been disappeared. This is in itself mysterious, the old woman herself is not a servant of any one but a dangerous spy, a man in disguise and carrying dangerous weapons. They have been searched for day after day as those seven claim they're the Vivian girls and they have voices very much like rough boys. The supposed to be woman gives out that she is a relative of theirs, but it is believed in the neighborhood that they are glandelinian boy and man spies in disguise. Once they were seen loitering near General Nance's headquarters. They receive many visits from a young man of whom no one knows nothing. He is five feet tall and wears a sort of small beard and a large star-shaped black hat. Inform the princesses to keep out of their sight as they are dangerous spies looking for a chance to kill them. We have tried to apprehend them but they're as fleetly as deer."

James felt the color leave his cheeks, and his hand shook as he hastily abstracted the note, and put it so it would be the first one looked at by the general when he came in. Too late was a sudden blow for which the lad was unprepared indeed. He could not even think what was best to be done. However saying to himself that he had at any rate a few days before the general had seen the letter, and proceeded aside to be thought over after the general had seen the letter, and proceeded with his work. After a time he came to the list of those marked for execution as spies on the following day, and saw with a fresh pang another letter of warning about strange spies who knew the whereabouts of Violet and her sisters and were always secretly laying for them and yet who could not be captured as they were too slick. Go the crisis had arrived. That night or never Violet and her sisters must be warned. He opened the next few letters mechanically but staid himself when the general who had failed to see the letter for it fell upon the floor asking him a question. A long time he worked on, but his brain was swimming, and he was on the point of saying that he felt strangely unwell, when the general seeing the letter lying on the floor, picked it up and read it with horror on his face and was going to say something to James when there was a ring at the bell, and a moment later a tall handsome young man in uniform entered the room. James recognized the man's face but could not remember his name.

"I have just come from the Tribunal Assembly your excellency," he said and have looked over the reports for tomorrow. I have come to you as I know you are just, and are a special friend of the Vivian girl Princesses, and abhor the shedding of their blood. They are resident in general Nances own headquarters. They are wholly innocent of all wrongdoing yet certain numbers of spies even who are disguising themselves to look like the princesses are secretly threatening them, and even know where the princesses reside. I know the nature of these little princesses well, and their father the Emperor is a special friend of mine. Even although we know that their father is a king his heart is with the people as much as for himself. He is much more good than a saint and from what his little daughters are they do not in the least deserve what they are always facing, and they as you are acquainted are well beloved by the nation. Now I'm not lying, lying, it is impossible to trace those secret enemies of theirs and I'm scared they'll get the little dears soon--or later even in their headquarters. It is wicked if we would let them die just for the sake of the Glandelinians who wish to kill them when we can find a way for the princesses to get away. More over, even if anything happens to them our nation will suffer much had luck for we are responsible for them. I pleaded for them that you will find for them a safe way to get away from this army and get some where where they are not known,--no not to Emperor's army--I could see that thought in your face sign--it is just as dangerous for them there too. They must be in some big city disguised as little citizens. I have seen only one way. Down the Hollister Run Hvertward Fandora. It is somewhat dangerous of course but safer than any where else. They could have a strong escort of gunboats guarding them."

"You are willing to give them all the assistance you can sir?" The general asked.

"I am." The fact that they are in too much secret danger here is surely a guarantee?"

"It is," General Nemo said. "What you tell me convinces me that I can without damage to the cause of the nation grant your request. I am more glad to do so since my secretary had also prayed for their safe escape from this unseen danger."

But though he rendered me the greatest service, and I owe to him a debt of gratitude, I was obliged to refuse; for to grant his request would have been to send him and the little girls out into hopeless peril; but now if you know an open way it is different. You tell me that you can supply a safe line of gunboats of war vessels to guide her down the Mic-Hollister, so on these grounds I can with a good conscience grant her and her sisters a safe passage to Fandora down the Mic-Hollister Run, and of course the little boy aide de camp must accompany them."

The tall man had looked with astonishment as James as the general spoke. "Thank you for their sakes sir," he said to Nemo. "It is an act of just justice which I relied upon your well known character of promise you that your granting this will not be misplaced, and that they will be safely conducted down the river at the risk of my life. May I ask," he said how it is that your secretary who whose face seems familiar to me, is interested in these little angels also."

"It is simple enough," the general replied. "He was in the service of their brother Penrod."

"Oh I remember now," the tall man said. "He is an American. I wonder if that you retain them here when he should be busy with them."

"He saved my life," the general replied rather coldly. "A somewhat good ground, you will admit for placing confidence in him, and if the princesses are not offended in my giving their aide de camp an extra job here then I do."

"Assuredly," the tall man said hastily seeing that the general was offended. "And now citizen there is another matter of importance on which I wish to confer with you."

At that moment James saw a man go into a small house within the camp whose face he recognized. He rose.

"Your excellency I will ask you to excuse me for further work to day. My head is aching badly, and I can scarce see what I am writing."

"I thought you were making some confusion of my papers," the general said kindly. By all means put aside your work then in a whisper. "I know what the matter is lad, I saw him myself. Thank God if you get him. He is that traitor."

On leaving the room James went up to the attic above which he had occupied since he had entered the general's service, rapidly put on the blue blouse, and pantaloons which he had for many years worn, pulled his cap well down over his eyes and hurried down stairs. He stationed himself some distance along the company Street near that house and hearing voices understood what was going to be done and waited for Lebatte to come out. Rapidly thinking the matter over he concluded that the man would not attempt to bomb general Nances headquarters until after dark in order that when he placed the bomb he would not be noticed by any of the sentries in the company street. From the conversation Lebatte had calculated of course, that he could do it effectually for the bomb bomb had power enough to wreck the place to thoroughly that not a soul would get out alive for the bomb not only had force but would start a raging furnace that no fire department could stop. A quarter of an hour later Lebatte came out of the house and walked down the street. James stealthily followed him. After walking some distance Lebatte came to a stand of military hackney coaches and spoke to one of the drivers when he had gone on again James went up to the man.

"Come aside," he said. "Do you wish to do a very good holy action, and earn a number of gold pieces at the same time."

"That will suit me admirably," the coachman replied.

"Well let one of your comrades wait here after you have then, and let us have a glass of wine together in that military cabaret."

As soon as they were seated at a small table with a measure of wine before them James said;

"That supposed to be military Angelinian deputy who spoke to you just now (get your cow wow) has engaged you for a job this evening."

"He has," the coachman said. "I am to be at the left corner of Company L at nine this evening. I accepted the job but God knows I don't like his face."

"Your suspicions of his face is correct. He is a bad lot," James said. "He is going to carry on your hackney coach an enormous box, which is nothing but an explosive to destroy the headquarters of the Princesses while they sleep. They are friends of mine, and I am their young guardian, and I not only want to save her but get the scoundrel and kill the rat like a mad dog. Now what I want to do is take your place on the box this evening. I will drive him to the place where he is to get the bomb, and then he gets to his headquarters, I shall jump off and have a company with me who will either capture or kill him which ever it be. I will give you ten crowns for the use of your coach for one hour."

"Agreed," the coachman said his face ashen in horror. "Between ourselves some of these fellows who pretend to be friends of the Christian side, are spies in disguise and just as great scoundrels, aye and worse than the Glandelinian soldiers are. We drivers know a good many things that the soldiers in general don't, but you must mind sir that scoundrel you mention carries weapons you know, and your effort to capture him may turn out the other way."

"Oh I can get a comrade or two to help," James said laughing. "There are others besides myself who will not see such good little angels be injured in the least."

"And where shall I get my coach again?"

"At the end of Camp St Augustine near Camp St Ann. I expect I shall be there by nine o'clock with it; but I am sure not to be many minutes late. Here is an Abbessian Louis now. I will give you the other when I change places with you. Be at the end of company L at half past seven. I shall be on the lookout for you."

"For the sake of those dear little Heavenly things I won't fail!" The coachman said. "You may rely upon that."

James now hurried away to a soldier friend of his by the name of Jacques too. and rapidly gave an account of what had taken place. At first the soldier was paralyzed with horror at the story but as he recovered himself but still shaky James continued; "In the first place Jacques I want your soldier's companion to see his friend and let him take a note instantly to the princesses. It is to tell them for God's sake to get out of their headquarters and dance too before it is too late in case I am not in time to frustrate it, because if they are not warned in time it is just possible they'll be killed unless the possession angels miraculously preserve them, but do they know of the plot. I would appeal to the guards but I don't suppose I could reach any of them in time, still it would be well to avoid any risk of our scheme failing. I will drive to the Company Delmont C Street, which as you know is close to La Polom. It is a quiet Company Street and is likely that there will be no soldiers about at half past eight to aid us in case of necessity so bring a number along with you. I will be on hand there and give me a chance to secure the fellow."

"Surely I will," Jacques said heartily. "What do you propose to do with him?"

"I propose to crush his heart and turn him over to the proper authorities."

Yes on the chance and evidence of being an assassin spy."

"It will be the safest plan to run him through once and be done with the dirty snake," Jacques said. "He will be a dangerous enemy if he is left alive, and if he would kill the little girl without mercy with that big bomb you spoke of if he had the chance, I don't see why you should be over-nice with him."

"I don't propose to be over-nice with that accursed scoundrel and one of a band of men whom, regard as bloody murderers of little girls," James said, "put it would be better satisfaction to let the authorities stretch him by the neck as is being done with the others being captured."

"You are wrong," Jacques said earnestly, "and you are risking everything by letting him live. Such a fellow should be slain like a dirty rat when you get him in a trap."

"It may be so," James agreed, "but I'd rather see him stretch by the neck. The Glandelinians have often strangled the princesses. Let them have a taste of it too."

"He would have us hunted down," said the soldier, "well we shall see. I am risking my head in this business, and I mean to have my way."

Having made all his arrangements, James returned to his attic and lay down there until evening, having before he went in seen to it that he was well armed.

At seven he placed his pistols in their holsters, girded on his sabre, which would attract no attention, for all boys and girls scouts carried weapons like the soldier did, and then set out for the place designated.

"Are here you are," he said, "you had better take the big cape of mine, if will disguise you, besides he would notice at once that you are not the coachman he hired if you are dressed in that blouse, and you must imitate a man's voice."

James took his sword off and placed it on the wall, wrapped himself in the great cape, would a muffle around the lower part of his face, and alighted. Waited a few minutes after the clock had struck eight thirty, Lebatte came along.

"Here we are, sir," James said in a rough, disguised voice. "I angled you have come for it is no joke waiting about such nights as this and in all this rain. Where am I to drive you too?"

"To the end of Company L," Lebatte said to him, his seat in the coach. James heart beat fast as he drove toward that part of the camp. He felt sure with the aid of God that success should attend his plans, but the moment was an exciting one. It did not seem that anything what ever could interpose to prevent success, and yet something might happen which he had not foreseen or guarded against. He drove at a little more than a trot for the Company Streets a short distance from the center of this section of the camp were only lighted here and there by a few flickering camp fires, and further they were in absolute darkness, save for the lights of a few far distance camp fires. At last he reached the end of Company L. There was a small wooden house standing there. Lebatte jumped out and rang at the bell.

"What is it, sir?" the guard said looking through a grill in the gate.

"I am Colonel Lebatte of the Committee of Public Abbeisannian Safety, and, have an order here, signed by general Nance, to get that big box of explosive you have here."

"All right, sir," the man said, opening the gate. "It is late for such an order but I suppose the general needs the explosives."

Ten minutes later the gate opened again, and Lebatte came out with a big paper box under his arm. He stepped down and entered the coach.

"No general Nance's headquarters," Lebatte said as he entered.

James drove on and was soon at the spot he proposed to drive at. It was a dark narrow company street, no one seemed stirring, and James peered anxiously through the darkness for the figure of Jacques and his soldiers. Presently he heard a low whistle, and several figures appeared from a doorway. James at once checked the horse.

"What is the matter?" Lebatte asked putting his head out of the window. James got off the box, and going to the window said:

"I am a fake driver! Have you caught me surrounded by soldiers. I understand I know your plot and that is in that box. Caught you red handed."

"Drive on you dog gone little fool," the man said furiously, "it will be the worst for you."

"Oh so you say, I understand you will cut you down you would be assassinating going to bomb the headquarters of the princesses. I have run you into a trap."

With an exclamation of rage Lebatte sprang from the coach, and as his foot touched the ground James swung at him with his sabre, but as he did so he trod upon some of the filth, which so thickly littered the Company Street and slipped. Lebatte drew his own sword and before James could have regained his feet he would have cut him down, when he fell himself in a heap from a tremendous blow which one of the soldiers struck him with his sabre.

"Jump inside," Jacques said to James. "We may have some more of those dangerous spies shadowing him who may come out to see what the noise is about. He will be no trouble any more to the dear princesses."

He seized the prostrate body, threw it upon the box and taking his seat drove on. The vehicle soon again came to a stop.

"What is it Jacques?" James asked putting his head out of the window.

"I wish to get rid of this fellow," the man said. "Here is a bridge across the Mic-Holleston Run River. You stop where you are. I will get rid of this thrash." However James got out.

"Is this the second idea?" he asked in a very low voice.

"Well consider that I had split his head well high in two, I should think he was," Jacques said. "It could not be helped you know, for if I hadn't struck a sharp, it would have been all over with you. Any how for the sake of the princesses it is better as it is a hundred times. It is said to be a pretty big sin not to put out of the way such dirty scoundrels as these and also a sin to harbor the enemy of the Vivian girls, princesses. If you value your soul so do. Now get in again. I shall be only two minutes and then we'll go where we will meet the princesses where you said they would be waiting in the dark for you."

He slipped off the red sea h and coat and waist coat of the dead man, emptied his trouser-pocket, and turned them inside out, then lifting the body on his shoulders and placing the box of explosive underneath, as he carried both part part way across the bridge and then flung them both into the river. The explosives The explosives sank out of sight, and the man too for a moment and then bobbed up and floated down stream.

"If the Glandelinian spies find him they'll never know who he is," He said to himself. "I will keep the coat and waist coat for myself."

The wheel turned and they drove on again until James ordered him to stop. Seven little figures were seen standing in a doorway which was large.

"Is that Violet and her sisters there?" asked James in English so in case case they were any duplicates which he also feared since that letter, they couldn't understand him. If they answered in Abbeisannian then he would be suspicious.

"Oh James is it you. Can it be true, that you frustrate the spy and his bomb plot."

"Yes," said James getting out, and helping them into the carriage.

As soon as they were in the carriage Jennie's spirit which had so long sustained the girl gave way and leaning her head upon his shoulders she burst into tears.

The others looked solemn but said nothing to rid them cry. James soothed and pacified her until she had composed herself.

"Are you taking us back to general Nance's headquarters?" James asked Violet.

"No," James said. "It would not be safe to do so and he has changed himself. There are already suspicious, seven persons boys have duplicated as you little girls and we have to do something to frustrate them. They have been denounced but Heaven knows they cannot be captured."

James gave a cry of alarm.

"I have managed to cause general Nemo to see the document, girls, and he gave us permission through the intercession of an officer to get while the getting is good and we must start down the river if possible. We can start in a day or two. Still it would be better for you not to go near no building what ever, to discard your uniforms and wear your civilian clothes. Here general Nance gave me these these identification papers for you so you can explain yourselves."

If you are not recognized and questioned in disguise unless you are known in civilian clothes, put don't wear real disguises yet. I will arrange for you to little girls to meet with Starling to morrow. You must try to bring him to and he shall accompany us. I have a trick that I believe will work."

"Where are we going then?"

"You are going to be hidden in the base hospital where he is for several days where the doctor and the nurses have shown themselves faithful and trustworthy by nursing poor Starling, who has nearly for these two weeks been lying ill there since he was wounded by an enemy hurled hand grenade. You will be perfectly safe there till we can arrange matters. My goodness how hard it is raining. We will have to hustle."

"But if we dress as civilians we surely need not the papers as we would be safe enough surely and can go where we like for civilian clothes cannot disguise us here."

"I know that you will be surely safe from arrest by mistake within general Nance's lines, because you could even if arrested appeal to him who knows you in civilian clothes, but outside the army going to another it would be different. However we can talk about that to morrow, when at the hospital you little girls have a good night's rest."

"If we go there the soldiers will think we are ill," smiled Violet.

"Let them think it, I want you little girls to get all the sympathy you deserve. You suffer too much already to my liking and I'm getting mighty 'averageful.'"

You suffer too much already to my liking and I'm getting mighty 'averageful.' James did not think it necessary to say that when Lebatte was missing by the still numerous secret spies it would probably be associated with the seen leaving the corner of Company L with a carriage driver, and that if inquiries were set on foot about him, Violet and her sisters might be that much more sought for by them, however Violet and her sisters said no more on the subject, quite content that James should make what ever arrangements he thought best, and so she began to ask all sort of questions about the general and how he worked against their secret enemies, and so passed the time until they were close to company Street La Polone, then James called to Jacques to stop.

"Will you please get out angle ideas, and wait with our good soldier friend here until I return. I shall be back in five minutes. I have to hand the coach over to its owners."

"Why not let them ride first to general Nemo's headquarters so they would not have to walk?" said Jacques taking pity on the little girls.

"Willingly only, but don't like to wait a time by making the trip over again" laughed James. "The tent is right in front of us."

"Oh," Jacques threw his uniform clothes over his arm, and got down from the box. James took his seat and drove to the place where he found the coachman waiting for him.

"Well my boy have you managed the job and saved the little angels?"

"Saved the little angels. Well to make a long story short that bomber is no more. Poor little girls, I hope this persecution of their enemies will make the dirty rascals get wise and leave them alone. Here is your cape and your money, my friend and thank you."

"You are heartily welcome" the driver said mounting his box. "I wish I could do as well every day, but these war times are bad times for us, and money is precious scarce I tell you."

"James soon joined Jacques and the little girls, where the general himself having gotten eight horses waited for the little girls and the boy to mount for the general was willing to help all he can. There were few words said as they made their way through the company Street in the dark, for Violet and her sisters were weakened by their long siege of loneliness and sorrow, and from the shadow of their unseen perils, and shaken by what they had already gone through. The little girls had not asked a single question as to what had become of the would be bomber, but they had no doubt that he was killed. They had grown however from their many experiences almost indifferent to death.

By day after day in times past they had seen many children murdered by the enemy before their eyes, and the retribution which had fallen upon this would be assassin gave them scarcely a thought, except a feeling of thankfulness that they were free from the cruel persecutions of their betrayer.

Completely as she and her sisters trusted James it was with the greatest difficulty that they had brought themselves to obey his instructions, and to leave the headquarters quickly at night after a timely warning to the general and to place themselves for a short time in that dark hall door, and for some reason for the first time they had a shivering terror of dark places and it took up all their courage to do it. When they first hesitated and general Nance told them warningly that already several times the boy had saved them from death, and that if the spies had discovered them they would have been assassinated they had cried long before they finally went out, and as they went forth they never stopped saying the prayer to themselves in their terror. After they had left the building they had looked around with their rifled faces for fear of hidden foes spring at them in the dark, and had one hand on their pistols, and another on a pistol, and prayed that the possession angels would protect them. Trembling with fright for the first time in their lives they had done as James declared, and had won out.

When they reached the hospitable building, the nurse opened the door at James' ring, and stared in awe and great amazement as she saw the beautiful little girls standing there with James. She had heard of them and their beauty but this was the first time she had seen them and so pretty were they that she could hardly stand to look and almost got scared in spite of herself.

"So you have come poor dear little lamb lambs" she finally said recovering herself. "Thanks to the good God that all has turned out well. You will be safe here little princesses until the proper thing can be fitted out for your escape to Pandora. This is a ill smelling hospital because of so many horribly wounded soldiers but we will take care of you as if you were our own."

So saying she led the little girls to the sitting room of the big base hospital to wait for the room which had been prepared for them and James. There was already a communication existing between the two sets of apartments.

While they were waiting Jennie herself could see that James was thinking something of Penrod and even their father and mother.

"What is it James?" Jennie exclaimed. "I can see by your looks you have news. What is it?"

"I have news," James said. "And good news, but you must not excite yourselves."

"Have you found a way for getting to Father's army?"

"Yes indeed through a general's help. I have found a way."

"A sure certain way James?" Violet asked; "not only a chance."

"A sure certain way," James replied. "You need have no fear if you shall soon see your parents and brothers."

The little girls stood speechless with delight. It never occurred to them to doubt James words when he spoke so confidently.

"Have you told us all James?" Jennie asked a minute later looking earnestly in his face. "Can it be— is he really very close to us?"

"Yes," James said. "Thank God I got the news from general Nemo this morning. The Emperor's divisions headquarters is in Pandora city. His army has cut his way through and is there, and we are going there as soon as possible. General Nemo found that the make the trip first by land, and do then down the river to Pandora is safe as that is open."

With a cry of evident delight Violet and the little girls who were nearest him sprang to him, and throwing her arms around his neck kissed him in the exuberance of her happiness. She threw her dress apron over her head and burst into tears of thankfulness, while Jennie then also threw her arms around his neck and clinging to him said:

"Oh James how can we ever thank you enough for all you have ever done for us."

Two weeks ago Jennie would have probably acted as Violet or the other sisters did but those two weeks had changed her greatly, indeed ever since she had received that long letter from Penrod, that mysterious note which she had never even shown to any one even her sisters, there had been a shade of difference in her manner to James and the same had been with her sisters, and which he had more than once noticed and wondered at and feared that now he could never part from them for the belief that they would not let him. It was some little time before the little girls were sufficiently composed to listen to James story.

"But why not bring the whole troop of boy and girl scouts along James?" He Hattie asked. "Why do you intend leaving them here?"

"For several good reasons and on good sound advice from general Nemo Hattie. I have told you before and so have your sisters, that Walter Starling is still within the Christian lines."

Hattie uttered an exclamation of wonder. "He stopped here to help me look after you little angels, but he has been wounded and has had a very bad illness from it, and is terribly weak, and does not even know me. While for several days you little girls will as I know remain by his bedside beside one of you will nurse him. You can choose among yourselves who it will be or who ever loves him best better choose for herself. I have great hopes that he will know you little girls, and that one of you or all of you may in time effect a complete cure. In the next place it would be as general Nance said, dangerous to leave him here, he must go along with you, and for your protection on your journey all the regiment of girl and boy scouts will accompany you. The general said they are the terror to the enemy and could guard you just as good as the angels can as it is believed in one way or less they too may be angel possessed even though there are no symptoms and therefore could bring you safely through."

"But could they really all go with us without exception? Is it really necessary? Is the danger so great?"

"Yes I am afraid to Catherine" have learned Mrs. Jerry that seven Glandelinian boyscouts have been discovered duplicating as the princesses and carry with them dangerous implements with which they could carry out their assassin schemes to a perfection, every one has been suspicious, and a letter of denunciation has already been sent, and have shown it to the general. But as no one can do anything to trace the rascals it will be absolutely necessary to make a move. I kept the original denunciation and gave it to Angelina Aronson so she can have all the child scouts watch you like a guardian watches his jewelry. I have also duplicated the first letter too, and though the general and all his followers evidently won't let the matter drop under any condition and will push things to drastic measures, and have notified Pantonia and Marate and other Christian generals, yet it seems those rats cannot be located and so we must move without delay. It is useless now to even disguise within the Christian lines, those little scoundrels are a good disguise leaders and therefore dress as citizens. You cannot charge your lodging, for they would certainly trace you, and even though at the present time the regulations about lodgers are so strict that no one would dare receive any one until the military committee of the district have examined the persons and are perfectly satisfied yet the spies are so slick that now their whereabouts cannot be discovered. Worse of all one of the seven has mysteriously disappeared, and I'm suspicious that one of the seven is the one trying to keep an eye on you little girls. Also there is a man with them. When we go forth for the dodges make take no child scouts with you whose faces you do not know. Our friends are acquainted with. Therefore I think you must go with the child scouts whom you and your leaders know personally by face, name and name. But for a time you are wanted here for the sake of poor Walter Starling, and I think Jennie ought to be selected for it because you are far safer among him than you would be doing anything else, and besides now you are giving a chance to travel by the decree of General Nemo, and as long as to keep within this hospital until the given time there is no fear of further danger, even if you idently was discovered by the seven duplicate spies which I do believe are poor ones at that - other wise they would not have been denounced. God no knows no body can imitate you voices no matter how they may make themselves look. Lastly it would be safer to travel with him and the whole division of boy and girls than for me and you little girls to chance it alone by ourselves. It will be difficult enough in any case but it would certainly be worse for us without them. General Nemo said if you do not wish to take the child scout troop along then don't go at all as you could chance destruction. The child scouts are mere kids as we call them in America, but from the general I have heard things about them which I could not hardly believe my ears, and so we must have them with us. The enemy I'm sure would not even risk the slightest intercourse with them."

"But that would surely be just beautiful," said Angelina, "but we are to see Angelina Aronburg James. Surely we cannot start that advance without seeing her about it?"

"Certainly not Evangelina, but she knows about it already. This evening after dark we will meet with Angelina Aronburg in the gardens of the Abbeian Military Tuilleries. The great girl scout Christian Hettie Kaufmann will also be there, and a great company of girl scouts only and only those the leaders know, and guards will be placed to keep all strangers from the gardens even under penalty of death if they try to come too near, as they'll have orders to shoot first and explain afterwards, as we cannot take chances. Mr. Jerry will you bring them down with an escort of soldiers and be with them near the main entrance to morrow night. I will bring the girl scout leaders there at six o'clock. And now I must be off, as here comes the Nurse." The nurse came with the news that the little girls may come to supper and James too.

They did and after supper the nurse said:

"Drink this my dear little angels and then go straight to bed in the room I have prepared for them in the hospital guest room, your friend James will be here and then you can talk over your plans with him."

She waited to see the little girls drink the bouillon which had a slight amount of sleeping sleeping potion in it, and then they were taken to their room.

"You little friends will be asleep in five minutes," she said when she re joined her doctor husband and James. "They are worn out with excitement, but a nights rest will do wonders for them. Don't come from your room adjoining too early in the morning James; I want them for their good to sleep late, and I would not disturb them until they are awake of themselves."

"I will remain in my room until about nine," James said, "and will go round after that and see the girl scout leader Angelina Aronburg. He will be wondering she has not seen anything of me to day, but I was afraid to tell her anything till it was all over. The anxiety would have been too great for her."

However the next morning James stayed at Angelina Aronburg's a little later than he said because he had so much to talk and plan over. When he returned to the hospital he saw something like a boy sneak away from the gate at his approach the almost to his startled eyes looked like Violet herself as she does in disguise but not so pretty. At first he hesitated but he remembered suddenly that they would not go out without his advice or that the nurse would not let them do anything care less he whipped out his pistol and yelled "Halt." He however returned a corner of the Company Street, and James at full speed after him but found he had disappeared as if the air had taken him.

If it was Violet she certainly wouldn't run from me if she knew me," thought James. "I wonder if that wasn't one of the duplicates. I can tell when I get in. If Violet is there and I hear her voice then I'll know for sure, but it'll upset them if I tell them what I saw so just now I'll say nothing."

Violet and her sisters were up and dressed in civilian clothes and in their own room when James arrived, and some of them were sitting by the open window. "Girls," James said as he came in, "I won't say why but I had an experience that gave me the creeps when I came. For sure I don't sit near that window."

They immediately moved away.

"I have just left Angelina Aronburg and her friends," said James in English. "And you may imagine the delight at the news I gave them. You are to see them this evening in the Military Garden of the Tuilleries."

"Oh James how good you are. How much you have done for us. I sometimes don't believe you are really a boy but one of our angels in disguise," said Antol Angelina.

James laughed lightly.

"Not very much yet beside, it has been a pleasure as well as a duty. You girl scout friends have been oh so brave, and Angelina Aronburg has the head of a magician. She says she knows she can get you through to Pandora all right."

"She despite how young she is is nearly a woman in her ways and knowledge," Joyce said gently. "She is some months past sixteen, and though you tell me girls of that age in England are still quite children; it is not so here. By it is nothing uncommon for girl scouts at her age to do what she has. If it had not been often for her or Catherine Lee, we little princesses would be no more way before this, and she is our nearest Cousin."

"Well at any rate," James said, "Angelina Aronburg has no time for anything else but to work up for us now. But there is another thing I want to tell you about. I have first a confession to make. A strange good startling news which you would like to hear."

"That we would like to hear," they all smiled. "It can be nothing more good than before or nothing very dreadful James. Well what is it?"

"It is more interesting than you think girls. Now you know that when the trouble began I felt it quite out of the question for me to run away, and to leave you all here among so many unseen perils within even a Christian army a very unprotected. Such a thing would have been preposterous, cowardly."

"You think so James because you have a good heart; but in Abbeian no body thinks only of themselves, and would also run all sorts of risks for the sake of us seven little girls with no claim upon them, but they would not have known what to do to shield us and you can use your head. From what I have seen and known of Americans from the United States I could dread them if I was on the wrong side of them. I remember a man once whom I know by the name of George McGinn. He's a terror and he came from Chicago in the United States. The enemy thinks he is a demon in human form."

"Well girls you allow that a person with a good heart would naturally do as, did."

"Well supposing I do James what then?"

"You must still remember that a person with a good heart and upon whom you little girls had a claim, would all the more have remained to protect you, a very dear friend of yours and Walter Starling's."

"What are you driving at James, with your supposition?" she said hopefully as a suspicion of some truth flashed upon her as she saw in his mind something of Catherine Jane Lee.

"Well Princesses you mustn't be agitated, and I hope you will not be over excited when you know that Walter Starling did not run off like a coward and leave you here. But the shock or surprise is this. When it was learned that he was wounded a girl scout came to stay by his bedside also but could do nothing. He is his sister. Catherine Lee is his sister."

Some of the little girls has risen to their feet while Jennie gazed at him with frightened eyes.

"What is it the matter with him. Is it really true he did not go away? Has any thing more than you told that happened to him? Oh James do not say he is dead! We had such a shock before when we thought he was killed in battle."

"He is not dead Jennie, but from the effects of his wounds and his dread of the danger you were in he has been very ill. The shock of the shell concussion nearly killed him. He has had a fever, and has been at deaths door at present he is mending, but very very slowly. He knows no one not even me, he won't even have his sister near him and flings things at her mistaking her for one of your enemies. She did a lot for you and I trust that your voices and your presence will do wonders for him. You are angel possessed and their influence can help him. If he cannot come to us we cannot go anywhere."

"Where is he James? Violet said as she and Jennie stood with clasped hands and faces from which every vestige of color had flown. "Take me to him at once."

"He is in this hospital girls, that is why I have brought you here. These good people have nursed him since he came here."

Jennie made a movement toward the door followed by her sisters.

"Wait little angels dear, you mustn't go to him until you compose yourselves for it is all important that you should speak to him, when you little girls see him in your cheery natural voices, and you must prepare yourselves for a shock. He is at present a mere wreck, so changed that you good little girls will hardly know him."

"You are telling us the truth James dear? You are not hiding from us that he is dying?"

"No dear princesses, I believe on my honor, that he is out of danger now and that he is still progressing. It is his mind more than his body that is the need of cure. It may be a long and difficult task girls, before he is himself again, but I believe that with the care and companionship that you little girls can give him he will get round in time, but it may be months before that and he must therefore travel with our column in a covered wagon. "There is nothing," Je Joice said. "But what about the boy scouts?"

"They are to accompany us too. You don't understand that I said the whole division no one excluded except those whose faces you little girls or the officers do not know. We shall start within a day or two and then shall try to make for the Micollister Run River, and then across the bridge to Penroda. We cannot stay here, even if any number of spies are denounced and may be arrested at any time for your chief enemies, the ones to be dreaded cannot even be located. I saw one only this morning and he escaped me. There for it is absolutely necessary that we should go as soon as to morrow morning, but I thought that first it would be your duty to stay for one day with Walter Starling, seeing that to him your presence is every thing, while your sisters could assist you in several duties in the mean while off and on, and when we start indeed the bigger number of boy and girls are well equipped and well mounted with you the better."

"Certainly it is our duty," said Jennie firmly.

"Until we go forth you little girls will be perfectly safe here in the nurse hospital, and you have loss of boy and girls scouts for your protection. Then when Walter is better enough to be moved, which we hope by to morrow morning we will be better able to get to Penroda together."

"I leave us a few minutes by our selves James dear. All this has come so suddenly upon us that I feel bewildered, and I believe my sisters do too." "Certainly," said James. "It is best that you should think things over a little. No wonder you feel bewildered and shaken with all the unjust trials you have gone through."

The little girls went to their room, and returned in a quarter of an hour. "I am indeed ready now," she said, "and so are my sisters" and by the calm and tranquil expression of her face, and also those of her sisters James felt that they could be trusted to see Walter Starling.

"I have a strange feeling," she went on. "That every thing will come right in the end." "I and my sisters have often been saved almost by a miracle. I and sometimes by real miracles like police with the breaking of that unbreakable rope when she was cruelly hanged, and I cannot but feel that our lives have been spared in order that we should be preserved for our holy Nation for all time. It was a shock however when we were told that fresh danger threatened us through spies duplicating us, but we feel safe nevertheless because they cannot do it to a perfect perfection, we feel perfectly sure they can't, but whatever comes we know that you now can pull us through anything, and our dear blessed Lord has marked out our places with Father's armies. I had a dream last night that I saw something like an angel who seemed to tell me that soon, and my parents will not be separated so often any more by the action of the war, and with Penrod and our elder brothers never any James there is no need of us to despair. God has aided and protected us so far through the most dangerous trials, and will aid us still for that is why he has possessed us with angels. Now we are ready for whatever may betide."

"One moment before you enter, Princesses. You little girls are prepared as you know to see a great change in Walter, but nevertheless you cannot but be shocked at first. Do not any of you go up to him or attract his attention till you have overcome this and are able to speak to him in your natural voice, for I think a great deal depends upon the first impression you little angels make upon his brain. The voices of you little girls have changed a great deal since the day I first came to serve you; it would be strange if it had not, but I want you little girls to try and speak to him in the bright cheerful tone he was accustomed to hear."

N Jennie nodded.

"One moment please," she said, as she brushed aside the tears which filled her eyes, (poor little girls who should not need to have even shed a tear) drew herself up with a little gesture that reminded James of old times, and then with a swift step passed through the door following by her sisters into the room where Walter Starling was. Whatever she or her sisters felt at the sight of the wasted figure lying listlessly with half closed eyes on the couch, it only showed itself by a swift expression of violent pain which passed for a moment across their faces, and then was gone.

"Walter," Jennie said in her clear, bird-like ringing voice. "Walter Starling, our well beloved friend, we have come to you."

The effect indeed upon the good boy was instantaneous. He opened his eyes with a start half rose from his couch, looked at them first in wonder and awe as if he was seeing really angels, then he rubbed his armor held his arm across his face for a moment and then looked at them again. Then his face changed expression for he had recognized them and he held out his arms toward them.

"Dear little princesses," he said in a faint voice. "You are safe. Thanks be to God and His Blessed Mother. I have wanted your presences so much, have wanted you little girls so much." "My dear James,"

Then as Jennie and Violet first advanced toward him, and with her sisters kneeling by his side, and he had clasped the first two in each arm, James and the Red Cross nurse stole quietly from the room. It was nearly an hour before Violet, and her sisters came out. There was a soft glow of happiness on their beautiful little faces though their cheeks were pale.

"Not yet," Jennie said as she and her sisters swept past them into their room.

In a few minutes they reappeared.

"Pardon us," Violet herself first said holding out her hands to James and the nurse. "But we had to thank the good God for what, and our blessed Mother too. Walter is quite sensible now, but oh so weak. He remembers nothing of the past, but seems to think that he is still in the Imperial Japanese army, and had some how been wounded and had an illness. He first thought after Jennie spoke to him that she was really seeing seven little angels for we actually appeared like that to him, but he recognized the voice. Then he spoke of our dear father and mother and of Penrod as being here in the same place, and that he hoped that I and my sisters would try and get Penrod for him. I and Jennie told him that all should be as he wished as soon as he got stronger, but that he must think of anything now, and that while we travel I and my sisters would take turns watching nursing him and all would be well. He seemed puzzled about our dress, we were clothed so beautifully colored and styled and he at first feared we were not the little princesses but angels for sure. For Violet and her sisters were already dressed in civilian clothes. At I told him that we were dressed as this in the Christian lines, that we were real and not little angels, and he said 'Yes you are little angels, little angels could not outstrip you in goodness. He has just dozed off to sleep, and one of us have selected to go in and sit with him now till he wakes, while you James dear can carry out your plans with my other sisters as Jennie will be with me.'"

"When he does Princess I will have some broth and a glass of good stimulating wine for him," the nurse said.

"Thank you, but please call me Violet in the future for the time being as it is safest, and James dear would you mind telling my sisters here that we should do something good for Starling, and also tell Angelina Aronburg that we will meet them here and her friends to morrow instead of this evening. We long to see her and her companions oh, oh so much and find out details; but we should not like to leave him for a moment now. I fear so that his memory might go again if he were to wake and miss us, and that would suffer for us with our plans."

"I was going to propose it myself Violet," James said. "It is all important to avoid any agitation now. To morrow I hope it will be safer, and the doctor will give him a sleeping draught, so that he shall not wake while you are away. But Violet remember that it will be a visit to plan things, for we cannot dare to stay more than another day. Of course those duplicate spies may be denounced again at any hour, for the man who wrote to General Aronburg, if he finds that nothing comes of it may go to the General or Local Committee and they may not lose an hour you may be sure, but those duplicate spies know you little girls and may act before they are apprehended, so be wise and do not delay."

"I and my sisters must see them and Angelina Aronburg this evening then." Jennie herself said hurriedly. "The doctor you say will be here soon?" to the nurse.

"Yes Jennie dear."

"Then Walter must have his sleeping draught this afternoon instead of to morrow. We must go at once. We can get some wagon for him. I should never forgive myself if by putting off my journey for twenty-four hours I caused myself and my sisters to be observed by those spies and have all consequences for it. So please hurry on all the arrangements so that we may leave the first thing in the morning."

"It will be best," James said. "If you will do it Jennie, I own that I am in a fever of apprehension. Only this morning I chased some one that had an appearance of being you Violet. I shot at him but he escaped. I will go there at once to tell Gertrude Angelina that all must be in readiness to night. They will be glad indeed to hear the presence of you little angels has done such wonders for Walter. They will be able to go forth with you and their scout troop with better heart if they feel that Walter comes with us and you stay with him during the journey is likely to bring health to him and happiness to you little girls, and a happy reunion with your parents and brothers."

"C A well since Violet said 'I did not seem to us that we could ever be happy again, but though every thing is still very dark, the clouds seem lifting. You have been a wonder to us James.'"

"Angelina Aronburg will greatly rejoice when she hears the good news that Walter has recognized us," said Angelina as Jennie and Violet went in to Walter's room for a moment.

"And now we must talk about ourselves," James said, "before we see her and her friends. We must not lose another hour. Mrs. Jerry, you must take part in our council. First I'll close this door and draw the blinds so no peeping Tom can overhear us anything. We have everything to settle," he said as he drew down the last window shade and lit a candle, "and only a few confounded hours to do it in. I should like if possible that we should not come back here this evening after you little girls have once left the hospital and Starling will be brought to us. Of course the man who denounced you - duplicates will expect that something will be done to day, and when he sees that nothing has come of his letter he may go this evening to the local committee, and they would send men every where on the lookout, but if we delay too long that won't help; help us any. No doubt he only wrote to General Nemo first, and I placed the letter so he could see it first. Of all before all others, but as it seems to do no good those scoundrels may be very shrewd and therefore cannot be seen or detected. But if Mrs. Jerry that it cannot be possibly be managed, I will write a letter to him in Nemo's name saying that his letter has been noted, but that no trace of the dirty snakes can be discovered, and will thank him for his zeal in the public service if he would come and cover us to prevent any harm coming to you and your sisters. I know the place and name of the man. In fact if you like I know where he is and can go in person and ask his help."

"No I think we are ready and will trust to God and our angels," Angelina said. "Of course we have been talking it over for a week now and agreed it was better to be in readiness whenever you told us it was time to go. Mrs. Jerry will tell you all about it."

James looked toward Mrs. Jerry. "The proper disguises are all ready James; and yesterday when you said that all the regiments of boy and girl scouts we are to accompany them, I settled if you do not see any objections to go with the dear little angels." "Capital idea, and I should be very glad," said James eagerly, "although he had seen no way out of the difficulties and inconveniences of a journey alone with so many boy and girl scouts had been continually on his mind. The idea of taking the good old lady with them had never occurred to him but he now hailed it as the most welcome solution of their difficulty and he continued, "That will be a thousand times better in any way, for with you with us it would excite no fear, no mark than for seven of us to be traveling alone in case we accidentally got too far from the column of escort. But if Mrs. Jerry that the hard ships we may have to undergo will be great and Glandelinian cavalry cavalry will probably gather strong enough against us to give considerable trouble."

"It matters little," the old woman said, "I nursed their mother, and have for years lived on her bounty and gladly now will give what little remains to me of life in the service of her dear angel child. I know that every thing is turned topsy turvy in our poor country at present, but as long as I have a spark of life in my body I will not let my dear mistress's children be for any length of time wandering about with only a young boy and a column of child scouts to protect them, when upon these the Glandelinians may direct their fiercest attacks if they have courage to do so."

"Yes it is better in every way," James said, "I felt that it would be a strange position, but it seemed that it could not be helped, however you offered us out of the embarrassment. So your disguises for outside the Christian lines are ready."

"Yes James," Mrs. Jerry said, "I have a suit like those of boys for the youngest girls. They did not trust it at first saying the enemy would detect them any way but I thought that if two of them were disguised as boys it would be better. But I mustn't disguise within the Christian lines for, think if we did it would seem strange and may cause us to be arrested by the soldiers. You know Violet was arrested by mistake by the best friend General Nance."

"And he advised us not to disguise within the Christian camps," said Violet. "It is dangerous in these times."

"I think it is a very good plan to disguise outside some where Mrs. Jerry, but you must get out of the way of calling me James or else it will slip out before persons who may be suspicious. Call me Henry. Now what I propose is that we will use an army covered wagon to convey Walter in. You will be Grandmother and we shall pretend we are traveling from a farm to visit your daughter, who is married to a farmer near Pandora. That will be a likely story now, and while in the territory you can always make a detour to avoid towns. It will be dark when you go out this evening, so you can take three bundles of clothing with you. The only thing is about to night. The weather is dreadfully warm and it is out of the question that you should step out to night in all that pouring rain, and yet we could not ask for a tent lodging close to here when we cannot tell whether those spies will find us, and do us up."

"Oh I see now," said Joice. "The best plan for us all will be for us to sleep to night at General Nemo's headquarters, and then we can start early in the morning, and not be suspicious of us."

"That will certainly be the best way," Mrs. Jerry said. "I have been under a great deal of stress since you said we must start this evening what would become of us to night. When we once get fairly away from the Christian army it will be easier for us to go as there is no enemy patrols in night things will be better but James don't you think that once we are near the outskirts of the Christian lines it would be safer to travel at night, and get shelter some where to sleep during the day where enemy soldiers will not see us."

"No it cannot be," said James. "Night time is more dangerous as the foe at night are much more watchful, especially when we take along with us such a big column of boy and girl scouts. The"

"Then when shall we meet Angelina Aronburg and her followers this evening?" "I will be at the end of the Company Street," James said. "It is quite dark by eight now so do you start a quarter of an hour later, hide your bundles under your cloak, for if those duplicates are on the lookout that follow with them who seems to be the leader he might follow you if he thought you were leaving. Draw your blinds up when you leave Mrs. Jerry so that the rooms will look as usual, and then it may be some time before any of the spies if they could come around suspect a that you have just left; and if I were you I would mention to some of your neighbors this afternoon, that you have had a letter from your friends in Pandora, to make it useless for them to stay with them letters for you to show and are going away soon with your neices to stay with them for a while. You had better pay your rent for the month in advance, and tell your landlord the same thing, saying that you may go suddenly any time, as a friend who is in the army and is also going back is going to take charge of you on the journey, and that he may call for you at any time. Thus when he finds that you have left, your absence will be accounted for, not that it makes much difference for I hope that when you have seen the little princesses safely in Pandora you will make your home with them there until I hear they can get communications with their father whose headquarters is now there and see their brother Penrod."

"Yes providing though that this army later would move away I would not have a chance to come back here," the old woman said. "Daisy exclaimed, "and see dear Penrod and father and mother again. How anxious they must be about us, not having heard of us but once all this long, long time. How shall we know where to find them?" "You forget Daisy dear," Joice said. "It was arranged that first we should all go to James own home and father when we got to Pandora, and from there by investigation we can learn where father and our brothers are, there is sure to be no mistake about that is there, James?"

"James laughed. "Yes there would be if I didn't know the city," he said. "Just let me find out where they are and I'll have you with them in a jiffy. You may rely upon it directly you little girls get to my father you will hear where he is. Father and brothers are and mother too. If she came to Pandora, and now I will go first and tell Angelina Aronburg, Aronburg's headquarters."

James then left the hospital and headed for Angelina Aronburg's headquarters and seeing no guard there went in. Angelina Aronburg was not in the tent but he discovered a boy scout of some sort in there and the interior of the tent was so turned inside out that James knew the lad had aided the tent for some thing. A flash of recognition passed between the two.

"What are you doing here you rascal," said James. "Think I don't know you eh. You double crossed me a year ago and caused the faithful death of two little girl friends of mine and my elder brother. You've caught you red handed eh. Hiding Miss Aronburg's headquarters."

"But—but—but—this is war," the culprit pleaded, as he saw he was cornered.

James laughed bitterly as he looked around the interior of the tent, and just then Angelina here self came in and to her horror saw the condition of the tent and James there before a cowering boy taller than he. James was unconscious of the fact she was there.

"I suppose," sneered James, "you rascal didn't know?" "Yes," said the taller boy, "put how did you know?" "For answer," James drew his gun. The spy gun lay in its holster on the table where he had foolishly thrown it when he came in.

"So you thought you could sneak away and leave me in a fix like this the loss of my two little girl friends and brother, and then go hiding this tent?" and James laughed the dry cackling laugh as of a mad boy. At that instant the other boy whose name was Toby made a play as if to get the gun on the table seeing the way things were going, put James swung his weapon and grabbed up the holster himself. Then Toby began to get a grip on himself, whatever the outcome of this night may be perhaps if he talked quickly to him. Angelina Aronburg's pack dangled from his back.

"If you'll just tell me, Fiedler boy, what this is all about?" he began; but James cut him short with the sharp command:

"Take off that pack."

"You mad kid?" Toby shot back at him, realizing that soft words were not going to do any good. "You'll get a Glandelinian firing squad for this. But he took off the pack just the same."

"Mad am I?" Taug taunted James savagely. "That's what you Glandelinian snakes think. But I am just as sane this minute as you are and knowing what I am doing. You are that duplicate spy who tried to make yourself look like Princesses Violet Toby Toby but I know you you skunk. I was sane when we first met at Cedar nine, where you Glandelinians took away every thing, hoped to love and live for after I got out of that hell. You killed two little girl friends of mine of course it by double crossing me and I'm an American and we do not of my nationality take double crossing from any one. I was sane for months in the hospital while they operated a dozen times before they could save my arm thanks to you. I and my parents had a fine home near Cedar nine and thanks to you we lost it all. I was sane enough to curse you every waking day and swear I would get you if I had to travel through and over the whole world and sea to do it, though, I didn't believe I'd ever find you again. Ha. Ha. I find you here and in this mess robbing a girl scout leaders tent. I'm sane now and we are back in imagination at Cedar nine --- where we left off. Don't think you are going to get away with it now. As for you Glandelinian firing squad --- to hell with it and you too. I came here to see a girl friend of mine Angelina Aronburg and find you here. Ha. Ha. That's good. It's a lucky day for me, and so you're Princess Violet. Well hello dear violet how are you, lovely day we are having ain't it. Ha. I shoot you now or wait until you face a firing squad first. You tried to cripple and ruin me and now try to double cross me again with your ruse. Where's your sister violet dear? Got to bring them here eh? I've got the upper hand now you duplicating double crossing snake and I'm going to cripple you --- or kill you."

"But the boy cried again, realizing at last his peril because he saw the girl standing behind James astonished at the boys long oration. "You can't do this justly. It is fair in war to do this."

"Sure it is fair in war for me to kill you like a snake you are," he James caulked his lips flecked with foam. "That's a joke that you should turn out to be princess violet too. A poor duplicate you are. I wish your sisters were here. I'd like to kill them too."

He laughed his cackling laugh again, and his eyes danced with fury. "You can't do this. The boy repeated, while realizing how powerless he was as a little American in a fury is more dangerous and ferocious than any Abbeinnian. He now took a steep step toward him as if to appeal to the American boys better nature. The words and the action were automatic for he James saw him move toward him his arm stiffened behind the gun --- and the inside of the tent was instantly filled with a deafening exploded explosive boom. Simultaneously there was a flash of fire from the guns muzzle and the boy Toby dropped to the floor shot in the breast a trickle of crimson oozing through his blouse, and spread to a fan like blotch. At the crash of the explosion a swarm of boy scouts came running to the tent some getting in and seeing what had happened gasped.

"He was a spy robbing my headquarters and James shot him," said Angelina Aronburg. "Take him away and straighten out my tent."

She was absolutely unmoved at what had happened though at first she had been appalled. When the excitement had died down and the badly wounded spy was taken away James then told her of his mission, and she delighted at the thought that she was going to have Violet and her sisters with her the whole evening and night with general Memo and she herself forgetting the incident of the shooting easily busied herself with the preparations for the accommodation accommodations of her guests. James then went back to his attic in general Memo's headquarters thankful he had put one of the duplicates out of the way, and a special enemy of his as well made his clothes into a bundle, and took up the bag of money from its hiding place under a board and placed it into his pocket. He had since he had been with general Memo gradually charged the money into smaller change in order to make it more convenient to carry and it was now of comparatively little weight, although he had drawn but slightly upon it. His pistols were also placed in their holsters again. He went downstairs and awaited the return of general Memo.

"You Excellency," he said as the general entered. "Circumstances have occurred which rendered it necessary for me to travel down to Pandora to escape encounter the princesses and their household keepers to my home time under an escort of boy and girl scouts, they cannot dare travel alone in such times as these and they have a claim upon me which I cannot ignore. Surely that is not so dangerous a route on traveling toward Pandora, I assure you."

"Surely my boy," the general said, "the affairs of the dear princesses are of more importance than private matters like these."

"Assuredly they are general. My duty in this matter is clear to me because from the fact that those duplicate spies cannot be located and as they are dangerous in the extreme it has to be done, and, I can only regret that my absence may put you to some inconvenience. But I have a double favor to ask you, the one is to spare me for at least a time, the second, that you will give me papers as command ing me and the princesses traveling with me to the authorities of the towns in possession of christian troops through which we shall pass in order we would not be taken up as spies against the christian cause by mistake. In these times when the enemies of all christianity are traveling throughout our country it is necessary to have papers showing who we really are."

"But I have no authority for that," the general said astonished. "I'm only a plan general."

"You may be so but you are a great one just the same. It is to you men look more than to any other general. Hence, I cannot locate you alone to combine fearlessness in the cause of Abbeinnia with that wisdom and moderation which are above all things necessary in guiding the country and its armies through the war dangers."

The general was not vain and did not hardly seem to accept the complement as his due and he waved his hand with an air of deprecation. "Therefore general," James went on, "a letter from you would be more powerful than an order from another. I suppose of course you would ask why they don't make out their own passes, but in parts where they are not known such passes would not be respected. Therefore it was best to me to appeal to you. I would to general Memo but he is not there."

"But those princesses who are to travel with you James --- how am I to be sure and you too, that they would not be shadowed no matter where they go by their secret deadly enemies?"

"Abbeinnia is not to be shaken," James said smiling, "by the efforts of an old woman of seventy, and the princesses disguised as different children outside the christian lines, but I can assure you their house keeps had rigged up disguised disguises that no enemies can detect them in. General you assured the first boon which I asked you as it seemed impossible for them to travel that way, and no thinks cannot hesitate at granting one, who has deserved well of you this slight favor."

"You are right," the general said. "I cannot refuse you, even if any one who shadows you or the little girls belong to the class of suspects, of which mind I or you know nothing, though I may have my suspicions since those duplicates have not been captured or discovered. I have not forgotten you know that you asked once to go with them through the southern river into my ward. I am a very busy man, and I know there may be some danger in the other direction too. Did I know it, for that I ask, not even the obligation I am under to you would do for you what you ask, for so doing, I would only be ungrateful by sending you and they off into hopeless peril. Now how shall we do it. You wanting it written must dictate it yourself," he said taking up a pen; and James dictated it. 2

"I here by recommend James Aronburg, guardian of Vivian, a girl princess, a girl, who has been acting as confidential secretary to all public authorities, together with the Vivian girl princesses, and their household keepers and the child scout troops who are to follow them."

To this the general signed his name, and rank, and handed the paper to James who put it in an envelope.

"How long will you be before you return?" he asked. "I cannot exactly say," James replied. "As after I have seen them to their destination, I may stop with them for a few weeks probably in my own home in Pandora until I can locate their parents and brothers."

The general nodded and held out his hand. "I shall be glad to have you with me again, for I have conceived a strong friendship for you, and think none more the worse of you for doing all you could to those dear good little princesses."

James went into the kitchen, where the general's wife was preparing the next meal, and said good bye to her and the children. She had taken a fancy to the general's young secret army and had the children, and expressed the hope that his absence would be but a short one, and that he could get safely home with the princesses, telling him that the general had said only the day before how much work he had saved him, and that he was determined to push the effort against the enemy to the utmost.

Having, thus paved the way for an appeal to the General, should he find himself in difficulties on the road. James proceeded to Gertrude Angelina's tent and waited there until it was time to go and meet Mrs. Jerry and the little girls. Walter in the meantime did not wake up until the afternoon. The Doctor had called as usual, but had not roused him. He had been told what had taken place and had held out hope to Jennie and Violet that Walter's improvement would be permanent and that traveling would do him more good in the covered wagon than harm, and that he would now make steady progress toward recovery. At the appointed hour James was at his post to meet the party. They soon came along but within a few minutes of the time named or planned upon, but instead of stopping to greet him they continued straight on, Jennie who being in the rear saying to him as she passed;

"Two men are following us."

James at once drew back and allowed them to go about fifty yards or so onward, before he moved after them. As there were many soldiers about it was some time before he could verify the suspicions of Jennie, then he noticed that two men dressed like civilians but hatless, who were stealthily talking a few yards ahead of him, followed each turning that the old lady and the princesses took. At first he thought these men were only shadowing them for their own good, but suddenly he remembered that their faces were evil indeed for he had got a good glimpse of them. He felt like yelling to the soldiers to apprehend them but the soldiers were too far apart to come up in time and the two would make good their escape, so James continued onward and waited until he had the chance, and then quickened his pace until he was close behind the first man who was a little in the rear of the second. Then he drew one of his pistols and springing forward struck him a heavy blow on the head with the butt. He fell forward on his face without a cry, and James satisfied that he had stunned him ran on to deal a blow at the other man. The other man was more watchful for danger however and turned with a long gleaming knife and made for James with it uplifted in the air. Some of the nearest soldiers yelled;

"Look out boy" but James was unobtrusive for watchfulness, he dodged the blow from the knife and aiming his pistol shot the man through the breast.

James then told why he had done this and one of the soldiers said;

"Well son, run on and join them before they leave you out of sight. Good thing you stopped these culprits."

Running down the first street he soon overtook the others, and assured them that they were safe from being shadowed by those two.

"We had noticed two men loitering against the tent opposite all afternoon," Jennie said, "and came to the conclusion that they must be watching us, so we looked out for them when we came out, and noticed that as soon as we went on they began to walk that way too. So I told Mrs. Jerry to walk straight on, without stopping when we came up to you, and that I would hang in the rear and warn you I was sure you would manage some how to get rid of them."

"James laughed."

"I fancy if they ever re-cover they will spend months in bed in a base hospital instead of log longing about. If they will live perhaps it will teach them to mind their own business, in fugitive future and leave little girls alone. I am very glad they did follow you little girls, for I felt that I owed these precious spies something and was sorry to leave the Christian camps without paying my debt. Now I think we are pretty well squared on the head with my pistol butt good and hard putting him to sleep, and the other attacked me and I shot him in the breast. So I think if they do re-cover they'll face a firing squad any way."

Indeed the meeting between Violet, and her sisters and Gertrude Angelina was indeed (you are in need) a happy one. He greeted them as if they were his dearest sisters. Instead of a first cousin, and for a time as she hugged each one in turn a scarce word was spoken, then as they stood together she had a long look at them.

"You are changed Angelina dear," Violet said, "You look pale."

"Yes, but you dear little girls look too, softer and prettier than you used to."

"And all our good airs and holy graces have increased too," Jennie said with a slight smile. "We have learned so much Gertrude dear, and as you know have been of ten when noble and holy blood has been violently the reverse of a good recommendation. You are charged too Gertrude, the six months of hard work you did for us have altered you. You look more like the wild girl the enemy call you."

"We have suffered too and yet think all the time of the suffering of our people," Violet said as tears came to her eyes at the thought of the changes, and losses of the last few months. "We have thought of you night and day, but Mrs. Jerry has been good to us, very good, and as for James we owe every thing for and to him. He had always been so hopeful and strong and has cheered us up with promises that he would bring us to Pandora soon."

"You are right Jennie dear. Though I had come to like him after he came to be your assistant, I used to smile a little and laugh too, you know at your belief in your little hero and little thought that the time would come when, should I trust him as I do now. You little girls have a right to be proud of him indeed Jennie dear. That thought, and devotion and courage he has shown for you little girls, and do you know he saved Walter Starving too though I'll bet he never told you about it only telling you he was wounded. Jacques who had seen it told me all about it, how Walter went out scouting with James, and how the party ran into heavy shell fire, six were killed, and Walter was wounded, and how James under fire brought him safely back, and then Jack Jacques came and helped him bring Walter here. Oh my dear how much we owe him. And now Daisy and Hettie" she said turning to the youngest of the little girls, "must have a good look at you little girls, and you look so well. Mrs. Jerry surely must have been feeding you up. Oh Mrs. Jerry how much we all owe to you too. And I hear you are going to leave your comfortable home, and take care of the girls on their journey. While we go forth to see to it they do not come to no harm. I'm sure my troop is big enough and well equipped to be guardian angels on ourselves. It was such a comfort to me when James told me."

"I could not let them go alone General Gertrude," the old woman said simply, "it was only my duty and love to them since the first day they took me in as a house keeper. Besides what should I do here in this army when the little girls are in Pandora?"

"How my dear little angel cousins take your things off," Angelina Aronburg said. "I will myself run in and see how Victor or Walter is getting on for they brought him into my tent. James went straight to him and I want to know whether Walter recognizes him."

James was indeed very happy indeed and more than pleased to see a look of recognition on Walter's face as he came up to the side of his couch.

"Well Walter," he said cheerfully. "I am glad to see you looking more like your self again."

Walter nodded assent and his hand feebly returned the pressure of that from James.

"I cannot understand it," he said after a pause. "I seem to be in a long dream, but it is true that Violet and her sisters are here. Isn't it, Gram, seeing things, and it is these angels in disguises?"

"Oh yes, they are here indeed but look like angels sure now. They are chatting now with Angelina Aronburg."

"And why am I here?" Walter asked looking around the interior of the tent. "Violet, and her sisters tell me not to ask questions right now."

"So there will be plenty of time for that afterwards when we are some distance on our journey. Walter it is all simple enough. You were out scouting, I was with you, we encountered shell fire and you got hurt, so I and the survivors got you back to camp under fire and you were first cared for in the base hospital. You have been very ill, but you are getting on better now. Violet and her sister during the journey will take turns at nursing you, and they won't leave you until they are quite well. Now, think that is enough for you, and the doctor would be angry if he knew, had told you so much, because he said for your own good you were not to bother yourself about things at all, but just to sleep as much as you can, and eat as much as you can, and listen to any one of the princesses talking and reading to you and not trouble your brain in any way, because its your brain that has gone wrong from the shock of your wounds and the noise of the explosions, and any thinking now will be very bad for it."

This explanation seemed satisfactory for Walter who soon after dozed off to sleep and James joined the party in Gertrude's tent sitting room.

"Oh if only we could all still stay here James what a comfort it would be to us all!"

"I know that it would Angelina, but it is too dangerous."

"But those duplicate spies were denounced."

"That don't mean they're captured though I fatally wounded one in your tent."

"Yes, but it would be a dangerous trip or risk to travel through the Christian sections for I tremble at the thought of the journey for them even if we are with them," said Gertrude, even though there is risk enough in bringing even Walter along. It is more dangerous within other sections of the Christian lines outside of this for the search for suspects does not relax indeed it seems to become more keen every day, and therefore I would suggest princesses not to disguise any where within Christian territory until you pass out. Going northward to Pandora is no peril whatever as it is all Christian. All the way now, no foe in sight, but if you go in disguise and are arrested by strange Christian soldiers where generals and officers are all strangers you sure will meet you - dantha and they couldn't be blamed for their mistake 368 if you went on in disguise. Keep off the disguise until you are sure you will have to pass enemy territory. And too Walter's extreme illness is the best safe guard you have. Put to go through any christian territory in disguise even with my troop with you would be very risky and where ever you go you would have a Commissionary of the Abbeinnian spy persecuting Commune at you in no time to make rigid inquiries, and even they would not respect papers from any one if you are in disguise. Let me and my troops scout ahead where ever we go with you and then if I am sure we have to go past a foe encampment then done disguises. For I know from telegraphic inquiries it is christian all the way to Pandora. Emperor, Liviana army has come up without you knowing it, but it is so extensive that he took up his headquarters at Pandora. Cousins go as you are until I warn you and you'll have a safe interesting journey only. In disguise you'll only be arrested in spite of us."

"I have every hope that we shall get through safely," James said. "I have some good news I have not yet told you. I have received a paper from General Nemo stating that I have been his highest secretary, and recommending us to all Christian authorities so that we can dispense with the ordinary papers which they would otherwise ask for."

"That is no good news at all if you go through christian territory in disguise none at all indeed," Angelina Aronburg said. "What will relieve me of all my anxiety is that they should go as they are for Heavenly days the little girls are so beautiful now and so strangely transfigured that I'm almost scared of them, and therefore they sure can get through any where even without papers for what soldier has not seen a picture of them in papers. But to go in disguise is extremely dangerous, and I let you know from your recent experiences and what General Nemo warned me not to do in disguise within the christian lines. Territory is also christian lines. Once on the river shore it will be very easy to get a passage across the wide river to Pandora."

"James is sure wonderful," said Angelina, "and he has surprised me more every day and even when Penrod first told me that he had accepted his noble offer to look after us I was inclined in my heart knowing he's an American to believe there was ample protection, but my heavens he's like an guardian angel himself far beyond our expectations. You see I confess James, that we sure now know what American means are though we heard a lot from Penrod Penrod."

"There is nothing to confess about," James said with a smile. "It was perfectly natural for you to think that a lad of ten could defend you in time of trouble and danger, but probably your possession angels had a lot to do with it too, and that it was probably through them too that I had the lucky stroke of saving General Nemo's life, which enabled me to be of use to you more than ever, and that now I have a pass which will enable me to take you and your sisters and any one else with comparative safety through the christian lines and territory as far as Pandora. Had it not been for that I could not have done little even to aid you so rigid is the search for suspects. But it is a good thing, and it is done just for your sakes for there is no telling where spies are looking for chances to harm my little girls. Gertrude is right. As long as we are within christian territory we must not disguise, and if those who follow us come after to do harm they'll only be in hot water for any one not in christian uniform and not giving proof of their identification is sure out of luck."

Christian territory is too extensive to escape from. General Nemo himself said so so I was prepared for it. He called me back last night and told me so and said the papers were not hardly necessary if I didn't go in disguise. "You are too modest James," said Violet. "I suppose after a while and she giggled you'll be saying it was we who saved you. You are just like all persons who do things for us. Brave and bold, and risk anything, but when it comes to being praised you run away like a sheep. Besides was it not your quickness that saved Walter?"

"And we heard all about it from the soldiers. You arrived in time to catch my duplicate riding Gayetytute Gertrude's tent and putting him where he won't be able to track us for even you even put in the hospital those who were shadowing us. No we owe you every thing and disclaimers are only thrown away. As for me I am grateful of Jennie's superior perspicacity, for she more than us, fear trusted you absolutely from the first."

CHAPTER SEVENTEEN.

IN THE POSSESSION OF THE CHRISTIANS AND SAFETY.
DIFFICULTY IN CROSSING THE RIVER

THE RIVER EPHRAÏM OF NOY ADE.

PANDORA A.

"It has nothing to do with perspicacity," Jennie herself said. "James saved our lives twice from the dreadful Glanfeinlinian attackers and after that I knew that if there was danger, he would be able to get us out of it. That if it is if it were a possible for any one to do so."

"I hope and pray ardently that I shall be able to justify your ardent trust in Jennie, and arrive safely with you at my father's house. I can also promise you the warmest of welcomes from my mother and sisters. I fear they must long since given me up for dead or lost, and indeed I shall be like a ship wrecked marine who has been cast upon an island and given up for lost. But indeed my father always used to say that if I was a first rate hand in getting into scrapes, I was more than a qually good in getting out of them again, and I do not believe they have quite well have despaired of seeing me again, especially as they know by the last letters I sent them that you all said, could speak Abbeinnian well enough to pass anywhere as a native, and could pose as a glanfeinlinian boy scout very well in case of necessity."

"Indeed how surprised they will be at you arriving with seven princesses and a famous glanfeinlinian leader and Mrs. Jerry," Daisy herself said.

"They will be pleased and feel honored than surprised," James replied. "I have written so much about you little princesses in my letters that my sisters who are about the age of you Jennie and one too the age or size of Gertrude, and my mother will be delighted to see you."

"Besides," Jennie said, "added Penrod may have written them you are waiting behind with us so they will not need be so surprised as they otherwise would have been, but it will be funny arriving among people living in our country who don't speak a word of our language."

"Yes, they do," said James. "They learned it and father knows it better than I do and so do my sisters. Nevertheless you will be soon at home with them. Jenny and Mildred and Kate are just about the ages of Jennie, and Angelina and Gertrude are just about the ages of you Jennie and one too the age or size of Gertrude. It is nearly two weeks now since I left them and it seems nearly like Gertrude's years, and I have to look at you Jennie, to assure myself that Jenny will have grown almost like you. Now I shall go out for a bit, and leave you to chat together. You need not fidget about Walter's girls. The nurse is witty with him, and will come and let you know if he awakens, but I hope that he has gone off fairly to sleep for the night. He knew me, and knew me well and I think I have put his mind at rest a little as how he came here. I have told him it was through him being wounded and that we brought him first into the hospital and then here and has since been too ill to be moved. And now since he is all right he may accompany us in the covered wagon. I don't think he will ask more questions though, do believe he still doubts princesses whether you're 3 you really are the little vivian girls or the angels in disguise. You have changed so and look so transfigured especially in your unusually elegant white and beautifully designed clothing that he could not hardly tell the difference. Therefore while we go traveling if you were you keep on the same clothing it will be less puzzling to him, and also more safe as the search of suspects is all the more strict and it is done for you, so don't give the soldiers extra trouble for nothing by taking you by mistake."

The little party started the next day at break of light, the army of child scouts to follow some distance in the rear, and they thought after they left Pandora where they would come to an open country where there would be no sentry posts, but it was not so. When they entered what was a new section of the army and under a general not known they found how strict was the watch upon persons leaving General Nemo's part of the camp, but they found out they had no reasons to congratulate themselves upon the possession of General Nemo's safe conduct for the beauty of Violet and her sisters and the oncoming column of child scouts respectfully conducted within and allowed to pass while they were only very respectfully conducted within and allowed to pass while the soldiers stood in ranks on both sides of the company streets while the long squadron of child scouts passed by. At the next village they could not tell why Violet had an instinct an instinct of fear that they were secretly followed. No sooner had they sat down in the village restaurant to to breakfast, when some distance on four persons in civilian clothes waited themselves not far away and Violet whispered to Jennie "there they are" and then got the surprise of their lives, though a delighted one. An officer with a red scarf presented himself before the four men and asked if they were and where they were going, meanwhile looking strangely toward Violet and her sisters. They however said that they were refugees just going from Manceo army to this, and made some other explanations and even produced some document, but that did not seem to satisfy, and the official called to some tall men standing out side the door, and then as they came in told them to take the men off and then with sudden strides approached the party of girls and the boy and the woman, and looked at them sharply.

"You are the Vivian Girl Princesses the darling of the nation."

Violet nodded.

"Ah, I thought so. Know those men over there?" with a jerk of his head. "No sir we do not. We felt though we were secretly followed." said Jennie.

"Huh. Huh. I thought so. That is all I wanted to know. Take them away for investigation," he said louder to the two fellows. "See where they got the identification papers. I believe they had them forged. They were no doubt spies following these little girls here."

He looked at the boy and said, "Let me see your papers boy. I want to know who you are for your own good."

James showed the paper and the man without reading it only wrote something else on the back, and handed the paper back to the boy, addressing the boy who had the honor of being General Manceo's secretary in tones of the greatest respect.

"General Manceo wired me about you," said the official and "and therefore, was on the look out for you and the girls. I saw those men following you from some distance and entered here, so I came in. Better keep your keeps more to the back than front. By writing on the back have given you no commission to shoot down like a dog any one who follows you suspiciously no matter what they wear."

With the bundles on their back, they rode along the road sometimes and trudged by themselves at other times, and stopped for the night at a village about twelve miles out of General Manceo's camp. The whole village was full of Christian soldiers, but here as all soldiers by one glimpse knew the princesses there was no necessity to show any documents, and as also the child scouts' encampment encamped near the town all was more easily accepted. They met no adventure whatever on the journey toward the great Mico-Holocaust Run River to the small town of Love-Frey on its shores, this journey being performed in two days, no matter where they had went, no matter whether they went across fields, down roads and so forth outside of towns, it was camps, camps, camps and Christian positions so that it proved their journey instead of a danger was a walk.

All soldiers and officers were strangers of course, but the little girls were never questioned nor where any papers asked for the soldiers knew them at a glance, and Violet and her sisters and even James received more respect than he expected. The weather added by the heat of the far distant forest fire still burning, and the hot May sun was very hot so warm that Violet and her sisters who liked and could stand plenty of cold felt the heat severely, although it was well on in March it was too hot for even that season, the little girls were as thinly dressed as modesty would allow, and the wagon was uncovered so that they sometimes riding in it with Walter could get a little comfort though the covers were on at day to keep out the hot sun.

James walked for most part of the time by the side of the horses head, for it was so warm they could only proceed at a foot pace, but he sometimes climbed up and took the reins, the better to chat with the little girls and keep up their spirits. There was no occasion for this in any of them however, though often they longed so for their parents and Penrod, and also had a loneliness for God and His blessed Mother that they often gave way and cried bitterly, and the good old housekeeper often suffered greatly from the heat. Thunder storms sometimes came up too with the loudest barking thunder ever imagined, and as Violet and her sisters liked thunder storms their interest in them some times made them forget their loneliness for a time.

James some times did not like the nature of the thunder storms for any where in America he had never in his life heard such loud thunder and he had plenty experience in loud thunder storms there, and he feared and believed the elements were protesting something in behalf of the little girls. And when they cried a little one night, in their loneliness for Penrod and their parents a thunder storm soon came up that broke all records in the wilderness of the hills and wind, and the thunder was so loud it could roar and bang and crash in its most deafening salvos. The rain was like a cloud burst and the storm failed to even slack up when morning came so that on the last trip they were to go forth in the dreary pouring rain weather. On arriving at Love-Frey in the pouring rain, James proceeded first to the Mayor and on producing General Manceo's document, received a permit to lodge in the town until at least the elements would get a little better. He then looked for apartments in the neighborhood of the river, (all the child scouts also occupying places where ever they could) and when he had obtained them disposed of the horses and wagon and had Walter brought within. This was as far as he intended to go for a while across the river he could see other encampments with Christian flags flying, and also some distance north the smoke stacks of the cut skiers or live front of Pandora. The statement that he was not only General Manceo's first secret spy, but also the boy guardian of the Vivian Girl Princesses at once secured him much attention from the military authorities and he was invited to become a member of the Guild of the Fatherly Committee during his stay in the town in order that he might see for himself with what zeal the instructions received from General Manceo's army now so far off for the capture of all secret spies were being carried out. This offer he accepted as it would enable him to obtain information of all that was going on, and also whether they were safe from secret spies or not. His feelings had been daily harrowed by the danger to his little friends had been in, and may be in yet, which so far he had been able to prevent. He found that horrible as he would have been the atrocities against the little girls attempted to be committed by spies against the little girls in General Manceo's army, they would be surpassed by those in the Christian provinces if there was not a good look out, and that in Love-Frey, a band of assassins under Garrier had been captured who had been shadowing the little girls.

James next object was to make the acquaintance of some of the soldiers along the river wharfs, and to find out what vessels were engaged to go across the side river to the other shore, for it was in some of these alone that he could hope to cross the river for bridges many miles long were all down and pontoon bridges had not been made in this location. As he tried this he found that many secret Glandelinian spies knew him. The terror among all the wicked spies was universal, and though they so far knew Violet and her sisters were in the town they were afraid to do a thing to them yet. The news of the execution too of wicked old Augustinia St. Clair was just because of his treatment to Jennie Vivian heightened the dismay. "Go called Massacres" of wicked spies were going on throughout the whole Christian army from Depositionville to Pandora. The lowest of the ruffians captured in all towns and who had expected to wear the hat that red upon the little girls' heads faced a death penalty in various ways. None were too high or too low in rank when once denounced as assassins in spies, and denunciation was followed by a short court martial trial and execution. There were news theless Glandelinian spies everywhere men were cleaving blood money for their attempt to assassinate the Vivian girls if possible.

Thus then James efforts to make acquaintance among the soldiers brought him dreadful fears and suspicions from his experiences here and therefore was a forlorn boy scout and that was sufficient to cause distrust among spies who knew him, and as long it had come become whispered that he had come from Angelina Agathia with special authority to hasten on the work of extermination of the enemies of the Vivian girls. Soon therefore James perceived that as he moved a long one of the big quay a little group of men dressed as rivermen and fishermen talking together broke up at his approach, the men sauntering off to the boats, and any he accosted replied civilly indeed, but with such embarrassment and restraint that James was suspicious, and although any questions of a general character were answered, a purposely profound ignorance was shown upon the subject upon which he wished to gain information. The rivermen all seemed to know that occasionally cargoes of something on long lines of flat boats were run across the river to Pandora but none could name any vessel engaged in the trade that would take him across with the little girls, though to take him alone which they wished most ardently to do made him down hearted and very suspicious. That early evening one of the rivermen said to him quietly:

"Boy I am a good man, and I warn you you had best not come down the river after dark, for there is a number of secret enemies conspiring against you and unless you would like your body to be lashed out of the river with a half dozen bullet holes in it you will take my advice. They'll give you anything to get you out of the way so they can get at the princesses. You are their hindrance. Watch out."

James began to feel a least a rush under his responsibilities. His attendance too at the Military Council Committee tried him greatly. He made a progress whatever in his efforts to obtain a passage across the river and to at least trouble the old nurse, who had been much exhausted by the change from her usual habits, and the inclemency of the weather on her journey, so much heat and so much rain, just end of gaining strength seemed to be rapidly losing it and was forced to take to her bed. The terrible danger which in the Christian lines, and the long strain of anxiety as to the safety of the little girls and the almost sad fate of Violet when she was arrested by mistake had completely exhausted her strength, and the last two weeks had aged her as if she was six years older. Jenni, Vivian too was ill from her experiences and loneliness and James tried hard to keep up his appearances of hopefulness, and to cheer the little girls, but all of the little girls had pretty quick eyes and could also read minds and they speedily perceived the change in him.

"You are wearing yourself out James," Violet said the next morning as they were sitting by the fire, while Angelina was tending Mrs. Jerry in the next room. "can see it in your face and so can my sisters. They have been talking about it and are worried about you. It's no use of your trying to hide it from us. You tell us every day that you hope soon to get hold of the captain of a boat sailing for Pando-ra; but I know from your thoughts that you in reality are making no progress. We don't even dare to take chances as you cannot tell who among the divers are spies and who are not. During those two days when you were hoping to get me out of prison when I was made a prisoner by mistake--though it at first seemed next to impossible until my sisters proved my identity--you told my sisters not to despair as they said to me; and I knew you did not despair of yourself and found out where I was, held, and got me out, but now it is different. I am sure that you do in your heart almost give up hope because so many of the men avoid you and threaten you. Why don't you trust me to do something James. I may not be able to do much, but I might try to cheer you. You do you much for us, why should not one of us try to do our part too and not leave it all to you. You have been comforting us all the time. Surely it is time for any one of my dear sisters too to take our turn to do something to help you and ourselves. It is not right for us to leave you do it all. I am not a two year old now."

"I feel like one just at present," James said steadily with quivering lips. "I feel sometimes as if--as if we so we used to say at school in America--I could cry over spilled milk. I know Violet, I can't trust you and any one of your good little sisters and it isn't because I doubted your courage that I have not told you exactly how things are going on, but because it is entirely upon you now that Mrs. Jerry and Angelina have to depend, and I do not wish to put any more weight upon your shoulders but it will be a relief to tell for me to tell you exactly how we stand."

James then told her how completely he had suspected many of the rivermen with being Glandelinian spies in disguise and how an actual feeling of hostility against him had arisen.

"I think I could have stood that Violet, but it is the terrible news that comes from the Committee that tries me. And it is so awful to hear in the committee what things have been found in possession of spies that were captured, with what they intended to use on you if they had a chance, those friends, and exulting over your desertion and desertion if it could be accomplished, so that at times I feel tempted to throw myself upon one of those sniveling spies and strangle them. The main thing I fear is that even if we slipped across the river into Pando-ra in the darkest night, spies would follow us into Pando-ra."

"It must be dreadful James," Violet said soothingly. "Will it be possible for you to give out that you are ill and so absent yourself for a time from their meetings and do something here. I am sure you look ill--ill enough for anything, and poor Jennie is worse to day and has us worried. As to the rivermen do not let that worry you no more go near them. Even if you could hear of a ship at present it would be of no use. We couldn't leave Mrs. Jerry and poor Walter either; she seems to us to be getting worse and worse, and the doctor you called in not long ago thinks so too. I can see it by his face. I think he is a good man. The refugee woman whose sick child I sat up with last night tells me every Christian soldier and refugee loves him. He at first looked at us as if he was seeing things. I believe he thought we were little angels too. He said this morning to me, and think she is our girl and mother. "I cannot do much for your poor mother. It is a general breakdown. I have many cases like it of old people who were refugees from the enemy and women upon whom the anxiety of these terrible war times have told. Do not worry yourselves with watching prisoners. He will sleep quietly and will not need attendance. If you don't be careful I will a lot when you little girls are on my hands, and your sister Jennie is pretty sick. A anxiety affects the young as well as the old just as fatally. I want you see, we cannot think of leaving her at present. Since we took her into our house keeper Mrs. Jerry has risked every thing for us. It is quite impossible for us to leave her now, so do not let that worry you, and we have tried by wireless to get into communication with Father and Penrod so that maybe they'll come here but go no word of their whereabouts yet. We all are in the hands of our Blessed God, James, and we must wait patiently what He may send us. And surely if we really are angels possessed why should we fear those spies. They are risking their lives only to get at us and making fools of themselves."

"We will wait patiently James said. "I feel better now Violet, and you shall not need me live we again. What has been worrying me most is the thought that it would have been wiser to have carried out some other plan--to have stayed with you and your sisters in some isolated farmhouse not far from the Christian camp, and for us to have waited there until the storm blew over."

"You must never now think that," James Catherine herself said earnestly. "You know we all talked it over a dozen and dozen of times Mrs. Jerry and all of us, and we agreed that this was our best chance, and Angelina A. Renburg thought so too. And think too we have no enemy camps to fear in fact superior Vivian's army is just across the river. We do not fear those spies trying to get us now, and as you said you overheard that because of the person persecutions of them they would only be glad to get away from the camp, and won't dare come near our headquarters because they are secretly afraid of you. Go whatever comes you must not blame yourself in the slightest. However we were a nice we left home we were in danger than that. Historians hardly won't believe, and might have been assassinated, but they can't get at us."

"I arranged it all," Catherine. "I have the responsibility of your being here and your sisters too."

"Yes that may be true but to an equal extent you would have had the responsibility of our being anywhere else. It is of no use letting that trouble you. Now as to the rivermen I have made the acquaintance of some of the refugee women in our company street. Some of them are the wives of some rivermen and possibly through them I may be able to hear about ships. At any rate I could try. They are not Glandelinian spies."

"Perhaps you could Catherine; but be very careful what questions you put, and to whom too; or you might be betrayed."

"I don't think there is much fear of that James. Too the women are more outspoken than the men. They are refugees not Glandelinians, and because of the war river trade has been almost stopped and there is great suffering among the many rivermen and their families. Of course I and my sister have been very careful whom we speak to outside, but from the efforts of our parents we have learned to be good little cooks--and what is left over of what we cook and can't eat and which is very good--I take to those who are refugees, especially if they have little children ill, and I know we have won their hearts."

"You are really win every one's hearts who comes near your little girls Catherine dear and I know it," James said earnestly.

Then the faces of the little girls (if not girls) flushed a rosy red, but Catherine said with a laugh;

"How James you are turning flatterer. We are not in heaven yet my dear friend, so your pretty speeches though we may deserve it are quite thrown away, and we therefore do not say so our selves. We have lots of enemies who care not what we are or what we do or how we look, and no more now, shall we and take Angelina's place and send her in to you."

And so another day went by, and then the old nurse to the surprise of the doctor showed symptoms of being much better, and Jennie was herself again. Steadily too one of the little girls one by one had been steadily carrying on their work among the unfortunate refugees who had been rendered poor by losing their all at the hands of the foe, sitting up at night with sick children, and supplying food to hungry little ones, saying quietly in reply to the words of gratitude of the women;

"It is nothing. Our friend James takes care of us, and despite the war we can always find something. We are always glad to help those who need it. While any one of them so asked they kept their hearts open, and from the talk of the women learned that the rivermen spies had almost all been apprehended as they had no papers to prove their identifications, and that too the husbands of one or two of them women were employed in vessels engaged in carrying certain stores and provisions from Pando-ra to the army on the other side. So on the morning one of these women whose child Jennie herself had saved from a mad dog by shooting the insane animal down with her pistol, and whom she had also brought round out of an illness by keeping the little girl well supplied with good food exclaimed;

"Oh how much we owe you Princess angel, for your goodness."

"We are not so high hatted that you need call me Princess" laughed Jennie. "Just call me plain Jennie. It is just as good."

"It comes so natural," the woman said with a sigh. "I was in service once in a rich family before I married Francis Aldophine. I know that you and your sisters are princesses princesses because there are no little girls like you in existence and I so often saw you kneel down by Angelina's bed when you thought I was asleep. I expect Aldophine home in a day or two. The poor fellow will be wild with delight when he sees the little one on its feet again. When he sent away a fortnight ago he did not expect ever to see her alive again, and it almost broke his heart, but what was he to do? There are so many men out of work that if he had not sailed in the boat there would have been no one to take his place."

and he might not perhaps have been taken on again."

"He has been to Pandora, has he not?" Jennie asked.

"Yes, the boat carries provisions and brandy for the soldiery. It is a dangerous trade for that as sections of the river are watched closely by the gunners of Glandelinian rivershore batteries just a little yonder up what in he to do---on one must live."

"Does your husband know any of the Glandelinian spies?"

"No more than I do, and if he does he would let it out now or then, but of the river workers hate these murdering spies and enemies of yours, but what can we do when we can't detect them?"

"Well Mrs Martha, I am sure I and my sisters can trust you, and your husband can help if he will me and my sisters and the boy guardian with me."

"Surely you can trust me," the woman said. "I would lay down my life for you little princesses and I know Aldolph would do so too when he knows what you have done for us."

"Well then Mrs Martha, I and my sisters through the hoped for help of our friend James are anxious to be taken over to Pandora where our Father and brothers are. We are ready to pay well for a passage, but we have not known how to set about it."

"I thought it might be that," Mrs Martha said quietly. "For any one who knows the ways of these rivermen as I do could see with half an eye that you are the little Vivian Girl Princesses even without you needing to produce any papers. But they say that your friend is a friend and Secretary of General Nemo, and that is one of the committee here. He probably could get a pass and a paper of commission compelling some one to take you across the river."

"That is not the point Martha. There are so many Glandelinian spies that seem to know him that he believes they may follow us across the stream, and he dare not let any one know he wishes to make a passage, so I thought I would speak to you and you can tell me when a boat is sailing, and who is her captain."

"Aldolph will manage that all for you now or then," the woman said. "I know that many a poor soul had gone across the stream, but of course it is a risk, for it is death to be caught in a cross fire of the Glandelinian shore batteries. Still the rivermen are ready to run the risk, and indeed they have not much fear of the consequences if they do get caught under fire, for the river crew population here is every strong, and they would not stand quietly by and see some of their own class injured by any old enemy shall fire while in civilian clothes as if they had done some crime more because they were carrying some refugees across to Pandora among other Christian possessed city, why they have done it from father to son as far as they can collect for there has never been a time yet when there were not people who wanted to pass from love free to Pandora, and from Pandora to love free whether the enemy liked it or not. I think it can be managed Jennie, especially as you say you can afford to pay, but we would rather do the deed for your little princesses for nothing. Trade is bad because of the war that there are hundreds of men would start in their boats fishing or otherwise for a voyage across the river in the hope of getting food for their wives and children and not depend on the treacherous charity of the generous suffering army all the time..."

"I was sure it was so, Martha, but it was so difficult to set about it. We are so afraid of Glandelinian spies overtaking us there too and it needs some one to warrant that we are not trying to draw innocent ones into a snare before any one will listen. If your husband will but take the matter up I have no doubts that it can be easily managed."

"Get your mind at ease, the thing is as good as done. I tell you there are hundreds of men ready to undertake the job, when they know it is a straight forward one..."

"That is good news indeed, Jennie," James said. "When the brave little girl told him of the converse conversation. That does seem a way out of our difficulties indeed. I felt sure you would be able to manage it, some time later, among the good people you have been so good to hurry it on as much as you can Jennie. I feel that our position is getting more and more dangerous. The Committee I serve is wrong some where and I believe it too far off to say sure where I have steadily heard on the wildest firing ever imagined and it never stopped yet. In here we don't hear it but it is and sounds down the river. They say Pandora is under fire and Glandelinian army is fiercely attacked. I am afraid I don't play my part sufficiently well to get through any where. The enemy they say is edging forward every where in their violent assaults. I fear that some have suspicions that again we are in unseen dangers. I have been asked questions lately, as to whether I have seen any strangers ever following me or watching you or not. I have been thinking for the last few days whether it would not be better for us to make our own way to the shore of the river some dark night capture some boat and get across without any one seeing us, or if that could not be managed to get on board some little fishing boat at night and sail off by ourselves in the hopes of getting to Pandora."

"No that couldn't be," said Violet herself. "That is something so dangerous I and my sisters would not take a chance. But how do you know this is true?" "Why even in the Committee there is a disguised spy. I have been feeling for some days that danger has been thickening around us. Despite the vigilance of the search for suspects they can't capture them all, there are so many. And many of those spies are dangerous to try it with too who will kill to the last just shot before allowing themselves to be captured and then use the last shot on themselves. I had noticed angry glances cast at me by some of the committee whose faces I don't like and had caught sentences expressing doubt whether I was James or some body else. They too with the committee do not play their part sufficiently well and am not forward enough in their violent councils against your enemies and are under suspicion but they keep their eyes open so that the suspicion cannot be confirmed. By one committee man whose face and manner I do not like, I have been asked questions as to why I am staying here, and why I have come. I even heard one man say to another there; 'I tell you he may be that little guardian of the little Vivian Girl Princesses. That is what the assassin call you.' I felt I wished, had a real pet gutter-snipe and wrapped it round his neck. I bet," she said. "I believe he is one of the guardians. I tell you I shall watch him and catch him closely. I shall make it my business to get at the bottom of the affair, and we will make we short work with him first if we find things as we believe."

"But are you sure there is such a urgent danger?" asked Daisy.

"I sure feel that the danger is really urgent, even more urgent than I had expressed it and I was intending for immediate flight when you brought me your news. Now now it is hard to tell whether even a days delay might not ruin us. Why do you little girls who are so good have to suffer all this. That is not fair. I will say and stick to it."

"Have you told me all James dear?" Hattie asked.

"Not quite all princesses. I was just thinking it over. I fear that the danger is even more pressing than I have said, and even now there is no telling that fellow may be watching outside, or making inquiries about you. He will hear nothing but praise, but that very praise may cause him to doubt still more than that you are not what you seem."

"But why can we not run away at once," Angelina said. "Why should we wait here until the spies come and try to do us harm probably to bomb us or kill us some way."

"That is what I was thinking when I came home Angelina, but the risk of trying to escape in a fishing boat by ourselves would be tremendous. You see although I have gone out sailing sometimes on this river, I know very little about it, and although we might get across to Pandora it would be much more likely that we should fall into the hands of one of the Glandelinian river gun boats. So I look upon that as a desperate step, to be taken only at the last moment. And now that Jennie seems to have arranged a safe plan, I do not like trying such a wild scheme. A week now and perhaps all might be arranged; but the question is, have we a week? Have we more than twenty-four hours? What do you think Jennie?"

"I do not see what is best to do yet," Jennie said looking steadily at a picture of the Sacred Heart. "It is a terrible thing to have to decide; but we must decide." She sat for five minutes without speaking, and then taking down her purple cloak from the peg on which it hung she said:

"I will go round to Mrs Martha again and tell her we are all so anxious for each other that I don't think we can judge what is really the best. Martha will see things more clearly and will be able to advise us."

"Yes that will be the best plan, but for heaven's sake Jennie don't let any one try to follow you. Call for help if any one does."

"I'll watch out," said Jennie.

"It was an hour and three quarters before she returned.

"It was an hour and three quarters before she returned. It was a look of bright news and hope on Jennie's face.

"Yes I have a plan and a good one, that is to say Mrs Martha has. I told her all about it, and she said directly that we must be hidden some where, till her husband can arrange for us to sail. I said of course, that was what was wanted, but how could it be managed? Those spies are everywhere and crafty. So she thought it over, and we have quite arranged it. He has a sister who has a place near the river, four miles down. She will go over there to her room and arrange with them to take us, and planned that she would get some fisher girls dresses for us but I told her it was too dangerous to go in disguise for it was more hopeless to be captured by the Christians than by the enemy if we were mistaken for suspects."

in our dinghies, and it may be possible the crew are resting; we would not believe our puppets and think we stole them. He said we have no doubt that her sister will take us for she was over there yesterday and heard about the child getting better and Martha told her all I had done for her. She thinks we shall be quite safe there, and the Christian army is at large in numbers there too. What do you think of that James?"

"Splendid, Jennie. Can the husband be trusted too?"

"Oh yes, she says so. He is a Christian soldier in the army she says, but she says she would not propose it until she was quite sure they could do it for if anything happened to us, she would be a wretched woman all her life."

"Thank God," James said fervently. "That one sees daylight at last. I have felt so helpless lately. Dangers seem to be thickening round you, and I could do nothing, and now Jennie you have found a way out for us, where I never should have found one myself."

"It is Our dear Blessed Lord who has done it for me," Jennie said reverently. "I only sisters did not begin to go among the poor refugees with any thought of making friends, but because they were so poor and miserable, but He must have put it into my mind and heart to do it, in order that a way of escape might be made for us."

The next morning James went out as usual immediately after breakfast for a walk of two or three hours. This he did partly to allow the little girls to tidy up the rooms and an office which had naturally fallen to them since the commencement of their housekeeper's illness, partly because in active exercise he found some relief from the burden of his anxieties. He kept his eyes open too so that he was not cautiously followed by any enemies. The day too he felt more anxious than ever. What was one of the causes was that the sound of firing had become unusually extensive and loud, all soldiers seemed in readiness, and the air was heavy with darkness. The conversation with Mrs. Martha had afforded good grounds of hope that in a day or two a fair prospect for a chance to get to Pandora would be open to them, but this seemed to make the present anxiety all the sharper. The woman had promised to make the arrangements with her friends in the refugee camp below during the course of the day, and by night if all went well they might start. He told himself that he had no reason for supposing that the vague suspicions which were he knew about would suddenly be converted into action by the spies. He determined to take his place that afternoon with the committee as usual and watch the strange strangers closely and if possible to denounce them before the committee and cause their capture. He felt however that the day would be more trying than any he had passed, and that he would give a good deal of the next twenty-four hours were over. Scarcely heeding where he walked out was out longer than usual, wondering where all the firing was and why it was growing so extensive and extremely severe, and it was nearly four hours after he started before he approached the town again by the road along the riverbank. Just when he came to the first house, where there was a group of soldiers talking excitedly and pointing toward him, a woman who was standing there watching for him, came quickly up to him.

"You are the boy who takes care of the princesses are you not?"

"James ascended hurriedly, with a strange presentiment of evil."

"Mrs. Martha bids me tell you," the woman said. "That half an hour after you started this morning six men with an official with a red scarf came to the house, conversed with the princesses and sadly gave them an understanding that any hopes of reaching Pandora is out of the question for some time to come. The enemy is making a violent attack every where all along the line at this section, and has the river guarded and blockaded with their gun boats. They are waiting there for you to come to give you the same tidings. It is hopeless but you know you cannot chance it in the midst of such a raging battle. You'll all be killed. The right is fierce on the river too. Don't you hear the dreadful cannonading in the direction of Pandora?"

James staggered as if struck with a blow.

"Poor boy, you sure must love those dear little girls," the woman said with real heart felt compassion seeing the ghastly pallor of his face. "But pity you, and you should go to them as soon as possible and cheer them. They feel worse, I believe than you do when they had hopes of seeing their dear father and mother and also their brother. The soldiers are all furious that such things should happen to those dear sweet young angels who are so good to every one but what can they do. General Pichonia said the only hope is if our side wins the battle. When we get the news Mrs. Martha said to us, 'The best thing we can do for those little angels is to tell their guardian and have him go and cheer them up. Go do some of you put yourself on such a road leading to the house, and tell him in time. He generally walks beyond the town. I heard one of the princesses say so. Go some of us came out on all the roads, and two remained on each end of the street in case we should miss you. She said who ever met you was to tell you to be on this road by the river just outside the town with them after dark and she would bring you some fresh clean clothes, and take you and they where you would be safe from these unseen dangers, but till then you were to go away again, and keep far from the town. Do you understand?" she asked laying a hand on his arm for he seemed dazed and stupid with the shock he had received.

"I understand," he said in a low voice. "Thank you all for your warning. Yes I and they will be here in the evening but, doubt if I can cheer them when I feel so bad myself. I'm tempted to take part in the battle, but it is my duty by them."

So saying he turned and moved away, asking unsteadily as if he were drunk. The woman looked after him pityingly, and then shaking her head and muttering execrations against the rascals, she made her way home to tell Martha that she had fulfilled her mission.

James walked on slowly until some distance from the town, and then threw himself down on a bank by the road, and lay for a time silent and despairing. At last tears came to his relief and his broad shoulders shook with a passion of sobbing to think that just at the moment when a chance of getting over to Pandora was open—just when all the dangers seemed nearly past—a dreadful battle had to open all along the line and on the river too, preventing him and the girls from ever getting there. To think of Jennie—the bright fearless Jennie—and the other little girls fast rated in the most ardent hopes. It was maddening, and the roar of the battle upset him still more. The noise was unsparing, but after a time the passion of weeping calmed down, and James sat up suddenly.

"I am a fool," he said as he rose to his feet, "a nice sort of a boy for a protector. Lying here crying like a baby girl, when, begun to fancy I was a man, waiting my time here when I know the only hope for the girls keeping cheerful and forget their sorrow and disappointment is for me to show I'm not losing my spirits. I need not lose all hope yet. After Violet has been saved when arrested by mistake, why should I not now keep them comforted. I'm better off than I was then for we have friends who will help. These women whose hearts Violet and her sisters have won will aid all they can and may get some of their brothers and husbands to aid. The battle is not lost yet, and Violet and her sisters will know I shall move heaven and earth to get them over to Pandora."

James fit of crying unmanly as he felt it, had afforded him an immense relief for he hardly knew himself how great the strain had been upon him of late and with a more elastic step he strode away toward the town, and four or five houses walked on revolving plan after plan in his mind for whispering the little girls to Pandora. Although nothing very plausible occurred to him he felt brighter in mind though weary in body, and then when he reached the little girls felt more babyish still when he saw they did not seem to be so sad about it, but were more excited than anything else and Jennie only greeted him with:

"Oh if the Christian side wins the battle we will have a lark getting across."

"I wish we could see the battle," shot out Catherine. "It is such an exciting sight."

And I'd dare act as a flag bearer," cried Violet. "We did so before."

He told the girls the plans of the woman who told the him of their news and when just after night fall he again approached the spot where that morning he had received so heavy a blow he had the little girls with him and they were well armed. He no longer knew that should he hit upon a plan, and too the jails were so crowded with glad and glad Indian prisoners that if anything happened to the little girls the prisoners would even pay for it too. Martha was waiting for him and the little girls and the woman too who had told James of the bad news. "Ah James," she began, "but this is a terrible day. I'm thankful to God that you were able to bring your dear little friends here safely and I hope you have not been secretly followed. Oh if I had but known but a day or two earlier, we could have moved in time, and now they are cut off from Pandora because that battle. Oh they say it was terrible and is not decided yet. The enemy fought all day with savage ferocity, and made charges with such insane determination as if they were glad to throw their lives away just for the interest of it. But we will try to find some means to help them yet, and we will save them from the spies. We have been talking it over and we will all go to the tribunal, and we will take our husbands and our children with us, and we will ask for a means to get you and your little girls across safely in spite of the enemy. And we will not let them be murdered by those rascally spies, and here now are some clean clothes for your little princesses fresh white clothing like what they got on but you need not put them on now. There will be a swift boat here in a few minutes, and we will go down to the refugee camp. The men and even all the soldiers will do all they can for you. I have sent a message by a boy to my sister to say that I shall be down this evening, so they will be expecting us. Ah here is the boat."

The splash of oars started, was heard, and a boat rowed along across the river bank.

"Is that you Mr Peters?"

"It is as sure enough Mrs Martha. Is every thing all right?"

"Yes we have them all here the poor little dears."

In another minute the boat was rowed alongside, Violet and her sisters first helped into it and then James and the woman got aboard. There were few words spoken as the two men rowed vigorously downstream close to the shore and they had to do so too where there was lots of brush and where branches overhang that part of the river for enemy search lights were sweeping the stream watching out for moving christian gunboats. In some three quarters of an hour some lights were seen on the opposite bank, and the boat was headed toward them and soon reached a little cove way.

"I shall not be more than twenty minutes," Mrs Martha said as she got out followed by the princesses and James.

"All right we will wait," was the reply and mounting the cove way Mrs Martha let the key to the furthest cottage in the interment camp for refugees. James had to show the papers to the guards, but by the guards one look was enough at the little girls, and he respectfully let them pass. A light was burning within one of the small wooden houses, and lifting the latch she entered followed by Violet and her sisters first, for James wouldn't go in until they did. A man and his wife were sitting by a table with a lamp light, but they rose and looked in wide mouthed astonishment at the little girls. Two children a boy and a girl were sleeping in a bed.

"Here sister dear and brother James," Martha said "You have heard from me how seven dear little angels who lived next door to me had done good and one of them nursed and tended my little Aggie and by the Blessing of God and the help of the Virgin brought her round from her illness, and those were wretches the Glandelinian spies have strove often to either carry them off or slay them in cold blood from secret places, and you know what it is to fall into their hands. This is their little guardian, and I'm going to ask you to give them shelter and let them stay here with you until they get find means to get across to Pandora where their parents and brothers are. I have brought each of them a clean suit of clothing. He will pay you well for sheltering them and him till we can put him on board Adolphus lugger with them and sent them across the water if it had not been for that desperate battle raging to day they would have had the chances to go to day. I was just starting to arrange it with you when the awful battle opened. James say he would pay a hundred crowns to you and that is a sum not to be earned every day."

"No indeed," her sister said briskly. "That will buy my husband a new boat and a good one such as he can go down the river in, beside as you say, after what they are even if not helping you a little did we are bound to help them. What do you say James?"

Her husband looked long at the woman who brought the children in and asked; "But where are the princesses Martha. You only brought the boy and these came in with him." Pointing with a shaking hand.

"But they are Violet and her sisters."

"But by cracker they can't be. No little humans can be as pretty and so strangely transformed as they. You can see the angelic effects in their eyes. They're from heaven, tell you."

"No, no don't get scared brother," said Martha. "They are the princesses. See they can't help smiling at your embarrassment and awe. They could tell you themselves."

"We are surely Violet and her sisters," said Violet herself. "We are no celestial children. If we were we would not need to come here for shelter." "But surely," the man said with a shaky hand "you have the very angels in you then. You'll possess this house with angels. How comes it you are fugitive then if you are that way. No harm can come to you."

"Oh yes it often did, and we got it hard too hard so all say," admitted Jennie Jennie."

However James face had anything but satisfaction until they were able to convince him they were real, and even his wife too was a little excited and yet felt as if she had a little bit of heaven at their presence. Then too because of the dreadful war the ties were bad—his boat was old and unsaworthy—a hundred crowns was a fortune to him but he felt it wrong to do this without doing it just for their sakes whether paid or not.

"I have risked my life often than thanks to the confounded enemy," he said to earn five crowns; therefore I might as well not say no to the offer for you would not hear of it as I can see it in your eyes. My boy, accept for a hundred crowns for your sakes I will run the risk of keeping you here, and the princesses too but I would rather for your sakes do it for nothing, but I know that would be useless for you would not do it that way, and if possible I'll help you later on cross the water if I can get you aboard a powerful christian gunboat."

"Very well then Mrs Martha said "That's settled now I shall be off at once. The spies may be catching the Company Streets for James so the sooner I'm away the better I pray they all get captured the dirty scoundrels."

Then she left. "We cannot give you much accommodation princesses and your boy friend," the man said. There is only the loft upstairs and for to night only some old blankets to sleep on, of course if two of you would like you could occupy one of the old beds, and another sleep with my children; but we will try to make you more comfortable to morrow."

"We do not care nothing for comfort," Joice answered "so make no change for us. Give James the best. He is deserving of it for all he did for us."

"No princesses don't sacrifice yourself like that," said James. "I myself cannot for comfort. I just wish to be treated as if I were what I seem to be—a young river fisherman who has come to work with you for a bit, and even they I know will row with you and help you with your nets for Heaven knows it is astonishing how my princesses friends like to work. Your sister has promised to send a boy every day with all the news of the enemy she can gather and about the spies too. Now if you have a piece of bread my friends will gladly eat it for they have touched nothing since breakfast and they are hungry."

"Ain't you going to eat too James?"

"I guess I'll have to as you won't if I don't," he laughed.

"We can do better than that for you," the good woman replied "and in some few minutes very good appetizing fish were frying over the fire. While the frying was going on there came a loud knock on the door a loud angry hasty knock."

The man went to open the door and a tall good looking but rough looking officer entered and looked searchingly about.

"I'm sorry to disturb you," he said looking respectfully at them and especially at the little girls. "We shot to two men running toward here, and we thought one entered here. Didn't see nobody did you."

"No sir," said the man.

"Well that's good especially for the sake of your guests here, didn't mean to intrude but we don't want the suspects to get away. They shot it out with us but I guess they escaped. They set fire to a building thinking the princesses still lived there."

He bowed and went out.

"Guess I'll bet it was the house we last left a few hours ago," said Violet. "We certainly were lucky."

"We will have to keep on our guard," said the man. "I hope you were not followed here by any one."

"I don't think so," said James. "I had my eyes in every direction and saw no one."

Fortunately the long house he had been on his feet had completely tired James out and after eating his supper with the little girls he at once ascended to the loft, threw himself on the heap of blankets, and in a few minutes was sound asleep. Violet, and her sisters however did not go to bed early they were too apprehensive to sleep and so didn't retire until the others did.

The next morning James was up early and dressed himself in the fishermen's or fisher boys clothes with which he had been provided, and went downstairs where the two others were getting breakfast ready. Their children were up and dressed and looked surprised and yet acted respectfully toward James for they had heard all about it when they got up themselves.

"You will do," Mr James said looking at him. "Get your hands and face as too white for on the river. But I was tanning my sails yesterday, and the oil is some of the stuff left in the boiler, if you rub your hands and face with that you will do well."

James took the advice and the effect was to give him the appearance of a lad whose face was bronzed by long exposure to sea and air.

"You will still pass anywhere now as James yet and are not disguised so that the christian soldier won't take you up by mistake," Mr James said approvingly "but you won't be known by Glandelinian spies, so if any of the spies come here they'll get a couple of shots through their bodies for they won't tolerate any strangers coming here."

In the meantime Adolphus had returned in his lugger the day after the arrival of James and the princesses there, and came over that evening to see them and was at first taken aback at the sight of the little girls as Mr James had been. But he covered his compass and said that it would be some little time before the lugger sailed again, but that if they wished to start as soon as the battle had an end; he would manage to procure them a passage to Pandora in some other craft. He said he had already been talking to some of the rivermen on the wharves, and that as a number of the most violent spies had already already been captured, they had proposed to go to the Tribunal when the spies were brought up before it, and that they would manage to get news then that would be good and see if these were not the spies most dreaded. On that day too James went up in a boat to Love Frey with Mr James and the fish they had caught. He had no fear of being recognized by any spies and did not hesitate to land, though he seldom went far from the boat. A Adolphe was generally there and he and two or three of his comrades who were in the secret always hailed him as an old acquaintance so that had any of the spies the enemy been standing there no suspicion that James was anything other than he seemed would have entered their heads..

"What's the matter Aldolphie?" James exclaimed.

"They have just gone out to bed early this evening, but it is the news." "I know," this morning that a number of spies who were duplicates of the little girls trailing you here to this camp, and town were captured here and were to day to be brought before the tribunal, and we filled the hall with women and two or three scores of rivermen and a crowd of soldiers. The spies were brought out and were found not to be boys in disguise as supposed but Glendalinden men spies the size of the princesses. They were asked their names and under no conditions would tell. They only said-

"You are charged not only with being spies within the christian lines in disguise as the Vivian Girl Princesses, and with trying to leave the christian lines contrary to the law against it and with being in complicity with one bigger spy who under false pretenses obtained commission and admission to the Committee of Abolition of the City of the Child Welfare here but with the intention also of assassinating the princesses from ambush. What do you say?"

"Then we thought it was time to speak, and the women cried out "for mercy for the princesses," and down with the spies, and said how good the little girls had been to the poor refugees, and we men cried too. And then Carl took up our cries got into a passion, and said that no spies can harm the princesses that these rascals were attempted assassins and that they should die. Some of us got worked up it too strongly, and broke into the tribunal and surrounded the spies, and we would have lashed them but the guards rushed in and we had to stop as we would not fight men of our side under any condition. Taking advantage of the commotion the spies tried then to seize weapons and escape and there was a fight. They beat us off and got outside, and then to our relief a regiment came up and though the spies fought stoutly for their blood was up it was of no use. They were captured again, and some of us got severe wounds from the little devils who were so strong believers. And, among every one else when the news spread through the town and the christian lines for some of the women and girls got hurt by those seven spies in the melee, and I think we could get five hundred men together and storm the jail if it was not for fighting against our own side. Get the spies out and burn them at the stake."

"I can hardly blame them my boy. If it was a Glandslinter prison, a day or little girls were within they could risk ~~every~~ anything, even though it would be a terrible thing for men with wives and families to brave the anger of these monsters, but why should we storm a prison containing seven little devil when they'll face a much ~~more~~ execution anyhow. The odds are not heavy against us we could easily storm the jail, but we would not turn against any one of our noids. The spies are proven guilty, they were here ~~having~~ following you, and the little girls with the intent to murder, and therefore the vengeance the tribunal will take on them is sufficient."

"I will speak again to him but his ship is of wood and you couldn't make it. He once said that the Glandelinian who re-butt-ries would blast his wooden craft out of the water but I have some news here: useless and it is not good news either. But I cannot tell it until it is confirmed. I will try again again."

"What is it Adolphie? What is your news?"

"James my boy I can hardly tell it," a Adolphie said in a low and a broken voice. "They're awful desperate these human fiends in gray uniforms." "What is it Adolphie, Tell me!" and in answer to James entreaties, he told the story.

James gave a cry of horror in which the fisher-men and his wife joined, the latter saying that God would delay, delay the time against the enemy. After his first cry James was silent, he sank down on to a low chair, and sat there with his face hidden in his hands for some minutes even though Violet and her sisters tried to cheer and encourage him, while the fisher-men and his wife poured question upon question upon Adolphie. Presently James rose to his feet, and saying to Adolphie; "I do not go away, I shall be back presently, I must think by my self." went out bare-headed into the night. It was half an hour before he returned. He had sent to see if the news was true and found out more than Adolphie had told. He was very angry, and coming into the attack.

"I cannot say James my boy," Adolphie said hesitatingly. "It does not seemed to me-----"

we will manage it. The question is how. The attack will come before sun up and we have little time."

"Yes my boy" Aldolphie answered hesitatingly. "That is the question. I'm afraid the little princesses are too bewildered by the man just now to think of any plan, they look it. You can rely upon me James. He won't do my best. I'll see you decide; but I have to lead to invent this, I think, but you and the princesses have, can tell it in your ways. You or she tell me and I will do it."

"I know I can rely upon you Aldolphie. As far as I can see there are but two ways. One is for me to go to General Carrier a head-quarters, be admitted to the man, and have him to give us a paper and pass into Pandora in a boat. Who we are even the princesses couldn't get in without a pass. As for the other, the martial law there, I am sure General Carrier would sign the papers all right for, can see all the rest as if it were passing. I can hear him giving his orders, I can see the respective and curious crowd and admirers falling back on the walk with him through the street, I can hear him crying to the soldiers and people to stand aside and let us pass, but how are we going to cross the river. The danger from Glandelinian shore batteries is so great that no man of the river will risk the attempt."

"Could you not if you had the pass embark in a Christian dive-gunboat?" Aldolphie exclaimed carried away by the picture which James seemed to be describing as if he saw it. "Why not start in a gunboat at once after you get the papers. You can easily get a gunboat and the men will stand by you, and as they know who are with you the captain of the gunboat would not desert the cause."

"Thank you Aldolphie. I will try that but the chances on account of the fog gunboats are a hundred to one against its success. I should have no fears as to my self, but when I go to see General Carrier and go through the streets in the way I must look out that some one does not place a musket at the back of my head and shoot me. It would not be anything to get him to sign the papers but the hardest part is the other plan."

"And what is your other plan my boy."

The other plan is as before to get on board some Christian gunboat in which we can get a passage to Pandora. You might find out which gunboat can be obtained from you. I am in the navy, and if the batteries on shore do sink her, then fasten the little girls to a spar and drift down the river with them till out of sight of the foe, when some one near the other shore at the Pandora side could row off and pick us up."

"That is a terrible risk something next to impossible for they say there are impassable Glandelinian batteries on each side of the river at the bend toward Pandora." Aldolphie said despondently. "To shoot down any shipping that will attempt to pass, and if any one swims down the river the soldiers will shoot him down any who may try to swim ashore. Of course a fleet of river gunboats of our side is going to soon try and pass the enemy shore batteries and also smash them to smithereens if possible and you may gain passage on one of the flag ships. But then you may chance to be on the very ship that may be sunk by the fire of the shore batteries, and so vicious are the enemy now that even if any number of sailors would take to boats to save themselves the enemy would fire on them too."

"I'd take the chances even if there is danger of the ship being hit as long as we can manage to go down stream without being seen." said Violet. "We must think of something Aldolphie, think man think,--and you James dear think-- if we are on the flag ship, the ship is hit by a shot, and it began to sink very fast, and you would want something very badly that would hide you from the eyes of the Glandelinian gunners a hundred yards away, what would you take...?"

"But you would be seen on anything you climbed on to cling to Princess and I'd hit by Grape shot."

"But we need not climb on to it at all as that would be suicide under eyes of the ruthless enemy." James said. "I can take pieces of cork with me and find some things on the ship and wrap around you little girls so as to keep your faces just afloat. I should only want something that would hide your faces." He turned to Jennie. "Can't you think of something." He said. "Don't you remember how you were once saved from ships being sunk at Norma Catherine when you and lots of children were placed on board to be drowned."

"A hatch might do if it is big enough for us seven and you too." Catherine said. "But such hatches are hard to find on these warships."

"They have the very thing, or we can bring one along from some old wooden ship." James exclaimed with a fresh ring of animation and hopefulness in his voice.

"The very thing if it is possible" said Joice. "But you must remember that was a wooden ship we had been placed on and these river ships are of iron and wood and have iron hatches. So we are stumped there as iron hatches would only push us under the water and drown us any way."

"There could be taken a hatchway from the fore-castle of the oldest lugger" said Aldolphie. "We might get that loosened before hand from a old boat nearby which I seen yesterday not in use, and bring it on board the flag ship and explain matters to the Admiral in case the ship is in danger of being sunk, because you must be saved before all else."

"What is the size of such a hatch?" asked Hettie.

"Some ten yards square." Princess.

"That would be enough," James said.

"I'm afraid it would be too big and be too easily seen" said Argeline.

"And be a good mark for an enemy shot" said Daisy.

"It's the smallest there is. You would have to chance it" said Aldolphie.

"But how high would a hatch float out of water, because there must be room between the top and the water for us to breathe as we lie on our backs" said Argeline.

"Four inches would be enough" said Catherine. "Are the sides buoyant enough to keep the top that much out of water?"

"I do not think so. Princess." Aldolphie said with a shake of the head. "It would float nearly level with the water."

"But see here" said Jennie thinking of her experience in the similar way when Evans saved her from the massacre at Norma and her sisters too. "I have an idea. We had an experience with ships when we and crowds of children were on board and the ships were sunk by enemy gunfire to drown us all. Evans saved us by a hatch too and it was smaller in size. All hatches especially of wooden ships are covered with thick tarpaulin."

"But on these luggers" said Mr. James. "They're covered only with wood."

"Well that do not spoil the plan any way. Some one could board the old ship and cut away all the wood and prop it up and cover it with the tarpaulin."

Then when the ships happen to sink if they do in the face of gunfire James who will be with us could knock away the props, the boards would tumble down, and there would be only the tarpaulin cover on the sides. It would float then quite more than five inches out of water and that in the middle of this wide stream would look either almost level with it or would not be seen at all."

"If Evans succeeded in that scheme then I will try it," James said. "There is a chance of success."

"It's a terrible risk James. Mr. James said. "You would be in the midst of terrible firing and if anything hits you you are gone."

"I know it James replied. "But it is just possible. The chances are a thousand to one against it, but it may succeed by the Aid of God only the main trouble is that the risk may be so great that maybe the Admiral of the fleet would fear of our safety wouldn't let us on board. But the risk of staying here is if the enemy should at some all portions of this position would be a thousand times greater, and what I fear is the enemy may win long enough at the beginning to bring disaster upon us and the little girls. To avoid the worst danger chance the lesser peril and hope that the possession angels will pull them through if the fleet is under fire. How many guns have the Glandelinian batteries."

"In that locality there are two thousand big guns in all."

"What do they hurt?"

"High explosives mostly."

"Good night. Seems impossible. But we must try it. Well Mr. James do you be with you boat on the old lugger in the river just below the point where the town can be seen and do not let Glandelinian spies trail you to watch what you are doing. I can get some of the soldiers to signal across water to the north west at the Pandora side telling officers there to also be down the river below the town, and if they see a hatch floating to down to row to it. If we are beneath it, well and good; if not."

"If not my dear angels and you too James" the fisherman's wife said solemnly "if it will be a dreadful day of mourning for us."

"Aldolphie will do his best. I will signal to the opposite shore to those the to have some brandy in the boats and a little charcoal stove and keep water boiling for no matter how warm the weather is the water is dreadfully cold in the river always. You will all want and need it, and now good bye my good friends."

"Pray for us hard to night. Now Aldolphie let us hasten back to town, for there is much to be done. And first of all you must see the office of the Airless Telegraph station, find out at what part of the line the attack of the enemy may come to now. I have no doubt it will be at this section. But above all find out if you can whether they can be allowed on board the flag ship of the fleet that is going to bombard the shore batteries or not."

"But if I cannot find that out James--if there is no arrangement made at all--though I should think there would be; for the Glandelinians may chance plan and attack sooner than expected."

"Then I will get you and find a dozen men you can't trust to volunteer to row the boats to put you on board and force the Admiral to accept you, and you must be sure to take the boat toward the flag ship, put first the wooden hatch be must be gotten and placed on board. But seeing the situation I do not believe the admiral would refuse, and I hope too that after all the hatch would not be needed, and that the fleet will pull through without the loss of a single ship."

"I will try," Aldolphie said. "Though I would rather cut off my hands than take the poor little girls out to be killed if I knew the advantage would be a fatal one. But as I hope in the possession of angels, and can beseech God for success in this enterprise, I will do it James, but except for that I want me that it may be a success."

It was about seven o'clock that evening when they arrived at Love Fret. Aldolphie went straight to the signal station while James walked along the quay. When he came abreast the center of the town a large number of sailors and five fishermen were standing talking in excited low tones, and looking with excitement at a long line of black painted warships starting to come into sight at the bend of the river. They were the ships getting ready to try and destroy the enemy shore batteries on the morrow. A number of men drawn from the strongest of the refugees were coming with boats to bring these sailors ashore on board the flag ship, while a strong body of troops were drawn up on the quay in readiness to prevent any suspicious persons from starting any demonstration. There were some spies on the quay but not many and yet these did not venture to express openly their detestation of the proceedings, but the muttered execrations and curses that rose from the little group showed how deep were their feelings. James joined a little knot of these four sailors who had been with Aldolphie in the habit of greeting him when he landed.

"All is lost if you plan don't succeed my boy," one of them said in a tone of deep commiseration but speaking in broken English so that the spies would not understand, in fact which if they did overhear they did not. "There are no odds lefted, but what you call heaven vengeance---if the enemy he sink you to your death---then we will take zat one of these days---but if you do fail, zat see a poor colic for you now."

"All is not quite lost," James said. "I have yet one hope. The little girls are possessed of angels and sure they won't let us fail."

"The enemy shore batteries, say see danger," one of the other men said who could also speak a little English. "Spies learned, so glandelin, say have marched on to zat works, three more division troops to day, and more of ze cannon y too have come up to ze works. Zat looks like ze fleet weel not be able to do anything to zem, though, hear ze christian infant y he weel make ze ground attack on ze work works by land too to morrow, to make ze enemy draw attention to zem more than ze fleet, put zat weel probably do ze no good at all. I could cry like ze leadie baby to zink that some times we seem so helpless in the face of ze awful things. My father he say yesterday he was goink mad if youse did not make ze success to morrow."

"No I know too direct and sudden reckless attack is useless," James said. "Still I have one hope left, and that is the little girls are angel possessed. It is a desperate attempt on our part, and I cannot tell you what it is now, it makes me really afraid to attempt it too, but the greater danger is staying here if the enemy do follow his plan and attack every where to morrow. I do not fear the attack itself but if the enemy at the beginning of the battle should win we are surely lost unless a miracle intervenes. Put to night may be Aldolphie may ask you to help us. I expect him here soon."

In half an hour Aldolphie returned, and James at once joined him. "I have got the news," he said. "The admiral of the fleet was signalled to and at first he promptly refused saying that the risk for the princesses was too great but when he was told escape on shore was impossible and that the risk was less on his ships he readily consented, but said he wasn't reassured possible what would happen in case they were either hit themselves or were drowned and had no faith in the hat plan. Violet and her sisters are to be brought to the flag ship first. Boat have already been sent ashore from the fleet. The flag ship is the only big vessel in the stream while the princesses are being taken aboard some of us and you will go aboard a that old lugger there and get the hatch and bring it aboard the flag ship."

"Thank God we know that much Aldolphie. Now in the first place I want you to get me a set of tools---a sharp saw, a chisel, a large screw driver, and a half a dozen large screws if you can, also two beams of wood to fasten across the hatch way and keep the boards up after I have sawn through them; also I want three bundles of heavy large cork---flat pieces will be the best if you can get them---what I can get them on the flag ship---good, but that doesn't matter much. I may as well have an axe too. When you go back to your house will you go in next door and ask our old land lady, Mrs. James---"

"He died three days ago" one of the sailors said.

"Then go into the house without asking, and in the furthest corner to the right hand side of the kitchen, scratch away the earth, and I you will find a little bag of money. If I fail to morrow and the sight of us perish, keep it yourself, if I succeed bring it to me at Mr. James, when does the lugger sail for Pandora. A man told me we couldn't be picked up at Pandora as the current of the river would take us below the fortified works of the enemy."

"In three days James I have already sounded the captain, and he will take you. And what shall I do next?"

"At nine o'clock this evening have a boat with the things on board half a mile below the town, give a low whistle and I will answer it. Wrap some flannel around the row looks to muffle the sound so no spy will get wise. It will be a dark night, and there is a mist rising all ready from the river. I do not think there is any chance of meeting any scouting enemy boats near those narrow craft."

"Go indeed," Aldolphie agreed. "It makes me shiver to look at them when I think what might happen on the morrow. There will be no boats out on the river to night except ours. Will you not come home with me James, until it is time to start you will need supper if you must keep up your strength and see the little girls off. They're to start first you know, you will follow later with the hatch."

James accepted the sailors invitation and after a partaking a good meal with Aldolphie and his wife and children, who was informed of the attempt which was about to be made, the princesses eating too, he sat looking quietly into the fire while the little girls were making preparations for departure arranging in his mind all the details of the enterprise uttering many a silent and fervent prayer that he and the little girls may safely get over to Pandora without any mishap.

Soon Violet and her sisters were ready to go and then to his surprise Violet who was first did not take his proffered hand as he feared of good bye as expected but suddenly threw her arms around his neck and kissing him said; "You have been very good to us James and we will as soon as possible show our gratitude," her sisters then did the same all hoping that they will live to see the day that they can reward him. Then they tearfully departed with the number of sailors who had come for them well armed. As they left Aldolphie went in and out making his preparations. At half past eight he said touching James on the shoulder "It is time to start for the wooden lugger James. I've got the bag of money. Every thing is in the boat, and I saw the men start with it. One of them was on board and in coming back said it is a mighty large and heavy hatch too big to be put in the boat so that they'll have to tow it toward the flag ship, it is time for us to go and meet them. We do't want to keep the admiral waiting too long."

Mr. Thomas burst into tears as she did at the departure of the little girls as she said good by to James.

"I shall spend all night on my knees" she said Praying God by means of the Holy Virgin and the Holy Virgin to aid you and your dear little angels in getting over to Pandora as near as possible. Here is a large packet of pocket James with some food for you to eat in the morning, and a bottle of good wine, you will want strength for your adventure but if it is good for you and them do not join in any of the fighting if you can help it if a battle rages on the river save yourself from injury for their sake."

"I will be careful," said James, and three or four minutes after he and Aldolphie had gained the appointed spot, and soon they heard a low whistle on the water. Aldolphie whistled on in return and in another minute a dark object appeared through the mist. They took their places in the stern and the boat moved quietly off again. So well were the oars muffled that James could hear no sound save a small imperceptible splash each time they dipped it into the water. The town was very still and scarcely a sound was heard. The awe of the horrible event which was about to take place hung over the town. So thick was the fog that they were some little time finding the white luggers. When they did so they moved to the one at right ahead and made fast alongside. Noiselessly the tools and beams were handed on board. Then James said;

"What is all Aldolphie?"

"Not at all James. We are not going to leave you till the work is done. You could not handle that big heavy hatch alone, so get it over the side into the water. We have settled that five sets of hands can work better than one, and besides we may hit upon some idea. No one can say."

Finding it useless to comment, James wisely let the good fellows have their say. The men had already moved their boats, and noiselessly made their way to the hatch of the fore castle.

"As it is just as well that I brought a file with me," Aldolphie said in a round a table. The admiral turned to James and looked at him closely and admiringly.

"So you are the lad who is to accompany the little princesses to their destination."

"Yes sir," said James modestly.

"Tell us your story over again," the main admiral said. "It is a strange almost miraculous one."

James again repeated the account of his adventures from the time of first becoming an aide de camp of the little girl through their brother's leaving Aldolphus cottage, when he had done Admiral Johnston said:

"Very well done lad, you could not have acted with more presence of mind had you been a captain of the fleet. You showed great bravery and did your duty nobly."

"There wasn't much bravery sir," James said modestly. "For every one I know the spies were going to try to kill the little girls any how, so it made no difference whether they got me or not as long as I saved them. But I was determined if possible that they should be saved and in case anything happened to the ship in battle we could use the hatch."

The admiral smiled. He was not accustomed to hear his dicta so slightly questioned by a lad.

"You really were the aide de camp of the Princesses?" My father tells me," the high admiral said, "and have been in your own country two years as a boy scout."

"Yes sir," James said.

"Could you like to know what the little princesses said about you when they boarded this ship about three hours ago?"

James eyes glistened at the question.

"I should indeed sir," he said.

"Then you shall be my boy," the admiral answered. "They said you have been so good to them that they wished you to be rewarded. Would you like until we win the battle and get to Pandora like to be on the quarterdeck of this ship?"

James could only nod.

"Then you shall be my boy," the admiral answered. "Have any of you gentlemen a vacancy in the mid ship mess berth. If not I'll have him temporarily ranked as a supernumerary on board my ship until he has the chance to take the princesses into Pandora."

"I am short of a mid ship man," one of the captains said. "Poor little Michael in the last engagement was killed. He was about the size of this brave lad and I'll be glad to have him back. I like his look even though he is foreign and I should be glad to have him with me on this ship. I am sure he will be a credit to the service and will not be separated from his princesses either."

"That's settled then," the admiral said. "You are now sir," he said turning to James again. "An officer in imperial service on board this ship until you and your charges get to Pandora, and as captain Henry remarks I am sure you will do credit to the service. A lad who does his duty toward such good little girls when death is not only staring them but him in the face too, and without a hope that the act of devotion will even bring success in the end and strives for it any how, is sure to make a brave and worthy officer."

James now captain now set a few words on a piece of paper and said to the admiral's servant:

"Take this good boy at once and present him to Mr. St. Francis and with him give this note. He will be your ship mate in future for a time on board this flag ship. See that he is made comfortable. I want the princesses to get a surprise in the morning."

The mid ship man then beckoned to James to follow him, gazing askance and with no slight astonishment in his face at the appearance of his new messmate for the lad had a face told he was foreign. James attire indeed too was not in accordance with the well-cleaved ideas of that of a mid ship man freshly joining a ship. He was dressed however as a sailor boy. Without a word the ship man mid ship man first said:

"Here have you sprung from my lad? You look foreign."

"I hail last from the admiral's cabin," James said with a laugh. "And before that I was a guardian of the dear Vivian Girl Princesses."

"You look like a guardian, fierce and courageous," said the midshipman.

"But what have you been doing with the princesses? Have you saved them before this?"

"Not until three weeks ago," James said. "I had just been appointed by their brother's period."

"Nymph, and you taking this risk to see them safely through to Pandora?"

"That's a lad."

The midship man was much surprised at James' appearance to question him further. He felt that there was some mystery in the affair and that it would be better for him to wait until he saw the footing upon which James was placed. He had little doubt from the fact of his appointment being made under such circumstances that there must be something singular and noteworthy about it. His James new messmate at once led him up to the first lieutenant Mr. St. Francis and presented the captain's admiral's and the captain's note. They were brief:

"Until the time comes in which he is to have the chance to bring the princesses safely into Pandora, for his bravery in defending them through dire unseen perils to success so far James and crew at their request to night early has been promoted by the Admiral himself. In their defense he has performed a most gallant action and one of the greatest importance and is set upon a more daring adventure still. Make him at home at once, see that he sleeps late for the engagement won't start until noon tomorrow, and let him have poor Henry's kit. I will arrange about it."

The senior midship man was at once sent for by Mr. St. Francis and James handed over to him. The first lieutenant intimated to him briefly the contents of the latter telling the midship man to make the lad as comfortable as possible. James was led below the cockpit where his arrival was greeted by a storm of questions, as his appearance on the quarterdeck had naturally excited a great deal of observation among the night crew. It was now only ten o'clock at night. The midship man who had come with the lad of course could furnish no information, and beyond the brief fact mentioned by the captain, and repeated by the first lieutenant his new conductor could say no more.

In a few minutes James was rigged out in full midshipman's dress, and being a very good looking and gentlemanly lad his appearance favorably impressed his new messmates who had at first been disposed to slightly resent the intrusion among themselves of a youngster whose appearance was foreign.

"Now," said one of the passed mates, "this meeting will resolve itself into a committee. Let every one who can sit down, and let those who can't stand quiet. I am the president of the court. Now prisoners at the bar," he said. "What is your name?"

"James John Andrews."

"And how came you to be here to ask all this damage to bring the princesses to Pandora if that is possible?"

"I've cleared off from sailors who were there and my friend."

"No equivocation prisoners! I mean what brought you onto the quarterdeck?"

"I had the good luck," James said, "to prevent a great number of unknown Glandelinian spies from assassinating the princesses."

"The duce you had," the president said, "and how was that? That is to say," he said, "if there is no secret about it?"

"None at all," James said. "The matter was very simple," and for a third time that early night he told the story. When he had done there was a general exclamation of approval among those present, and the midship man crowded around him, shaking his hand, putting him on the back, and declaring that he was a trump....

"The prisoners are acquitted," the president said, "and is released as a worthy member of this noble body. Boy."

"Yes sir."

"Go to the purser and ask him to send in two bottles of brandy for this honorable mess to drink the health of a new comrade."

"Presently the boy returned."

"The purser says sir, who is going to pay for the rum? He would give it for nothing."

There was a roar of laughter among the middies, for the masters mate, who had acted as president had not yet paid the dues because he had not had the chance to do so. However a midship man who happened that morning to have cleared a remittance, undertook to stand the liquor to the mess and James' health was drunk with all honors.

"I suppose one of the midship men said that the contents of a dispatch captured yesterday were with reference to the point to which we are all bound. I wonder where it can be?"

Here an animated discussion arose as to the various points which the attack of the fleet now rapidly assembling in the dawn might be directed, go far no whisper of its probable course had been made public and it was believed indeed that even the captains of the fleet were ignorant of its object.

James was then about to go to his own quarters when he heard a well known voice among a group of sailors standing near him.

"I can't make head or tail of it," he heard someone say. "My brother they say is a very brave lad and through him many spies who had attempted to get at Vivian girls never came back to their own camps no more. How he could suspect there could be foul play among the enemy I never can say. I hope none 391 of those spies comes aboard of our ship, but they say they'll have to look out for the Nutt and Jeff spy. He has a strong large-souled party with him. But he is hard to capture, but my brother sure is a brave lad. He left home so father wrote me merely to be an aide-de-camp of either the prince or his darling sisters, and as soon as it was possible he was to notify father of what he really was to do. Well father has sure had admiration for my brother at the news he got. He will probably be on board this ship in a few hours, and when he comes who will congratulate him with me."

Half a dozen voices exclaimed that they were willing to assist their mate, when suddenly James stepped in among them saying:

"There ought to be an accession of that right now."

Peter Andrews stepped backwards in his astonishment, and stared open mouthed at James.

"Dash my unholy buttons!" he exclaimed "why if it isn't James himself, and in a chief midshipman's gig. What means this my boy?"

"It's my brother, dear. That I am a midshipman on board a cruiser and this is the ship."

Peter stood for a moment as one stupefied with astonishment and then threw his cap high into the air with a shout of delight. It fell into the water and the diver current carried it away, but Peter gave it no further thought, but seizing James by the hand wrung it with enthusiastic delight.

"This is news indeed by my bow!" he said. "To think of seeing you on the quarter-deck and that so soon. But what will the princesses do without you?"

"Just the same I'm still their aide-de-camp" said James. "My attention will be only for them just the same."

It was some minutes before James could shake himself free of his friends all of whom there were old chums of the boat swim, and had known him in his childhood.
Drawing Peter aside at last he took him to a quiet room in the cabin and there to the intense astonishment of the old veteran he related to him the circumstances which had led to his elevation. The elder brother a full-grown man who had been in the navy for these three years was alternately filled with wrath and admiration and it was the only the consideration that beyond doubt the glandelinian spies were either captured or had already faced execution that restrained him from instantly rushing off to take vengeance upon many of them who which he could do. At the hour of midnight the whole of the ships destined to take part in the shelling of the shore batteries had arrived. The fighting signal flag was hoisted at the ships head, and on a gun firing from the head admiral's ship the anchors were weighted and the fleet soon started slowly down the river, the engines making the smoke stacks puff like a number of railroad engines. It consisted eighteen cruisers, with an extra number of frigates, and ten gunboats. The expedition was commanded by Admiral Johnston with Admiral Francis his father second in command. Contrary to the general expectation they moved eastward instead of passing through the main bend. Just before going to retire for the rest of the night James had an interview with the Admiral. The latter told him that the emperor's signal to him that James did something for general Nance that he never told any one about. Why my boy the dispatch box which you had captured had been sent up to Pandora, and its contents proved to be of the highest importance, and that the emperor's satisfaction at the themselves also wired to me expressing their satisfaction at the capture saying that the whole of their plans would have been disconcerted had the papers fallen into the hands of the enemy. They my boy were pleased to express their strong approval of your conduct and gave their assurance that when the time came your claim for promotion should and will not be ignored.
But the emperor's wish his brother and even sons were surprised that the princesses made no mention of the deed in their letters, now is that my boy?"

"I didn't tell them."

"And why my lad?"

"I'm shy at praise from them. If they knew it they'd hug and kiss me to death.
They almost done it already."

"Well my lad," the admiral said "you may be sure when you have passed passed your cadetship for boy scout official commission you will get your epaulettes without loss of time, and if you are as steady and well conducted always as you are now you may look out for a brilliant position such as some of the highest girl and boy scout leaders have. It is not many foreign lads who enter the boy scout troop under such favorable conditions. I should advise you to study hard in order to fit yourself for command when the time should come. From what you tell me your education has not been neglected, and I have no doubt you know as much if not more as the majority of my many midshipmen at the various ships as to books. But books are not all. An officer in His Majesty's service should be a gentleman, and yet what the princesses told me after they got on board here early to night you are more than a gentleman and that I'm happy to see it is true. It is desirable than an officer of a boy scout regiment should be able to in all society hold his own in point of general military knowledge with other boys and girl scout scouts and soldiers too. In Abbeinnia most of the boys and girl scouts, whether privates or officers are not given to thinking their studies, and that no doubt in what makes them all such a terror to the enemy. I need say nothing to you as to the necessity of at all times and hazards doing your duty for what the Vivian princesses told me you are more than any of us I believe in bravery and that is saying a good deal. That is a lesson that you have clearly already learned and the emperor Vivian and the whole of the royal navy in Pandora are almost sick with anxiety and impatience to see the little hero of their holy and beautiful daughters for secretly they have managed to slip in many letters about you. The fact that you did not tell them about the dispatch you captured was why they did not write of it but general Nance did."

As the fleet still kept east (if not east) expectation rose higher and higher as to the object of the expedition. Some supposed that a dash was to be made against and past Fort Clocklin on the river. Others conceived the object that the object, of the expedition must be one of the North Bend or Galamania fortifications and the latter were confirmed in their ideas when at about two o'clock in the morning the fleet were found to be running close in upon the enemy shore batteries and other positions not far south of Pandora. Instead of passing through however the fleet anchored here out of gunshot of the forts of the foe and great was the astonishment of the officers and men alike of the fleet when it became known that it was the purpose to smash down all batteries and fortifications so that river transportation could be resumed up and down the river and from Pandora. Upon the face of circumstances known to the Abbeinnian authorities this was indeed a momentous attempt, for to see the river fleet appear before these strong fortifications, appeared a high handed act of great rashness. In fact however the Abbeinnian government had learned that negotiations had been proceeding between the commanders of these fortifications, and a vast glandelinian army about to attack the christian positions at Nogales, and that a great scheme had been agreed upon, by which the other army should join the assailants elsewhere at a given moment and the united armies being added by the batteries of these fortifications a sudden and desperate desperate attack would be made upon Pandora that would be absolutely successful.

Had this secret Confederate not been interfered with, the position of Pandora would have been seriously threatened....
Thus if the other glandelinian army could have come up on time the glandelinian generals Manley and Clancy, and others well known to the readers would have been able to put onto the scene would have greatly exceeded that which the christian general Jack Dane could have mustered to defend the positions at Nogales Creek near Love Frey and thus it was believed more sensible by the fleet first striking a blow before the enemy had time to move to the attack upon the others by land. It was the news of this secret resolve on the part of the Abbeinnian government that having in some way been obtained by a heavy bribe from a spy came where was being carried over in cipher to the glandelinians, and had it reached its destination the glandelinians in the shore positions would have been a warned in time, and the enterprise undertaken by Parker, Johnston and others would have been utterly impossible, for the fortifications of the shore were too strong and extensive to have been attacked had they been thoroughly prepared for the strike.

As all these matters were unknown to the officers of the fleet great was the astonishment of the captains of the ships assembled in the admiral's cabin and each received orders as to the position which his big vessel was to take up and the part it was to bear in the contest. This being settled the captains returned to their respective ships. Just before break of day the looked for signal was hoisted and the fleet stood in down the river with a fine sight as the leading squadron consisted of twelve lines of long battle ships and a number of armoured frigates under Admiral Johnston steered on down the river, followed at a short distance by Parker and the rest of the christian fleet.

When left alone by his friends in the meantime to get his rest James blew out the candle in his berth and threw himself down on the cot and thought over every detail of the work for the next day. As long as nothing too bad would happen to the ship he was determined to do some valor of his own during the fighting for it was his duty to do so if he was midshipman. If the flagship should receive a fatal wound then the hatch would be handy. As he had said the great danger was of fierce fighting that was in the stream but then it could be evident too that the wise of such a terrific conflict would scare them out of that part of the river and smother them into insensibility. The next danger was that enemy soldiers might come in boats and examine what was under the

"And grant that it will not be necessary to use it," he said, "but if it must be I shall not dare hesitate. They would simply destroy us, that is certain, therefore even though I am a foreigner, I am justified in defending the little girls, as I would against any other enemy."

He knelt down and prayed for some time. Then he replaced the piece they had cut from the hatch, and fixed the beams beneath it, and then lay down again just as the ship started to move. He was worn out by the excitement of the day and despite his anxiety about the morrow he presently fell off to sleep. He was awakened not by daylight that came streaming in, but by a long rolling of thunder and vicious cracking high in the air and above the ship. He wondered what was up, and he looked through one of the port holes and saw that the shore to the north and west was one pall of smoke as if a great fire was raging, but most of it shot out with eruption like and from it came banging thunder as loud as to almost shake his very nerves. The fact is at this moment as the fleet was moving, port number one was cannonading them, but so inefficiently that the fire was very ineffectual and the fleet without really steering on with the purpose reached the position in intended for them. The Glandelinians however were prepared for action. The fleet of the third line of this coast consisted of a number of frigates, supported by floating batteries mounting seventy guns each was moving along in a line four miles long and was engaging the land batteries but the flag ship and the others were still silent. The great force of the enemy was to be it seemed to be engaged by the squadron of the Admiral's Father alone as that of Admiral Johnston remained outside menacing the formidable coast batteries and preventing these from adding their fire to that of the fleet and other shore batteries upon his sons' squadrons. The Viper the leading ship had been directed to sail past the line of ships operating against the south shore of the river and sent forth a hail of destruction against the north shore and also to operate if possible against a detached fort standing on a spit of land on the right flank of the Glandelinian position. This great low fort mounted many guns much superior to those of the Viper in weight but the crew were in high spirits at the prospect of a good fight. Stripping to the waists they stood and clustered round the guns, James himself with two other midshipmen having been upon the quarter deck near the captain to carry orders from him as might be required to different parts of the ship; but the lad had been sent down again with instructions from the admiral.

"Our duty is to guard the princesses. Stay by them during the fight."

As the Viper passed along the line of ships to take up her position, she was saluted suddenly by a crashing storm of fire from the nearest of the Glandelinian shore batteries, to which she made no reply. He suffered however but little injury although shot and shell whistled between the masts and struck the water on all sides of her several striking the hull with a dull crashing sound, while herself were pierced with holes.

James thinking of the peril of the little girls felt that he was rather pale and was disgusted with himself at the feeling of discomfort which he experienced. Surely maybe they'll win and the little girls will be safe and only enjoy the thrill of the big river battle.

Despite his worry and the din of battle he ate his food which Martha had put into his pocket as best as his fears would let him, saw that the big bundles of coals were ready at hand and the ropes attached to them so placed that they could be fastened on in an instant. He heard no sound yet from the ships nor any sound as to tell him the little girls were aroused; and therefore there was nothing to do but to wait.

A minute passed slowly. Then there were voices, and the sound of feet passing quickly as if running to the guns. There was a great hum of talking on the deck and frequently persons stepped on the hatch and James congratulated himself that the beams gave a solid support to it.

Yet there was nothing that tried the nerves as was more than standing the fire of an enemy before it is time to set work to reply. As soon as orders were given for the Viper's fire to be opened directly the guns could be brought to bear, and the roar of her cannon answered those of the fort the feeling of uneasiness on the part of James disappeared, and was succeeded by that of the excitement of the battle. The din was prodigious beyond belief, for along the whole line the two rows of Christian ships were engaged, and the banging boom of the guns of the land batteries and fortifications, and other batteries, the noise of burning shells kept up a deep roar like that of incessant but loudest thunder overhead. In James thought to himself if that did not awaken the little girls they must be dead.

Presently he thought despite the din of battle that he heard the sound of hands and bodies from one side of the river but could see nothing so thick as the smoke. It was believed that Glandelinian troops were taking up their position on the fortification quay a but safe from shell fire. Half an hour passed as well as James could judge, then the noise of the cannonading increased and a sound as if a shell had hit the ship. Then saying to himself "it is time" he knocked the beams from the ladders allowed the square of wood to fall to the deck, lifted the hatch. He was horrified to see that there were some fifty sailors already killed or wounded. Despite the danger of flying shot he hurried aft looking for the little girls, having no fear that a stray shot might hit him. Two or three turned round from the gun just fired as James came aft; exclaiming:

"If you are looking for the princesses you will find them in the Admiral's Armoured cabin."

He went there quickly and pushed open the door.

"Oh James is it you?" Jennie exclaimed as she was the first to greet him. "Is there any danger of the ship being badly injured. If so will the hat ch save us or will we die together?"

"We are in God's hands Jennie dear, but there is hope yet. The ship may pull through and it may not. The enemy's fire is awful heavy. Bring the youngest of you dear little sisters to me."

As James finished there came a great crash as of an explosion and a gun was hit by a shell and all its crew killed and the gun dismounted. At the terrific explosion a panic seized some of the others at another gun but they were driven back to their post, the panic soon passed away, all had for months looked battle death in the face and though the sudden unexpected form in which it appeared had for the moment shaken them they soon recovered.

Jennie had despite the crash crash been not the least moved and without another word had taken the two youngest sisters by the hand and brought them forward. Oh how they looked that morning James was over-awed and forgot for the moment the avenging fury of the battle.

"Jennie in case the ship does get wrecked I am going to try to save you and your sisters but every thing not only depends upon your being cool and brave but to keep where you can be where shot and fragments of shell splinters won't hit you. Confound that explosion. I can hardly make my self brave. I need not urge you little girls because I am sure of you. But I don't know how the young ones will act. Daisy and Genivieve will you try to be so for your dear sisters sake and your own. If you do not we must all die together."

"We are not afraid of anything" said Daisy. "What are we to do?" she added steadily, while Hettie clung to her younger sister sobbing bitterly for her father and Penrod.

"We do not need to do anything now" said James. "We must wait and see what the ship does. If—"

"The water for some of our ships is very shallow sir" They heard the first lieutenant suddenly report to the admiral. "Some of the ships might run aground aground and the current is sweeping sweeping us along fast."

"Prepare to anchor Mr St Francis" the admiral said.

While the starboard guns were kept at work, the admiral requested the first lieutenant to go aloft and see what was going on along the part of the line. He returned with the news that six or seven other ships were plainly aground, and that things appeared to be going badly, two other ships had been blown up and three others were badly injured and one was sinking.

"Oh if our ship get a blown up we are done for" cried Violet growing pale.

"We James have gone from the frying pan into the fire."

"I've prayed and that nothing would happen so badly" soothed James but it did no good, because as the little girls were they were so sort of panicky and didn't know what to do, so the Viper was suffering terribly. The fire of one of the forts was well directed, and the gunners working their pieces under comparative shelter were able to pour their fire steadily into the Viper, while a floating Glandelinian battery, and two shore batteries also kept up an incessant fire. The little girls also got a frightening shock when a shell hit the cabin and burst, and though it did not much harm to anything movable within came down all about them with a great noise and clatter. The number of killed and wounded was already large, but as the guns of only the starboard side could be worked the fire was kept up with unabated zeal, and the fort bore many signs of the occurrence of the fire. The punishment was in many places shot away and ten of the guns put out of action. But the Viper was clearly over-matched and the admiral hastily wrote a note to his son the higher admiral stating that the ship though still in deep water was altogether out of the over-matched and begging that another vessel might be dispatched to his aid, if one could be spared in order to partially partially relieve her of the anonymous murder on fire.

"The Admiral, take the flag and go off to the flag ship instantly."

At first James looked at the little girl but they said:

"Go ahead James you'll be back 18m or so before anything happens."

James with reluctance obeyed orders and a fearful that something might happen when he was gone. Through the storm of shot and shell which was flying striking up the water in all directions he made his way to the High Admiral's ship which was lying around nearly a mile away. Admiral Johnston opened the note and read it hastily through.

"Tell my daughter," he said "That I haven't a ship to spare. A number are engaged, and all are hard pressed. He must do the best he can, and hold out under all conditions for the sake of the little girls on board. Too bad they came aboard for something, may even happen to them before a you scheme comes through. Oh you have the little lad whom I say in my father's cabin are you not?"

"Yes sir."

The chief admiral called in token of approval and James prepared to leave and soon was in the boat. As they turned toward the Vipet they could see that had not been going with her. Her two masts were down, two smoke stacks were damaged, and her sides were battered and torn, and four of her port holes were knocked into one. Still her fire continued unabated, but it was clear that she could not much longer resist.

"Do you think she will haul down her flag?" James asked of the coxswain of the boat.

"Ah, yes sir," the coxswain said. "Wood and iron can't stand such a pounding as that much longer. Most captains would have hauled down the flag long before this, and even I'm afraid our Admiral can't stand out much longer. There won't be a man alive to fight her. The gum of the ship has been nobly fought but we hoped to see her doing good as the more ships are coming down to engage with the fort, but it may seem even then in a vain. They have done all that brave men have done, but the fight every where seems against every ship, and further resistance seems in vain. In a quarter of an hour more a fire will be centered upon the ship that will mean annihilation, and you may even fall in your position. I proposition to rescue them by means of a boat. Better get ready and do it now. I can help you get the little girls under deck. Better get up, have the hatch hauled down on the side of the ship not so badly exposed, and have them descend that way too."

"Taken by surprise by this sudden turn of events James said:

"I could do a desperate enterprise if it would work."

"What is that?"

"Will you do as I order?" James said.

"As you wish," the coxswain said in surprise. "I will do as you like" for the story by which James had gained his mid ship man's promotion had been repeated through the ships and the men were all proud of the little lad who had behaved so pluckily.

"At least James said "It may do good, and it won't do harm. Her is the boat hook. Fasten this big white handkerchief to it and pull for the fort." The coxswain gave an exclamation of surprise, but did as James told him and with the white flag flying the boat pulled straight toward the fort. As he was seen to do so the fire of the latter which had been also directed toward the boat, ceased, although the duel between the battery and the Vipet continued with unabated vigour. James steered direct to the steps on the river face and mounted to the interior mounted to the interior of the fort saying that he brought a message from the admiral, and though the Glandelinians were astonished at the sight of a boy bringing a flag of truce he was at once conducted to the main commandant.

"I am come sir," James said "from the captain to tell you you are to surrender at once. You have and are being out mastered as we have the most guns and three or four more ships are coming down to engage with you."

"Taken by surprise by this sudden demand and from a mere child mid ship man and which was fortunately at the moment backed up by six of the ships of the squadron which had hitherto taken no part in the action being seen sailing in, the commandant after a hasty consultation with his officers, was resolved not to surrender but to raise the flag of white and hastily abandon the fortifications, and two minutes afterwards the Glandelinian flag was hauled down in the fort and the flag not of surrender but of evacuation was hauled up. One of the Glandelinian officers was directed to return with James to the ship to notify the captain of the evacuation of the fort. The astonishment of Admiral Johnston at seeing the course of his boat altered, a white and yellow colored flag of evacuation hoisted, and the flag proceeding directly to the fort had been extreme, and he could only suppose that James had received some orders direct from his father the other admiral and that a general cessation of hostilities was ordered. His surprise became astonishment, and so did that of Violet and her sisters when they saw the Glandelinian flag disappear.

and the yellow flag of evacuation hoisted in its place, and a shout of relief and exultation echoed from stern to stern of the Vipet for all felt that the conflict was hopeless and that in a few minutes the Vipet must strike her own flag for the sake of the little girls on board. All sorts of conjectures were made as to the sudden and unexpected evacuation of the great fort, and expectation was at its highest when the flag was seen waving again, with a Glandelinian officer by the side of the mid ship man, reaching the side of the nearest ship. For James did not trust Glandelinians with him James ascended the ladder with the Glandelinian officer, and advancing to captain Temple's ship Shirley said:

"This officer sir has in compliance with the summons which I took to the commander of the fort in your name come off to tell you Evacuation will begin immediately, but no surrender will be expected as those Glandelinians to tell you he said does not give a rank quarter but they will desist in firing and evacuate the fort."

The Glandelinian officer advanced, produced some papers saying:

"In the name of the commander of the fort we will evacuate in short notice."

The captain looked the papers over, and ordering James to follow him at once entered his cabin. His astonishment was unbounded when the latter informed him what he had done with many apologies for having taken the matter into his own hands.

"I saw," he said "that the Vipet was being knocked to pieces and in danger of being blown to pieces, and the coxswain told me that it was impossible that she could much longer resist. Knowing that the princesses would be in a danger which I could not save them from I therefore knew that I could do no harm by calling upon the Glandelinian commander to surrender or evacuate the fort. Of course I was only selected as a mid ship man sir, but the princesses told me that in a way, I'm the head of the whole fleet, being their guardian, which is a high commission and that brought me to do this in order to save them from capture and had the ship struck any way without necessary reasons with them on board, and they would hold the admiral responsible for what might happen in case they were captured. I thought that I might succeed, and you see that I have."

"You certainly have saved the Vipet," said Shirley warmly "and we are all indeed indebted to you especially the princesses." Usually for midshipmen it would be a piece of astonishing impudence to convey a message with which the admiral has not charged him with, but as you are the guardian of the princesses, that does elevate you far above any of us even the admiral in a way and you therefore in order to save them not only did right but bravely as well, and otherwise in case it would have been an offense success in that case would a thousand times condone the offense. You have indeed done well young sir, and the whole fleet is vastly indebted to you. I will report the matter to the admiral."

A hundred men speedily took their places in the boats. Mr. St. Francis was sent ashore to take possession and a few minutes later to the astonishment of the admiral and Violet and her sisters the Christian flag was flying upon the fort.

Ordering James to accompany him Captain Shirley at once took his place in his gig and rowed to the flag ship. The battle was still raging, and to the practiced eyes there was no doubt that the Abbeccian fleet was suffering very very severely though the enemy was suffering doubly as bad. The flag ship was still under heavy fire from shore batteries and scarcely a man was now handling the guns. Captain Shirley mounted the quarter deck and saluting the admiral reported that the fort which the admiral was engaged had struck and evacuated, but that the St. Johns being aground was unable to render any assistance to the general attack.

"A good many of us are aground," said Admiral Johnston said "but I congratulate you for having caused the fort to be evacuated and thus relieve me from some of the enemy's fire. Several of the shore batteries have struck, but we cannot take possession, my crew has almost been annihilated, and fresh troops of the enemy are appearing and their fire had reopened. Our position is an unpleasant one. My Father has signalled me to draw off, but so far I have paid no attention for the chief reason I can't draw off and leave the ships that are aground aground to the enemy as these Glandelinians will give no quarter."

"The fact is," Captain Shirley said "as Violet and her sisters came close to hear the details it was not I, who made the fort haul down its colors, but this little mid ship man of yours."

"Ha," said the admiral glancing at James while Violet and her sisters looked their own astonishment astonishment. "How on earth did he do that?"

"When you told him sir that you could give us no aid he took upon himself for the safety of the princesses, instead of returning to the ship to row the night wind the fort with a white cloth fastened to the boat hook and numbered the command in my name to surrender or evacuate at once."

"If he had not been a guardian of the princesses which makes him somewhat our superior, I would say he was an impudent little foreigner," the admiral exclaimed. "Midshipmen were impudent enough in my day good as they are, but this boy sure beats every thing. I approve his idea was an excellent one, and by Heaven, I will adopt it myself. A man no matter who is he should be above learning, and we are in such sore straits, that one cat ches at a crow." So saying the admiral, calling to his own captain, entered his cabin and at once wrote a letter to the main Glandelinian commander demanding him to surrender or evacuate the fortifications and shore batteries, saying that it was best to do so than risk annihilation. The message was at once sent ashore and the admiral waited with anxiety the result. A half hour elapsed, the firing continuing with unabated fury so that now the admiral was the only man on board his flag ship all his men having been killed.

Violet herself had been looking down the open hatch way; suddenly she screamed.

"What's wrong?" asked James running forward.

"The ship must have been hit below waterline. The water is rushing in. The hatch."

The admiral who had not heard it suddenly said;

"By Jove Shilley, there is the evacuation caution flag," and a tremendous cheer broke along the whole of the christian fleet as the flag of truce waved over the principal fort of the enemy. Instantly the fire on both sides ceased. Peace passed between the shore and the slowly sinking flag ship with the proposals of surrender and conditions. The admiral insisted that all the shore batteries should be evacuated in so firm and decisive a tone as to convince the main Glandelinian commander that he had it in his power to completely destroy all. At length to the intense relief of the admiral and his principal officers, who knew how sore the straitest situation was and to the delight of the sailors and marines, the negotiations were completed and the victory won.

"Where is that boy?" the admiral asked. "They won't need no raft or hatch as all firing has ceased. Get him and the princesses to another ship and I'm going with. He found the lad and said;

"The white flag has been hoisted my lad and the positions of the enemy has been captured and to you more to any one is this great victory due. put we cannot wait time. Off with us in our boats to the other ship. We got only half an hour to waste."

They were soon on in the boat saved this time without needing needing to use the hatch.

"Now my dear princesses" said James "I will tell you what we can do. you see the fleet has been victorious, why not get to Pandora on board ship."

"I am content but I hate to leave without first telling our friends who had done so much of the good success that happened through you James" said Jennie. "you did splendidly."

"Oh you need not bother telling them that" said James. "Tell them the enemy gave in and we have a good passage for Pandora."

"Why not?" said Violet. "you deserve it. You have done more for us than we deserve."

"Then you deserve it?" said James. "Please angels don't say those things. Let you go through is what you don't deserve, and you know Violet and Jennie."

The continued putting his hands on Violet's and Jennie's shoulders that I love you and your sisters more than a brother even would their own sisters, I should never have told you so until I got you home if it had not been for this; but though I have never said it, you know I love you little girls very much and desire your company always, and your brothers too. I have a surprise--"

"I know James" said Jennie, "and we love you too with all our hearts so much that I can and they too feel more than happy that we are after all going to Pandora and it is through you. We are loving friends now my dear good brave boy come what will. Hettie and Daisy often told us they loved you the first day they saw you and knew what you would do, and she lifted her face to his. He gave her and then her sisters one long kiss. The boat continued on and as soon as they came near the other flag ship, there was then a crashing thunder of many cannons. The fleet was firing a salute in honor of the victory gained. "The victory was the best thing that could have happened" said James as Jennie bent over the little sister Daisy who had almost fallen asleep being lulled that way by the rocking of the boat. The crash however had aroused her and as she sat up.

"What in the surprise you were going to tell me" asked Jennie.

"That is the surprise you were going to tell me" asked Jennie. "The reason your brother Penrod asked me to be your little guardian is because we were school mates in St. Patrick's School over in America and we loved each other."

"That is no surprise to me" said Jennie laughing. "Penrod told me that himself before you came. That is why we were so glad to see you."

"While we are heading for the boat," said James "could you or one of you little girls mind telling me how Evans saved you from the massacre at Pandora. I had heard a lot about it and thought it was marvelous."

"I could tell it as far as I remember it" said Jennie. "It is a long long story and I will try to tell you all before we get to the ship. Evans saved us by means of a hatch large enough to contain him and us seven. As the ship was sinking with all on board he fastened a rope to a ring in the side of the hatch on board that wooden ship, then tied the cork first onto my shoulder as I believe it may be it was violet's, adjusted the others to my sisters and the last bundle to himself. He told us the plan how when the vessel sank it will float and that we must float underneath with our faces underneath it so that it would hide us from the fierce murdering Glandelinians on both sides of the river, and even if they did put out in boats to kill any who may be clinging or swimming they would not suspect that there was any one underneath that. He at first felt that we would not succeed, that an accident would betray us, but that there was a possibility. At any rate he said he and us would either live or die together. Then impatient at the length of times the ships were taking to sink, those on shore started opening fire with cannons upon them, and the shot as it struck the ship we were on just above the water. The shock knocked one or two of my younger sisters senseless. Evans then saying it was the best thing that could have happened for them and ourselves, told us to lie down on the decks for fear that we would be hit, for the Glandelinians were opening fire with rifles and machine guns. Then he that is Evans tied some rope around my younger sisters, fearing that when the cold water touched them they would come to their senses and at a single, then he laid down on the deck between us with his head against the hatch after tying us together so we wouldn't drift away from him, and held on to the rope telling me and Violet to put our heads on his shoulders, and that he would put an arm around us, and that he would hold us. He told us to hold him tightly too as the ship sinks, saying that he would have to use his arms to get the hatch over our faces. He told us not to breathe while we were underwater for that we no doubt would go down with the lugger although he would try to keep us afloat, and said that when we were under the hatch we would find that we would float with our mouths well out of water and would be able to breathe, for the corks would keep us up."

"I understand now" said James. "and I'll bet you played hard." "We sure did, as shot after shot struck the lugger, then we felt it give a sudden lurch. There was a wild cry among the people on board, and the next moment as Evans told us afterwards the ship went down stern first. put she was so nearly even with the water when she sank that there was less down ward suction than we had expected, and striking out with his feet his head was soon above the surface. The cord had kept the hatch within a couple of feet of him and with some difficulty owing to the buoyancy of the corks I suppose he trusted himself and us under it, just as a shot gave me a little cut on the arm. The tarpaulin was old and rotten, and the light penetrated in several places, so that we could see each other in the position we were lying, and our faces were above the water. However for many of us it was useless to speak, for our ears were submerged and we were able to prove to him by some motion that we were sensible although we had not made the slightest motion the moment the vessel sank. The water was very cold but we can stand plenty of cold without effects. Daisy had not however covered her sisters as we feared she would with the shock of the immersion, but lay immense on my shoulder. We prayed in thanksgiving to God that we had succeeded so far, and prayed for protection to the end. With every minute that passed too our hopes arose, for every thing had answered beyond our expectation. The other unfortunate victims had apparently not even noticed what Evans was doing, and therefore had not ad he feared might be the case interfered with his preparations nor had any of them given to gain a hold on the hatchway. The sinking of the vessels and the tearing up of the water by the shot, rendered the surface disturbed and broken and decreased the chances of the floating hatch attracting attention. After what we believed ten minutes had passed we felt certain that we must be below the point where the Glandelinian troops were assembled. Then too the current was very strong and as Evans believed half an hour would take us past the bend where our friends were waiting for us. The time however seemed endless to us for the cold water became trying on us as much as we could stand it and we began to feel faint and numb. I could see that the faces of my sisters were white, but we were still conscious. At last we heard the sound of oars. At first we were afraid for it might not be one of the friendly boats but it was probably it might be. Had they seen any other fishermen's boat near the point they would have rowed high up to intercept the hatch before it reached the strange we could not hear voices for although the water brought the sound of oars to us we could hear no sound in the air.

The gun came near and near and by the quickness with which the strokes had followed each other we knew that two boats were at hand. Then the hatch was suddenly lifted, and we were rescued. Here we are at the other flag ship now and it is time we were put aboard.

They were soon on board and the lower Admiral greeted his father and them with the greatest joy and enthusiasm. There was a loud cheer from every one else on board the flag ship which had stood the enemy fire without much injury, and to the surprise of James he saw Adolphie, Mr. James and the others among the sailors, and they came forward and stretched out their arms to them. The girls were first lifted onto the decks, and then James was helped on the whole crew on board the ship taking turns shaking his hand and patting him on the shoulder while the tears ran down their cheeks.

"Give them all some hot brandy and water," was the Admiral Johnstone's first words. The STEWARD had a kettle boiling in the ship kitchen and James and the little girls were ushered in. A glass of hot liquor was placed to Jennie's lips. At first she could not swallow she was still so nervous after the experience of the terrific combat and the danger of the ship being blown up but after a few drops had passed her lips she was able to take a sip, and would then have stopped, but James insisted upon her drinking the whole contents of the glass.

"It is best to do as you are told Jennie," he said to her. "It can do you no harm, chilled as you are and overtaken in nerve as you were with the danger to the other flag ship and the terrible carnage you and your sisters witnessed on board, and it may save you from illness."

In the meantime Pierre and Mr. James had given the sisters first several spoonfuls of neat brandy between their lips. Violet and her other sisters now that the awful excitement was over felt numb all over and were as white as a sheet and before taking quick turns Jennie and James began to chaff the hands of the little girls to restore them to normal.

"Take off their shoes poor things Pierre and soak a saucer with the hot water and put it to their feet. It will restore them to their better selves. They were shocked by the dreadful peril they were in. They no doubt seen six ships blown up and every one killed on board and feared that would happen to the flag ship. That has done them bad."

But with all these efforts it was not until the big ship was moving again with the purpose to try and tow one of the grounded ships off into deeper water that the little girls recovered their composure. Too the winds were warm blowing up the river and that helped also. They were then led to the Admiral's cabin.

"That is right princesses. Thank Our Dear Blessed Lord who had brought you straight through the danger in this desperate conflict, and too Heaven be praised not that not was it after all unnecessary to use the hatch, but we won a victory as well. Now do not stop a moment, but come in here and get into bed, the beds are already for you. We have matrons who will help you to undress yourselves, and do you my boy hurry and get on dry clothes."

James soon we joined the party of officers and the Admiral and his sailor friends in the ship kitchen. The strong glass of hot spirits he had drunk had sent the blood quickly through his veins, and he felt a glow of warmth.

"Now," he said, "my friends I can thank you for all the aid you have given us. It is to you we owe our lives, for without your aid I should never have succeeded."

The two admirals turned swiftly around and Johnstone said: "Is that so, here did you get that way. It is to you they and we owe our lives, and the great victory we won, but say nothing about it James. We are happy to have aided such a brave little boy in saving his young charges, such dear little girls, and to have rescued the little girl from the foe."

"Do you think there is danger of any spies taking the news of our being on board to the enemy camps so that spies would be sent after us into Pandora?"

"There is no fear," the Admiral said confidently. "There is no man here on board any of these ships who would not tear a spy to pieces if we caught one on board. It is impossible for spies to get into Pandora, and so why to say I'm afraid it is impossible too for you to get into Pandora even with the little girls as you would be strangers to the garrison at the landing place, so the best that can be done is for you to accompany me. It is so strict that only with me can you and the little girls get in. So no you need not have any fear of the spies. Those else who may guess who you are, but it is no business of theirs, and they will hold their tongues. James had heard of the that Adolphie's wife had come aboard the flag ship for she too had heard of the victory, and she appeared and said that the little girls were sound asleep."

"Now Adolphie it only remains to get them safely into Pandora."

"That the Admiral will arrange to do this afternoon," Adolphie said confidently. "Consider it as good as done."

After Adolphie had started for the cabin, James was persuaded by Mr. James to lie down for a bit; but the little brave lad soon gave up the idea of even trying to go to sleep. His brain was in a whirl from the noisy events of the last seven hours of battle, and above all he felt so brimming over with happiness that he soon found it impossible to lie still. He therefore went and joined Mr. James, who was sitting eating a sandwich in the kitchen.

"It's of no use my trying to sleep Mr. James. I am too delighted that every thing has turned out right. I want to break out into shouting and singing."

"I can understand my boy. Yes, yes. After great trouble, great joy. But I for got to mention about the battle on land. I saw it from a safe spot and so did the rest of us all our women and children refugees. The glandelinians came at the christian positions yelling like a hurricane. We thought at first they would break through so spirited was the attack, but the long glandelinian column went to piece pieces before the christian fire of rifles and cannon and they saved nothing. The christian fire swept every thing away before it even bushes and twigs. But the attack was again commenced by other waves of those glandelinians and we could see then that the christian lines suffered terribly and were finally driven back, and the attack seemed in danger of coming to our refugee. However the women set us a good example. They spent their time during all the horrible uproar tending their terrified children, and praying to God, and asking the help of His Saints, and we river sailors and refugee men, who are strong and tough you know, but who knows that God protects us and never go anywhere without going to church and paying for a Mass for our safety—we not only prayed too but took up positions in good shelter and with our rifles also picked off the enemy within our reach despite the fact of the danger that would attend us should be captured by the foe and be found shooting at them and not in uniform."

The glandelinians swarmed through a good portion of the camps, and even drove the christian into our village and out of it as we supposed would have happened but the attack only succeeded that far for the christian fire from distant batteries cut up the whole wave of attackers dreadfully.

Then we saw glandelinian batteries sweeping the christian positions with a terrific fire, and knew that there was going to be a disaster.

"Now," Mr. James said, "if we ourselves had but a good position and a artillery we could do something ourselves but without that if the enemy do win and sweep their attack this way our defense will last only an hour or two, so we might as well have died at once."

"To shame," one of the women said, "you are getting discouraged discouraged. Pray to the good God again and he will send the christian lines help. Do you think he has done all this so far for nothing. The enemy won't win. There must be some way out of the difficulty if we could but think of it."

She sat looking at the wild conflict, for two or three minutes and then said: "It is easy. Why have you not thought of it? See there. That attack is coming close within our own range. You men have plenty of old round shells of some sort. Why not fill them with powder which you have and make so many of hand grenades with them and throw them among the enemy."

"We shouted for joy, for it was as she said, though I am sure none of us would have ever thought of it if God had not given her the idea. We set to work and got the shells ready ready ready. The storm of attack came again that part of the christian position quickly. We had time to make however a good number of the artificial shells and when we were finished the attack came, and we soon had enough of them to get ready. We threw quite a number but our luck seemed gone, the glandelinians directed a cannon and rifle fire upon us and we had to lay low. We too had not been careful enough of our own shots at first making sure that in three hours we should see a christian victory, and when the enemy started firing at us there was for us scarcely any bullet left."

It was two hours after that before we saw the reverse. Twelve of our men friends had been hit and killed, and two of the women and a number of men were wounded and many were lying down to avoid the fire of those glandelinians while we returned it as best as we could. Only that good woman was sitting up behind a tree holding her child in her arms. She was now very scared too but she had never complained, never doubted for a moment. Her eyes went from the child's face over at the battle to look for the help she felt sure would come, and back again, and at last she said quite quiet and naturally:

"There, the enemy is giving way. I knew victory for the christians must come today."

So thought she was dreaming or off her head, but one of us dared to make a shift and stand and look, and when he recovered out "The enemy is running, the enemy is running," we all looked also. There the enemy was really given way again and in a dreadful panic too. It was not until evening however before the battle was finally over and it was a christian victory and when they won we felt expectant the same as you do now James, that it was the good God

"If he had been killed, I would have been the only one to see the good victory within our very view, and Alldolphie and Pie would have been before the battle over the whole one beach at the tide of the grand victory of the fleet and we would have seen how you had the little girls' song."

"That was a narrow escape for every one of us indeed," James said as he helped the sailor mend the boat that had been injured on board the flag ship during the battle. "That idea of the woman was a splendid one, and you may well say that God put it into the woman's head, for without it you could never have held the position you were in."

"I'm so sorry to interrupt my boy," said Captain John when walking up, but Admiral Johnston wishes to see you sir."

James excused himself from Alldolphie and went to the Admiral's cabin.

"You have done nobly my boy, and besides taking care of the princesses you have won for us a great victory. The victory is all to you, but we are now so sorry indeed that you should soon have to leave us."

James smiled faintly.

"It is the fortune of war in the navy is not a long one but perhaps it may be some day when I'm a man, it is but a few nights or only a night since I got my commission, and now I'm leaving it altogether. My duty you know is with the princesses, but when I get some little time I may some day join our navy for good."

"Leaving the navy perhaps," the admiral said cheerfully, "but I know it is your duty. There is one good news I have for you however something too which the little girls have been worrying about so long and that was the condition of your friend Timothy Groveton the boy scout leader. He is all right now and has some honor gotten across with his regiment into Pandora and has told Empere Vivian what you have done, and what he has heard you have done. There is a long time of delightfulness before you when you get across, but my Father will be as glad as I am that the career of a young officer who promised to rise to the highest honors of his profession and be a credit and glory to his country will have to be cut short because of your necessary duty to the princesses. In fact though, it is you who should have been the admiral."

The admiral then shook hands with the boy, and thanked him warmly for his services and for what he had done for the little girls, and cheered him by telling him that he would take care that his presence of mind and courage should be known. All that night almost James had not much sleep. He was so excited and overjoyed that he had saved the little girls and made an easy opening to Pandora that he could not sleep. He was up again before the breakfast time and found that Violet and her sisters had been up before him and were looking for him.

"Why James," said Violet in surprise "what were you doing in the Admiral's Cabin?"

"Oh I tried to sleep last night but I couldn't," said the boy.

"Why did the excitement of the battle keep you awake? Oh I'm so sorry," said Violet truthfully.

"There is nothing to be sorry about," said James. "I was too happy to sleep knowing that the enemy was not able to do any harm to you."

Violet, and her sisters looked at each other. Jennie was about to speak when some one suddenly said:

"Ah James the boy is it you. The admiral told me that you had won the day in battle and saved the little earthly celestial children, but I didn't recognize the name as that of James Andrews as the Midshipman chief." And Walter Starling himself stood there.

"I'm glad to see that you are here," Starling said. "However, my boy I do not believe any one of us have ever done what you have done. I am almost simultaneously save the princesses from spies, and so on, but why do you first that you career on the water is at an end."

"It is said that it should be so," Admiral Johnston said, "but there are many men even admirals like me and other distinguished chieftains who may live to be a good age and will have done less for their country than this lad in the short time of his career. It shows sure what Americans can do little or big, and it would be a blessing if we had a whole army a million or so arrayed against the Glandellians. First after he got on the shore before he got on our fleet he prevented a dangerous despatch, which would have warned the enemy of what was coming, from reaching them, and captured the despatch carrier, and in the second place his sharpness and readiness saved no small portion of my fleet, and converted what threatened to be a disastrous defeat into a victory that will surprise the whole nation for I had attempted the impossible just for the sake to get the little princesses through to Pandora. You must be proud of you little foreign friend."

You must be proud of you little foreign friend."

Violet and her sisters looked dumbfounded.

"You say he captured a despatch," Jennie gasped.

"Why yes. I forgot to tell you that the boy thought to keep his self from being praised did not mention a word of it," the admiral said.

"He indeed," he didn't say a word," Angelina Vivian exclaimed surprised. "On the contrary he told us he captured a despatch carrier but he said nothing about a despatch."

In a few words the admiral related the circumstances of the capture of the despatch carrier, and stated, "I have the letter of praise from your Father Empere Vivian himself. He was surprised that you little girls didn't write a letter of praise to your loving boy friend because of the capture of the despatch carrier. Empere Vivian himself has the original. To prove to you I have made a duplicate. They are as alike as two peas. James had even foundered the ship in which he had captured the despatch, and he blew up another. Of course to some it may be a mere coincidence, still the likeness is so strong that the Empere made some pretty rigid inquiries."

"Have you anything else by which the duplicate can be identified as to by whom it was made?"

"By General John Manley. With the duplicate which I kept to show you little girls when the time came there are some trinkets of something like Indian work man ship, for the most part and a strange locket. I will bring or have my captain bring them over to you as soon as we have had breakfast."

"Do so," said Starling, as Violet and her sisters still looked that gaping astonishment. "I'm going to Pandora to-morrow if possible and shall see General Kinderline. Don't speak to any one else about it for fear of other Glandellian spies, for it is a thousand to one against it being safe if any overheard. Still I hope sincerely that Empere Vivian will prevent the designs used in the despatch."

"He has already."

A little later after breakfast the admiral came.

"I have them with me and the duplicate despatch," he said and to the surprise and curiosity of the little girls produced the little packet, and the despatch or dispatch which James had captured and given to him. James blushed at the look of the princesses. They glanced at the ornaments, and Violet taking the locket pressed the spring. She gave a cry as she saw as she unfolded the slip an important map of Pandora and her fortifications in it and exclaimed:

"Yes that is a map of the positions around Pandora. What an extraordinary discovery. Where is James? Where did he go? I assurely he is a brave boy indeed and a long friend of our brother Penrod for they were school mates together in the far off country of the United States."

"He went to get something from the Kitchen for you and himself which the Steward forgot to bring," said Starling.

The admiral then related the story of James doing from the time he had known him, and Starling was greatly moved at the tale of bravery. Before we go ahead I will give a detail of what and how James had secured the despatch. Though at first the story made no mention of it, it happened two hours and a half before James had gone back on the war-craft after taking taking aboard the raft. He had decided to go to shore again to get the bag of money and went off at a run into the darkness. The road was a wide one and but little frequented and the grass and weeds grew very thick over a considerable portion of the sides; therefore as he ran along with a light springy tread the sound of his foot steps was deadened. As he came along by a cottage not far from that of Alldolphie he heard the sound of voices within. Being curious to see what was going on for he suspected spies, James passed lightly lifted the latch of the gate and entered the little garden. He had intended to only peep in the window and having satisfied his curiosity to be off but just as he reached the door the latter opened suddenly, and James had only time to draw back behind the little porch before two men came out. In their midst he had a little girl. In one James recognized by his voice the very man whom he had caught once shadowing Violet and her sisters, the other was by his halting English a Glandellian whom which showed evidently his partner was an English rogue. They stood stopped for a moment looking out into the gathering darkness of early evening.

"I tell you," the wicked Englishman said, "it's going to be a storm of battle to-morrow and no mistake. Manley's army is a good tight fist one and has weathered many a battle, when many Christian dog armies have gone down. Still I don't like seeing Manley running into this immense one of that crazy Christian Empere. I tell you it is dangerous especially without necessity."

"Necessity," said the Glandellian. "I could, have sought it, zat ze oining of ze five hundred dollar, as a urgent a necessity as was wanted by mine beg spy. Ze guardian of ze Naevian Gail, he keel heem."

"Ay, the money will be handy enough," the other said, "since we capture this little spit fire of a bird, though one like us do put our heads into and lose to know it, however the sum is bigger than usual, and as you say the affair is important most important for the Glandelinian cause."

"Bah, the Glandelinian said with a scowl. What does eat matter with ze goose or ze snoodle or what ever ze call eet in ze Englishes. It has not yet been blazed over ze neck, o my zens one, and till eet doze we need not trouble about eet. I tell youse ziz yose ze most important dispat ch we have ever seen, and if eet geet safe to hand, zay cannot begudge us double pay, and what ees ze pay as long as ze ch-reesteen dog get a ze whip. what ees ze christian dog I'm goink, a maud. I have ridden rom ze Calverins eet without stopping, and have keeled a hor, with feefery of you r Englishes monies. ziz leetter shouf fetch us plenty of ze monies to pay fo rze hundreen hors, and a dozen of your-beeg sheeps on ze water-wiz ze beeg sails."

"All right Mr-Glandelinian friend" the Englishman said "In less than an hour we will be off. Letters like that in your pocket with so many christian dogs around here are best not kept on hand. You are sure the Antonine will put out to meet us in the risk of a battle going to rage on the river and in the face of great dangers we are likely to face?"

"She will put out if the christian dogs sent a hurricane of attacks down the river" the Glandelinian said. "Zey know ze importan of ze great news, which ees expect, and wheech I am bring to zem. Mon Dieu, zay zums have been pay to meet ze news zay zat ees een zis liddle deespeech."

"Do you know what it is?" the Englishman said.

"Not for ze cert." the Glandelinian replied. "but I believe eet ees ze hordees zat are to be sent to ze Abbeunian Emperor, and zat heem ees abould to strike a great beeg blowie some whar."

"Well the Englishman said "I will go round and tell the boys. I warned them to be in readiness for we had been also looking for those yivian gi & snipes but they have got away, and I will send the men straight down to the beach. In a quarter of an hour, will return for you guard this little snipe well."

"Ees she what you call heem ze spie."

"No, but she came across us when we were planning this and we'll take her with us she can't blab on us."

"Better keel her and be done wiz eet."

"Better do it on the ship, not here."

While this conversation had been going on James had been standing against the porch the sides of which were filled with lattice work over which a number of creepers grew. He had been frightened at the importance of the secret that he was hearing, and had been rapidly mediating in his mind how this all important information which was about to be conveyed to the enemy could be stopped. He had made up his mind that the instant the spy moved out, he would make his way down to the village, tell the tale to half a dozen men and have the two of them seized. He saw at once though that it would be difficult, for the spy and his gang were not men to be attacked with impunity, and too these were experienced spies, too dangerous to be captured alive, and the fishers of the village would hesitate in taking part in a struggle merely on the information of a little boy. The Christiansoldiers were too far away to go to, however at first James had seen that this would be his own chance. In his anxiety to stand close to the lattice and so hid himself from the view of the two men who were standing on the little garden path in front he could see the little girl and she looked terrified and was whimpering.

"Why wait until we get on board the ship" the Englishman said. "We should cut her throat now. The little brat has heard what we said before we captured her and our lives won't be worth a minutes purchase if she were to be set free. Stand by and I'll knock out her brains," and he picked up an enormous stone.

"No, no, the Glandelinian said vehemently "don't let us have blood here. Zey might be many inquiries, and zee dings we'll be find. Better take her to see wiz youse in your sheep and hand her over to ze Glandelinian fort. Zay weel take care she weel not come back again."

"I will take care my self" the Englishman said grabbing the frightened child by the neck and starting to strangle her. "I'm not going to chance my neck on the risk of her blabbing on us."

"No, no don't keep keel her yet. Zay weel insure our captures."

"All right, all right. It is better as you say, to have no blood blood but as soon as the ships at sea, overboard she goes."

"We can talk of eet" the Glandelinian said "I'm wiz you zat she must bee silence but eet may be better, my plan, zan you rze ziz liddle goil belongs I suppose to ze refugees vilie."

"Yes," the Englishman said. "I know her by sight. She is the daughter of an man of war man who is on board the christian fleet."

"Well, you zee, som of your men might might some day if they quarreled wiz youse o'geet mad at youse and do what you call heem double cross, zay might drop some words which weel led to inquiry. Better put the liddle snake in ze bee g sheep. I will zee ze matter ees settled."

James had spoken no word or let himself be seen. She felt an instant that soon or later the little girl's life would be snuffed out by these dirty scoundrels, and was surprised that the little child was not already killed. He had not raised his voice to call for help for he knew that no cottages were near, and was sure that an attempt to give the alarm would insure the child a instant death and cause his capture. He however was not alarmed and he was a stout lad and he decided to use strategy. He saw too that on the instant the Glandelinian had drawn a dagger from his breast, and though more quiet than the forligner he felt by the tone of his voice that he was as determined as his companion that the little girl's silence should be secured by death. Seeing a way to get in without being seen James climbed through a window and quickly hid under a table just as the Glandelinian brought the little girl in and there where into a corner. Then he took his seat near the assurance harin a low tone that he would at the first movement or whimper plant his dagger in her heart. The Englishman strode off to summon his crew and for a quarter of an hour silence reigned in the cottage.

"Youse are wan leedle fool." The Glandelinian said at last as if he had been thinking the matter over. "One medlesome leedle fool, for why ees eet you want to listen at peeples doors and learn ze secrets. I for zat I like very best you know to keel you but here we cannot do eet. you'll leedle ch-reesteen dog mak es us keel youse, you push your own head een ze trap. Zat ees ze way wiz ze leedle girls and boys of the Ch-reesteen army. Zay are for ever meddling into affairs zat concern zem not, and zen we hve ze troubles to keel eem. Eet ees my life against yours and my life is of much more value zat zat of a girl of ze ch-reesteen dog s. Bah you are wan leedle medlesome fool."

So exasperated was the Glandelinian at the trouble which the prying of this little girl had brought upon him that he got up and angrily gave her a kick. A few minutes later the Englishman returned.

"The men have all gone down to the boat," he said briefly. "Come along mounse. Bring the small package with you, those pistols, the little girl, and that big rug rolled up the re."

"Zees no fear for get ze tin ccase." The Glandelinian said. "As to ze pists zay are not of much use, however, weel take zem" and he thrust them into the pocket of his coat. The Englishman stooped picked up the little girl, threw her onto a sail which he had laid on the ground, wrapped this round her, and then cast her over his shoulder.

"I'm not likely to meet any one on my way to the boat" he said. "But should I do no I'm taking the main sail of the Scorpion down to her. The Glandelinian picked up the rug claiming it was heavier than he thought it was and they went out alaming the door. Presently they went over the sandy slopes down to the edge of the sea. Presently the sail with the little girl within was flung roughly down on the sands. A minute she was lifted by the head and feet and swung into a boat. Not a word was spoken, as it was shoved off through the breakers, and after ten minutes owing the terrified little girl felt a shock, and knew they were alongside the Scorpion. He was hauled up on deck. He heard a few words of command, and then felt the vessel was on her way. A minute or two later the covering was unloosed. Her cords were cut and the Englishman said to her.

"You can't get away now and may as well make you-self handy for the present. Go to the cook to and give him a hand on peeling potatoes."

The rug itself was placed down in the upper section of the hold. Then after the men were gone, the rugs seemed to suddenly have taken on life, and a boy managed to work himself through the tunnel of the rug. It was James. He had coiled himself up in the rug. He saw from some observations that the Scorpion was in fact a short handed one for two of her crew were absent and only seven men were on board. He was a live lugger of some thirty five hundred tons but burdened with something like an ordinary ocean going frigate, but much longer and lower and was in fact used for fishing when he was were not engaged upon other adventures. He was a remarkably fast craft and had of more than once showed himself with success when chased by a christian man of war. She owed her immunity from capture however chiefly to her appearance as from her size and built she was an enormous Glandelinian live man of war and carried a hundred and fifty guns at each starboard bow. The boat company itself was bound, James gained from a word or two dropped by the captain, for the fortifications along the river where of which she was to be met by a Glandelinian Frigate the Lucy Ann. Long before the shore was out of sight.

"Well, she be zat me to he time." The Glandelinian asked the Englishman.

"Yes, she will do it." The Englishman said "If the wind holds as at present."

"Ah, yes she will do it."

"A fearful escape for them, even on the flag ship, as you had been even from like some of the other ships. I had never seen such a fight and such thundering of cannon."

"It is wonderful indeed that they have come aboard," the other woman said. "It was lucky Alphonse got the ship's steward to get some more hot brandy. So shaken were they from their fearful experience he thought he would never bring the youngest to themselves again. They are only little children but how good and brave, what harm could they have done to those Glandelinian monsters that they should so often try to murder them. But I know it is just because they are good. There is no fear, I hope that there would be any Glandelinian spies getting on board any one of our ships."

"I wish he would," said the woman indignantly. "Where could a spy hide tell me that. There is no hiding place on board any of these ships for that has been absolutely proven. Do you think that a spy would come here trying to get the little girls. Why we would tear him in pieces."

"But that is not the only danger," Martha said. "I never thought for a moment that any spy would come aboard, but our children on shore might let slip a word accidentally which might bring spies on board if they can do in in the uniforms of sailors."

"The other woman laughed good heartedly.

"I'd like to see them doing it. No one can get on board this ship without a sailor's commission from the government or accompanied by the princesses. That is comedy indeed. Let them try it. Put us to the children as we will take care of that. But a soul outside the Christian lines and our refugee camps will never know of it."

"And the other woman added "One of them has plenty of money hid upon her, and she told me just before I came out, when she was saying that our William would have a bad time now the fishing was spoiled by the river battle—that she hoped with her sisters to be in Pandura a few days, and would have no need of the money, for it seems she can get plenty over there, she will give twenty crowns to each house in the village as a charity and thanks offering."

"Well that is not to be despised," Martha said. "We shall have a hard time of it for a bit, and that will carry us on through it. You are sure she and her sisters can spare it, but because we'd rather starve than take it from them if they cannot."

"Oh yes," the little girl said she could afford it well and plenty of it too."

"Well then it is a very lucky day for the whole village, that your husband has helped us save the little angels."

"Well I will go back to shore now," the other woman said. "I will go round the village and tell the others about silencing the children. You must get some hot broth ready by the time these poor little heavenly beings awake. Every one wishes heartily that they never needed to go through this, and Glandelinia they know for ever will answer to God for it some of these days."

"I believe they have suffered plenty and may suffer more yet but will never come to real harm," said Martha. "It is adventure to them I guess."

The next morning Jennie appeared at breakfast at the Admiral's table and strange to the rest only her, and James was alarmed though at that moment few words were spoken between her and him, for the Admiral and his officers were present.

"How are you, sister?" the Admiral asked anxiously. "Why don't they come to breakfast?"

"They are a little better but they are weak and languid and so I told them they must stop in bed for to day. Do not look so anxious James dear I have no doubt they will be well enough to be up to me now. They have been sleeping ever since they went to bed yesterday evening and when they awoke they had a bowl of good broth. They are not ill but need rest. But I'm afraid it will be some time before any of us will be ourselves again. It is a terrible strain for them to have gone through, but they were very brave all the time the awful battle raged. It was the first time we were in the midst of such a fight and I will admit we were really scared out of our wits for the first time. But we feared the ship would blow up. Ten of them were blown up and Violet is the worst of us this morning. We all however had such confidence in you and knew that you would manage to save us through it all."

After breakfast Jennie strolled down with James to the ship's deck and looked into the water she felt as if he really was in the presence of an angel in the form of a girl, and again came that strange fragrance from her as if he could never discover any.

"I and my sisters feel at ease with you," James she said. "Before you seemed almost like a guardian brother, and now it is so different."

"Yes, but happier I hope," James asked gently.

"Oh so much happier James. But there is one thing, I want to tell you. It might seem strange to you that I should tell you I and my sister loved you dearly on our own account, with out you speaking to the Head of our family."

"But you surprise me," said James. "I never spoke to you of father."

"No but Penrod confessed it all," I know of you before I ever seen you for Penrod showed me your picture some time after we found he was our lost brother. The days you and he went to a Catholic school together at St. Patrick's in Chicago at Adams and Desplains street he once showed you some pictures of us not knowing then who we were but told you of our character and he told us that you had told him you'd praise God the day you ever became acquainted with us. That you have done for him once when he over there got ill and was sick almost unto death was marvelous and made him your best loving friend for life. I do not know how he learned that you were here but he did, and he gave you that chance to meet us. But Heaven must have prepared for that meeting and oh God what we would give if we could pay you. Little as you are you are sure a equal to Evans and even he wrote so. General Evans would be glad to even see you."

"But surely I couldn't let you go into peril," said James smiling. "And I didn't do it for her sake either as I'm no hero. This is the first time I ever saved any one from the enemy, but if you know what I know of the enemy you would be ill from the shock of the story for months. I'm or was only a foreigner and until my father got citizen ship papers, and supposed to have nothing to do with this war, but what I could think of the enemy you wouldn't like to hear. Heaven knows I have an awful account to settle with the enemy. And I will too."

"You have already settled with the enemy," said Jennie smiling through her tears of gratitude. "For what you have done for me and my sister. I suppose it would have been the same any how though I know you would say that is not satisfactory to you, that you wish more vengeance than that. But I know you sorrow, and it is greater than our little brother was murdered by Glandelinians. Penrod knew of it and told me. But I want to tell you James that in that very long letter which he sent me, just a little after you helped us get Violet out of prison, Penrod said he thought it right that I should know that our good father and mother had told him that night he got to them and when he told of his discovery of you being here and that he had selected you as his duplicate till we could be re joined, that they would know I and my sister cared for you. You didn't think so, did you James?" she broke off with a vivid blush. "You did not think I and my sister cared for you before you cared for us and our company?"

"Yes I did Jennie," he said earnestly. "I could see it in the eyes of your sister. And it never entered my mind that I didn't care for you even at the very first day I came to you. You see dearest princess of God up to the beginning of that time when I first saw pictures of you shown by Penrod in America I felt it could be heaven only to have a glimpse of you, and in America though they do tease girls some times yet when we grow older girls too are sacred to us, and we beside the ones who try to do them harm. They'll even kill a villain who tries to harm their girl. Then when I was here with you through these adventures, when some how the danger and the anxiety seemed to make a man of me, when I saw how good, holy, and brave and thoughtful and unselfish you and your sisters are, that I knew I loved you all very dearly, as I love your brother Penrod, and being with you would make me the happiest boy alive. I must confess Jennie though no one knew it unless your house keeper would tell you I often cried at night because of the sorrows and perils you were in. But I could not help it. I had to let it out so crazy. At the first meeting when you were before me in your best I thought of you as some little celestial angels coming down from Heaven in the form of little girls, and though I controlled myself I must be truthful and tell you I felt mighty at ease. And did you really care for me then when Penrod first told me of you or you of me?"

"We never thought of it in that way, as we hadn't seen you yet James, any more than you did before you saw us, but I know now that my father was right, and that we loved you all along with out knowing it and you too have shown your love of God more strongly than we had ever supposed. We saw evidence of that without your knowing it. My dear father and mother in that little note which I would not show to any one then told Penrod that they felt sure we would be very fond of you, and that if any time you should get fond of us, and ask for us to allow you our company for as long as life will allow it for you and us though they say because of our angel possession we will never die naturally but go to heaven some day alive nevertheless they at once gave their approval before hand, for they were sure that you would make us happy. Go they told Penrod and our two other brothers who if I'll come to them in battle would be the heads of the family, that I had their consent to keep you in our companionship for life."

It makes me and my sisters happy to know this. They talk of us being angel princesses and yet James if you were not really flesh and blood we would have mistaken you as one of them for all you have done for us. You pried us through an unseen danger which seemed impossible to escape. We never feared any perils we could see but unseen dangers is horrible. And yet here we are only to make our trip to Pandora as soon as the fleet get underway. God will reward you good for this."

"I am very glad too dear princesses," James said earnestly. "It is very satisfactory for you and your sisters, and it is very pleasant to me to know that they had such a very good opinion of me, and that they were ready to trust you to me and your sisters too. As she said suddenly, "that was what was in that small note with the letter I wrote a little at the time, for some how after that you were a little different with me and so were your sisters. I was not asleep one night and saw you come quietly into the room and stand by my bed for a long time with your sisters looking down at me. I thought at first angels came to visit me. Still I wondered over it for some time for each of you stooped and imparted a kiss on my cheek, and, certainly was not then guessing the truth."

"We could not help feeling a little different," Jennie said shyly. "We never thought of it before, and though I am sure it made us happy, I could not feel anything else with you especially as I knew that for a time you really could not believe we were real. We are so strangely placed, and it made it easier for you to think we were really celestial, and I felt sure you would not speak until we were safely in Pad Pandora and we were again in Penrod's care. But," she said with a little laugh though there were tears in her eyes, "you were nearly letting it out that evening in the cottage that you loved us, when so felt so despairing."

"Very nearly Jennie, I did so want comfort when it looked as if I could not succeed in bringing you and your sisters safely through. It wasn't for myself though, but for you."

And so they talked happily for about an hour.

"I wonder why Mr. Aldolphie doesn't come from his bunk house on board this ship," James said at last, and that he doesn't come to the boat. There were several more things he wanted to say to it. Why then he is calling from the Admiral's cabin. Surely it can't be very long time so soon; but that's what he says. It doesn't seem an hour since breakfast."

Jennie hurried on into the room first where her sisters were.

"Why Aldolphie," James said to the old sailor who was waiting outside for him, "thought you were going on with your boat."

"So I was my boy, but my wife told me I should only be in the way."

"In the way," James repeated in surprise.

"Ah James," Aldolphie said with a twinkle in his eye, "I hope you have not been deceiving us. My wife saw it in a moment when the little princess came to breakfast. A mere friend of the princesses," she said to me when you want out, don't tell me. You mean James loves them more than a brother does his sister. Just mere friends between boys and girls don't look at each other like that. Why one could see it with half an eye."

"Your wife is right Aldolphie," I do love those poor little girls with all my heart and who couldn't. You know I am really an American. She and her sisters had the old nurse with them till the latter took ill some few days back and is still being taken care of. They by their ways have made me love them and I couldn't help it, and they deserve the love of any one."

"Quite right James my boy, and my wife and I are glad to see that you love those little angels, and that after all you have asked for those pretty little angels you and they are going to be happy together and your companionship with you will send Penrod too will be a happy one. My wife was not surprised. Women are sharper than men in these matters, and she said to me when she heard you were going to save them, I would never Aldolphie that these little girls love James and he loves them. Boys and men will do a great deal for their sister but I never heard of a man or boy throwing away his life as he is going to do on the mere chance of saving one unless he loves his sister more than a man loves the girl he fell in love with."

"I should have done just the same had it been one of my sisters," James said a little indignantly. "I'd frustrate those dirty snam snakes from getting hold of any decent creature. I hate those Glandelinians and their accursed cause."

"Perhaps you would my boy, I do not say no," the sailor said shaking his head. "But brothers often do not so do so and if they did they sure love their sisters more than brothers usually do. For instance with Penrod's go through hell to save them from harm."

A stop was put to the conversation by the Red Cross Nurse putting her head outside the door of the Admiral's cabin and demanding excitedly what they were stopping. Thinking there for when they were keeping the rest waiting for the them and the dinner was getting cold....2.2.222222

After dinner Aldolphie's life came in to see Jennie.

"Ah dear princesses," the woman said as she embraced Jennie with tears in her noble eyes. "How thank full I am to our Dear Blessed Lord to see you again, and know you sisters are safe, for, was in to see them while you had your dinner. But oh how I have never thought I'd do so. My heart almost stopped beating yesterday when I heard the guns roaring and so many explosions of shells and big gun thunders. I and my little one were on our knees praying to the good God for the dear little angels who had saved her life. Aldolphie had spoken hope fully, but it hardly seemed to me that it could be, and when he sent back the news after that you had been safe on the ship and that even you needed not the use of the hatch, and that through James the forts were forced to give in, I could scarcely believe it was true."

"And I must thank you also with the Good God princesses," Aldolphie said for saving the life of the little one and your sisters too who had a hand in it. I never expected to see her alive again, and when the large made fast to the war ship what I saw was deathly afraid to go home for fear I'd hear she was dead, and my wife to go with grief, and I hung about till Martha had heard we were in, and came down to me with Aggie in her arms, looking herself again. Ah princesses and your dear sisters, you cannot tell how my heart leaped with joy and how I felt when Martha told me how much you and your sisters have done for us and how glad I was when she told me there was a way of paying some part of my debt to you and they. I went in to see them and though they are languid they are easier and happier and spoke beautifully of James who had done a lot for you and them."

"You have been able to pay more than your debt," Jennie said gently. "If I and my sisters have saved one life, you have helped to save eight."

"Who shall only be quit a princess, for what would Martha's life and mine be after you saved our child if you and your sisters had died and the brave boy too. I am not a fisherman as you may have thought but a naval officer and was on shore leave for a time and took up fisherman work during that time for my wife. See that ship over yonder that man of war I'm its captain. What makes it safest for you is there are fresh notices stuck up within the Christian lines warning all officers of the army not to allow any one who has not the pass papers from crossing the river to the ships, and warnings to capture captives and other, fishermen and others to arrest all strangers who try to get on ships without government papers permitting them to do so, and it is a lot of red tape getting those papers too believe me, and also for anyone assisting the enemies of Abbie and you little girls to escape across the river is death."

"That is rather making it easier for us," said James "and serious for the spies."

"It makes it much better for you and the princesses," Aldolphie replied confidently. "After all what spies have tried to do and after yesterday's work with the battle there is not a sailor or fisherman in the port but would do all he could to help you little girls escape from the hands of the butchers and spies and as you are on board this gigantic floating fleet of this victorious fleet you can expect an easy undisturbed trip to Pandora a starting to move now as the fleet will need to go in for repairs and have means made to allow the other ship out of the river which can be easily done. You may be sure the sailors on board this ship and the whole fleet will do their best for you and the brave boy. The Admiral has gladly made the agreement before the battle came and he is a man of his word, and he started the big fight against the forts and the shore batteries so the passage to Pandora can be made and besides he hates the Glandelinians for in some massacre his wife and children were most brutally killed. A captain who is a friend of mine on board the ship that rescued you and the little girl you saved with the despatch lost his home and family in the Abbie's harbor. As for you my boy as long as you are on the ship you will remain a midshipman. He has thought the matter over you see, and I can tell you that the Admiral does it more because he too loves the princesses, and he won't take a cent of money. The day before he would give me no answer about whether he would accept the money or not. Then he said he would take you and them without a penny. He should never sleep again if owing to him you and the little boy fell into the hands of these monsters. Go you see he is in it heart and soul."

After half an hour's talk Aldolphie and Martha took their leave of the big Christian man of war. Both at first refused the reward which James had proffered but James insisted stubbornly, and at last Jennie said:

"You can refuse for yourselves, but you will make me and my sisters unhappy if you do not take it. Put it by for Aggie—it will swell her heart when she hears it and will set her husband up in a good fishing boat or schooner if she takes to river sailing."

The men formed in line and the officer read out the names though he looked intensely surprised as James answered to that of the Midshipman.
"That's all right so far," the other said. "Now I will according to the order."

"If you have no objection to tell me, I should indeed." The admiral replied. "I have been wondering all the time how you young children escaped so many unseen dangers within the very christian lines under France and at Love Frey, and how you came to be at Love Frey, where as Adolphe tells me the little princesses were sure an els among the poor refugees, and that you yourself was a member of the Child Safety Welfare Committee, that seemed to me the most extraordinary of all, but, wouldn't ask any questions until you yourself

"I was too excited to sleep any longer," said the boy. "And I thought it was my duty to be on hand to stop the ship when she cleared out at Panto-n. We hoped to reach by night. But I was somewhat nervous too last night Aldolphie. Though I went to bed early, I didn't get to sleep right away and somewhere I heard lots

"Ah well Aldephoin I'm going to serve on the boy scout troop as long as I remain a boy. I expect that we may see or have a chance of seeing some more of the old fighters soon near Pando-n. There are a few of them but they are very few indeed."

"I've sighted the lieutenant said to me standing up and making a trumpet with his hands," so a craft together round the point of a river inland some few miles down the river, and by their looks I think that one is that old child here, and the other an excursion steamer of some kind she had captured."

The Glandelinian raider was lying between us and the burning steamer so that while Harpagon stood out against the glare of light we must have been invisible to him. The word was passed quickly forward for the men to go to quarters and they obeyed. Every gun was double-shotted and run out, and then all being ready for the fight, the men stripped to their waists, cut lusses and boarding planks ready to hand, and we waited with breathless anxiety. We were already within easy range of our bow chasers as they came the smaller guns, and as yet there was no sign that the Glandelinian raider was conscious of our presence. The boats were now near him, and no doubt those on board were looking after in that direction than to windward.

by steam, and, I do think that sharp as we were on board the Alert, the Childhater was even quicker in getting under canvas--we were scarce a quarter of a mile from her when she got fairly underway and started to out distance us. I got to this moment not a gun had been fired, save the two bow chasers, as the moment had not arrived for us to allow to jaw her. Then round she came and poured a dreadful broadside into the Child Hater. Orders had been given to fire high, and every man was on his mettle. The main top mast of the Child Hater fell snapped at the base, and at the cup simultaneously, the smoke stacks were knocked from their fastenings, the cabin was demolished, the peak halyards of the mizen were shot away, and a good number of holes were drilled through her sails, while one shot curried away a whole gull like a kite. A loud cheer broke forth from our men. But as the Child Hater was still sufficiently crippled now to prevent her from heaving to, and at last she was to show whether she could fight as well as run, and I must say for her she did. After ten minutes of it The Alert's broadside did us as much bruised and battered as if she had been fighting; against a ship of her own kind for about three hours. As we had not been idle and no one who had been principally directed against the enemy, thinking for she might have sailed away before we had, and we didn't want to incur

A lert to b b b brought alongside h e child Hate. There was no need to call upon the boarders to be ready. Very man was p-p-pur ad, and as the vessels came along side, we could hear in the lower part of the ship lots of child ren girls and bows screaming in f right and terror. Our men rushed to the assault. The screaming of the child ren put unbounded fury in them, but the c-w of the child hate were as eager to board us as we were them, and upon the very bulwarks a most desperate bloody conflict ensued. Strong as we were in numbers, the

All hands were at work next day getting aboard another frigate, while men were sent on board ours to repair damages. I was up aloft on the new ship, when I saw a large broken boat floating down the river which at once attracted my attention. It seemed to me like a river schooner, and it seemed to have something in quite a number cluttering its decks which at times seemed almost awash. It slid down to the quarter decks, and gave orders for the lowering of a boat and reporting what I had seen to the crew, and soon was being rowed toward the schooner we managed to board it and were shocked at what we had seen. On the decks were a great number of half naked children, half starved, their bodies covered with sores and many were even ill, now they got to be on this wreck of a schooner and how the schooner got to be in that condition we knew knew, but the belief was that it may have been a ship attacked by the raiders which finding children on board only must have brought purposely this condition of the ship and the children and having killed their guardians, evidently the God God had watched over this ship and its little crew of children.

The old Captian was silent, and James also was quiet some time before a he

"Well A Aldolphie you sure made some achievement in that capture. I heard great firing down the river that night, and the whole fleet was alerted but we couldn't then make out what it was. No one too could have been a better friend to the little girls and me than you have been, and as it isn't likely likely now that I shall ever hit upon a clew which could lead me to discover who killed my little brother and girl friend of mine, I shall continue to make my search."

They talked the matter over for some time, and then James changed the subject. "Are all our friends who helped us well?" James asked.

"All except poor Tom Jendon. He was hit by a shot during the land battle, and his wife poor old soul is gone to some friends in Galverha and doesn't know it yet."

"That is too bad. But who are the worst spies among the enemy that I should have to watch out for and dread the most?"

"The Mutt and Jeff spies."

"What? Are they around this neighborhood?"

"No, it is said he operates for Hanley and his Confederate states, but they are sometimes within one or two of a Christian army trying to learn plans and things. All Christian generals have their eyes on both, and believe that some day they will catch the two of them or kill them one or the other, but but they certainly are slippery. It would be a good day for the whole Christian cause if they could do so, for he and his companion do a lot of harm to the Christian armies. They look more like foragers than Glandelinians."

"It's a curious thing Aldolphie that the two International Spies should be coming backwards and forwards to any Christian army and wonder that the Gemini don't inquire into it."

"I don't suppose that they know much about it James. They come off and on, generally arriving at night, and leaving a few hours afterwards. I hear about these things because it is a talk every where. I don't like the going on by these spies, I must say and consider they will and badly, however it is no business of ours and as the spies are a resort of humane any how and never bother the Vivian Girl princesses, I don't care so far. The wind is rising fast. I think we are in for a storm."

It was as Aldolphie said. The clouds were gathering fast in the sky, the waves were breaking with a short sharp sound against the moving ships, and everything showed that a morning thunder storm was fast approaching.

"What time must you leave James?"

"As soon as the ship will reach Pandora which will be to night. Violet and her sisters are more anxious to get there now we are so near." Just as soon (not a coo on the spoon) as he finished speaking he and Aldolphie were aroused by an order shouted down across the deck for all hands to come on deck, and hurrying on with the rest found that it was beginning to rain. To James surprise he found that those on deck had already lowered the great lug sails, and that the decks were cleared for action and every man was at the guns. He looked into the cabin and saw that Violet and her sisters were at still asleep.

"What is it Admiral?" he asked.

"There are masts of some big ship there I don't like." The admiral said.

"Is it I am not mistaken that is a Glandelinian war dog a big steel sailless enemy battle ship. We would be no match to her in a fight for one of her guns could blow us out of the water."

There were a number of sails in sight, but the ship to which the Admiral pointed was crossing ahead of the Abbeianian frigate and had the masts that we see now edging on a great American battle ship of the enormous dreadnaught type. The ship was flying the Royal Flag of Glane Glandelinia so it seemed her hull or any length of her could not be seen she was so far down the river, and indeed from the deck only her big revolving gun turrets, long cabin and royal flags were visible above the water.

"I hope she will not see us." The Admiral said. "Our whole fleet couldn't cope with her and had she come to the rescue of the forts and batteries when we were engaged it would have been all up with us and the little girls too. We are low in the water and our stump masts could not be seen at that distance, even by a look out at the mast head. We are already some what astern of her, and we hope every minute will take her further away. If she does not see us in a quarter of an hour, we shall be safe. If she does there is nothing for it but our first to run back toward our own base. We should have such a long start even with all our sails that with this wind she would never catch us even if she had full steam on. By the smoke coming from her four smoke stacks she must have plenty of coal on. But if she was in case of us she may fire her great nine inch guns and get us even at a ten mile range as those guns hurl missiles that far. There are a dozen of them watching on different part of the river. She is our worst peril."

James kept an eye anxiously upon the big dreadnaught, wishing intuitively that wishing in his heart that it had been an American or an Abbeianian instead of an enemy, but she steamed steadily on, and in half an hour the sails were were again hoisted and the Averger proceeded on her way. The little girls soon however came on deck having been awakened by the excitement of the danger from the Glandelinian dreadnaught and the Admiral had some cushions placed for them under the eaves of the bulwark, for although the rain had slackened up it might still come on again.

"Are we beyond danger now?" So was Faisy's first question as James took his seat between her and her sisters.

"Beyond all danger of being overtaken by unseen spies—that is to say beyond all danger of meeting with any such spies as we ran away from. There is only one chance against us."

"And what is that James dear?" Violet asked.

"It is a serious one if we do not look out." James said. "We will have to look out that even our fleet don't run upon a Glandelinian war dreadnaught. There was one within sight a few minutes ago. I didn't think they were on the river. The Admiral said he thought that we would have to run off and go back away to the naval base. But even then we should soon be turned. Besides I have no doubt that the Admiral would let us have a boat so that we could get ashore in that anywhere near Pandora."

"I don't think that would be a good plan." Jennie herself said. "Because we might be picked up by the crew of the enemy dreadnaught or run down by it and killed, and too we have a long way to reach the shore and with so many unseen foes around, would not like to risk it on the water in a row boat. No I think it will be better to stay on board James dear, for as you say if she does have to run away for a time, she is sure to come back again to fetch us to Pandora."

But of course do what ever you think best. But the Admiral could not escape even if he had good speed and a lead on the dreadnaught, for she could easily reach us with one of her big nine inch turret guns."

"I think your view is of the best Jennie, however I hope the danger will not occur, and that the Averger and her fleet can put into Pandora a big river port without interference. The Admiral had told me he is making for a point near the main wharves and that since he signalled he is expected. Of course he could not say the exact hour he would be there, but he had signalled them the day on which if he could get us on board he should sail, and they will be looking for him."

Before ten o'clock the first parts of the big city was visible.

"We could not have timed it better." The Admiral said.

Every sail and every ship mast was now scrutinized by the Admiral through his glass, but he saw nothing that looked suspicious. At nine o'clock in the morning just as soon as Violet, and her sisters had finished their unusually late breakfast and which was a good one, the ship was within three miles of the city...

"Get the signal flags ready." The Admiral ordered, and three minutes later three signal flags were obediently hoisted, one above the other. Almost a minute later one signal flag was shown in answer.

"There is our answer." The Admiral said. "We are safe to go on. The signal means that the revenue men are on the loi lookout for us and will lead us to the city."

"They are always on the look out are they not?" James asked.

"Yes indeed." The Admiral said, "and a good thing too. Glandelinians have tried often to throw them off the scent but to no avail. A run always is made along the coast on both sides for more than ten or twenty miles by our submarines which are a terror even to that monster we avoided a little while ago. Christian spies watch out for any sort of Glandelinian craft near Pandora. Pandora and they will take the utmost care that this comes to the ears of the revenue officers. Then to foul the enemy a mere fishing boat will go out and show some lights two miles off shore named at the point named, and a rocket will be sent up from the cliff. That will convince them that the news is true, and the revenue officers will hurry away in that direction with every boat and man they can get together. That is why it is so easy for us to run into Pandora now. There will be plenty of marines there on the big wharf waiting for us. This is a can't go wrong for many of the Christian revenue officers are not to be fooled for none of the Glandelinians have ever succeeded in getting past them yet. We will soon be at Pandora. The coast is clear. We will take her in as close as we can go, the less distance there is for you to row the better. And I know Emperor Vivian will surely be glad to see you my boy."

The war frigate was run in until within a hundred yards off the shore, then a light anchor was dropped. The two boats had already been lowered and were towed alongside.

"Go you go into the first boat James, with the princesses." The admiral said. "The money you are ashore the better. There is no danger of a being disturbed however but you need to get the little girls to the right place as soon as possible. I hope you are not far from here at this locality." James at once handed over the amount promised as payment for the passage. There was a hearty good bye said to Aldolphie, who was again thanked most warmly for the services he had rendered, and he was even kissed by the little girls. Then James handed the little girls into the boat which was by this time ready to be lowered and in five minutes they went ashore.

"Thank our Dear-Blessed Lord and His Mother!" He exclaimed, as after wading through the shallow water he stood on shore; while two of the sailors carried each of the little girls and put them beside them on the wharf. "Thank God and His Blessed Mother! I have got you safe in to Pandora at last. I began to despair at one time. But Princesses! I hope you'll remain with your fathers army always now. It is safe."

"Thank God and His Blessed Mother in deed," Violet and her sisters together said most reverently. "But we having had many desperate chances never quite despaired of you as peculiarly as you were our Guardian angel. It always seems to us for every thing we do and go through He had always miraculously protected us through so many dangers seemingly impossible to escape from, that He must mean that we should go safely through them all even in the far distant future, and yet it did seem hopeless at this time. Unseen dangers are the worst to face."

"We had better stand on one side princesses or rather we had better push on across the wharf until we reach a means to get a street car. These men are all too busy to notice any of us and you might accidentally get knocked down. So let us find our way to the street I'm thinking of."

But they had difficulty in making their way across the immense wharf, for the path was so filled with men carrying all sorts of materials for the ships and too the wharf had lots of boxes standing in huge piles. At last they got beyond the wharf. One of the wagons was already near, and was on the point of driving off, when James asked the man if he could tell him of any hotel near, where the princesses who had landed with him could pass the night.

"Little angels you mean," said the man looking at them with awe. "You have angels with you. But if you don't like to walk that far I'll take you down to the nearest hotel. But are you sure they're human?" pointing to the little girls.

"Sure we are," cried Violet. "We are not ghost or spirits. We are the ones known by all the country as the 'CDarlings of the Nation.'"

"First time I ever heard of it," said the man. "If you are so pretty then what do the Vivian girls Princesses look like whom I heard so much of. I'd give anything to have them for only a mile on my wagon."

"Well then you may have that favor for us then," said Joyce. "The man was evidently astonished, and he let them mount most graciously, and in three quarters of an hour the cart or wagon drove up at a tall handsome looking building. They tried to make him take payment but he was stubborn saying he would be glad to accommodate them for nothing at any time. Then James went up to the proprietress of the Hotel.

"The man looked strangely at Violet and her sisters.

"Who have you got there?" The hotel manager asked as James brought them forward to his counter.

"These are seven little girls who were on the Edgemoor Fugate with Admiral Johnston. James recalled. "They have had a narrow escape from being murdered or assassinated by unseen Glandelinian spies, and have gone through a terrible time. As my home is too far away to travel by night I thought perhaps you would kindly give us a couple of rooms till morning."

"Give a couple of rooms boys. Sure I will. You have the Vivian girls with you?" recognized them at a glance. "What luck you have boy in defending them for you are in the news papers throughout the nation and I know you too. You are James Andrew's third guardian, and wait until Penrod sees you my lad. That is a caption you will receive. Get in the room on the third floor. Room Number 110. The whole city has prayed night and day, Masses were said in all the Churches for the escape of the little girls and you from those bloody minded Glandelinian spies in general Hances and Garby's Christian armies. And you have won. Now there'll be many more Masses and prayers of thanksgiving and an office in offerings too."

A hotel boy was at once ordered to do what he could for them. The boy at once but with an awe of face came forward and received the little girls and James too most kindly. First in the hotel they had a good meal and the best they had since the war broke out, and every one in the great cafeteria were touched to tears by the piety by which the little girls said prayers said their graces before and after meals.

The next morning the proprietress wouldn't take anything either, but slyly without being seen because Violet is sick that way she slipped the money into his pocket when he didn't notice and when she was out the last one. Then in a store they thought better dresses than they had on and took their places in the street which was to take them on Central Street where James lived.

Then James while on the street car said: "I have a sort of confession to make Jennie. Though I'll go on all right I'm kind of shy about going home with you little girls." "Why?" Asked Violet. "Wouldn't your father care much about it us being there?" "Oh that isn't it," James said sort of blushing. "But I got word from the Admiral before I left the ship, for he called me aside and said; James I didn't intend to tell you this until you leave. Don't be too shy or embarrassed when you get home, but your father's home because of your goodness to your little princesses friends is paper over Vivian's headquarters in Pandora and Penrod too is there and as your father's yard is immense a child scout troop is encamped there. Also Penrod's two brothers and general Jack Evans is even there. So you see you are greatly honored my boy. But Jennie I'm at a loss what to say and so when I get there I'm not afraid, but at a loss at meeting such great people like your father and your own brothers."

"Your news does not surprise me James for I wrote them to do that."

"You wrote to them to do it?" "Yes. I and my sisters had a feeling all along that you would be glad to meet with them but we were from modesty keeping it from us. You spoke so often of them and of Penrod particularly and when you did it seemed to me that what you said was spoken so earnestly. We would not ask because I was sure you had a good reason for not telling us then, but I was sure there was something. There is no need to be embarrassed when you meet them for despite their rank they claim themselves as equal to any one else, and for heavens sake James when you meet them do so like you do us your ordinary friends. Don't bow as they want God only bowed to. If you like you may salute but don't bow. If you do they'll laugh at you."

"I thought it better not to say anything until the danger was over," said James. In the first place you little girls had need of all your courage and strength in the next place it was possible that we might never reach Pandora, and in that case we would have had to try some other place. But I did not see that I did anything to be so honored by your father taking my home as his headquarters. All I did was pull you through the danger, the soldiers did the rest."

"How thoughtful you are James. Violet murmured throwing her arms around his neck and kissing him. "Oh how much we owe you. But how can we pay excepting by being your companions for life as you desired since you love us now so well and deserved to be loved in return. If you didn't have parents we'd make you our brothers. And how strange and happy we are now, not lonely any more and even Gertrude Argeline is over here. We saw that in the papers in the hotel."

"I know you would not feel lonely long," said James fondly returning the embraces and I can promise you too that before you have been long at my mother's place you will with your sisters feel like one of the family."

"Yes but we could not be on of the family," said Violet. "No but mother and father will look upon you as if you were her daughters and wait until you see my sister. The girls here is where we get off."

"The girls here is where we get off."

"The girls here is where we get off."

"The girls here is where we get off."

"The girls here is where we get off."

"The girls here is where we get off."

"The girls here is where we get off."

"The girls here is where we get off."

"The girls here is where we get off."

"The girls here is where we get off."

"The girls here is where we get off."

"The girls here is where we get off."

"The girls here is where we get off."

"The girls here is where we get off."

"The girls here is where we get off."

"The girls here is where we get off."

"The girls here is where we get off."

"The girls here is where we get off."

"One added as he bowed boys and girls pressed round to shake hands with the newcomers. You will get accustomed to their presence and like them too. Do you little princesses speak English?"

"Yes, we learned it and can also read it!" Jennie said. "Thank you Madame for giving us so kindly, for we have gone through plenty of trouble in the world." "Mrs. Andrews saw the little girls lip quiver, and some of the children shouted; 'It ain't right, James, when we saw in the news papers what they suffered, right away we became scouts. We only got home on furlough to day.'"

Putting aside her longing to talk to her son Mrs. Andrews said; "James do take your brothers and sisters out in the garden for a short time. They are all talking talking at once and this is a perfect baffle." And thus having cleared the room, she sat down to talk to the seven little girls and soon made them feel at home with her by her unaffected kindness. Violet and her sisters were then shown through the rooms, and there was complete evidence there that four of the room were occupied by indeed the highest ranked persons of all, and they at most recognized the very things. Father and the brothers as and also the mother were here. and oh they wished they could be communicated with. Mr. Andrews soon came afterwards and ran out to the excited happy chatting group in the garden, and after ten minutes happy talk with him James finally managed to get in the words he tried to say and spoke to him of the visitors who were closeted with his mother.

"I want you to make them feel it is the home for the time they are with us father. They will make of being a burden upon me peculiarly will; will be little angels to us, for they are worth more than all the jewelry and money the world can give in an eternity."

"Of course I know that," Mr. Andrews said seeing that as you know they were consigned to me, and the emperor before he came here wrote to me to act as his agent. Had he not to wonder what would become of them and you for I was by no means sure that the little girls had not perished as well as youself."

"They have not perished. They are here safe and sound. They think I am a hero father," and he winked his eye.

"In that case they will be well off for the emperor knows what happened right along. And surely my lad you do a great deal in capturing that despot. You must have gone through a good deal my son. You are scarcely ten, and you look three or four years older."

"I shall look young again father, now I have got my mind clear of anxiety. put they had a trying time of it, I can tell you, but it is too long a story to go into now, and I will tell you all the whole yarn this evening. I want you to go in with me now to the princesses and make them at home until the emperor returns with his gallant sons. I wish they were here for how I love to read their brother's. All this was not so trying for me father for, stood it all pretty good but it cut me to the heart like a knife for every tear I saw in their eyes."

The young ones who were now better behaving as their good excitement had died down were invited to follow and after an hour spent with his parents and the princesses in the dining room at a good dinner James was pleased to see that the latter were already at their ease and that the strange newness was wearing off. The younger brothers and sisters of James all through the dinner eyed the princesses as if they were looking upon angels instead of human beings and they too had within their hearts a surge of love and respect.

During the conversation about what had been going out the eldest of James sister took on an angry insolent look and said sharply;

"I'd like to see the Glandelinians treat me that way. I'd do some of my American things to them. We Americans don't stand things like that, and especially when we're Irish. We are fighters to the truth and true. I'll show them something yet since I'm a girl scout now."

"We give them all that they are looking for when we have the chance" said Joice. "We Abbeinnians don't take anything from the enemy either. We are not suppose to do so because it would be a sin. If I seen an opportunity to kill a rascally Glandelinian at his dirty work and only took him a prisoner I would sin, but we do not give quarter."

A little after dinner James father desired that the little girls should lie down for a while to get rid of the strain that was still upon them, for Mrs. Andrews saw that they required quiet and rest, and so took the little girls up to the bedroom prepared for them. As long as the strain was upon them the little girls had borne themselves bravely, and now that it was over Mrs. Andrews feared that if they didn't rest they would collapse.

So they took the advice and laid down on the beds for the afternoon the good woman saying;

"When your parents and brothers come I will call you up. You must be in a fit condition to meet them."

After the little girls had gone off to bed for the afternoon James said to his father and mother privately;

"I have another piece of news to tell you now. I am afraid you may think it rather absurd at my age and for what my own nationality in blood is supposed to be, without a profession of anything else, but I love the Vivian Girls princesses because they are such good little girls, and to leave their company now would be like leaving a bread knife for me and them. You see" he went on as his parents and brothers and sisters either uttered their exclamation or looked their surprise "we have gone through a tremendous lot together, and when people have to look death in the face every day from unseen sources it makes them seem older than they are, and when as is in this case they have to depend entirely upon themselves it brings them very closely together. I think it might have been so had these troubles to them never come on, for some how I and the little girls have taken very much to each other. Through some cause their father, mother and brothers saw it before I knew it myself, and upon the night before brothers and sisters were separated told the little girl Violet that, should I ever ask for the permanent companionship of the princesses, they approved of them doing so. That would mean father when the war is over we would live in their palace. But although after I came to love them with all my heart I should never have spoken had it not been that I did so when it seemed during the battle that in five minutes we should neither of us be alive. You could never understand what kind of little girls they were. It would take me a lot of explain."

They can't look at a Crucifix without tears coming to their eyes copiously, and once when without thinking I once suggested that some day they could see a famous Passion play, which I could take them to, and they cried so bitterly I felt I had insulted them. But it was the thought of our Lord's passion. I have always felt queer myself when I went to Passion plays and couldn't sleep for night afterwards but never like that. I could never imagine little girls so good, so generous, so pious and holy and lovable. They love their parents and brothers immensely but God they love far better. They too are really angel possessed father and I believe the angels are the ones who because I shielded them helped me accomplish the seeming impossible I have seen the symptoms of it, and perhaps you have noticed a certain perfume odor coming from them."

I could never find the perfume that gives that fragrance and I've sampled all the perfumes there is on the market. They have despite their troubles done a lot for unfortunate refugees, and relieved help the cause through them. That is the cause, not the prettiness that made me love them. At the first meeting of them I was kind of scared because they sure did look very unnatural. There is a sort of transfiguration about them that I no one can understand, if it had not been for that I should have first brought them home and then told them that I desired their companionship. That is the only reward I asked for their pay, and I'll get even with the enemy for making them suffer as they did. I'll never forgive."

"I do not blame you James my boy, and in this case it would be a sin for you to forgive those dirty snakes. I'm a foreigner but I hate these Glandelinians like potent poison," his father said heartily. "Of course you are no foreigner to the Abbeinnians now after what you did for them and neither am I since a month ago I became an Abbeinnian citizen. I can see that the little princesses are girls of no ordinary character, they're literal angels in human form, and it is certain for their well deserved happiness that being here with us and that their father, mother and others are here they will surely feel that they are at home. I noticed the perfume the moment I came in to see them and knew that it was strange. I asked them whether they were using perfume and they said they usually do but had not had a chance for nearly five months. Personally they are certainly pretty, especially Jennie, Joice, Violet and Angelina. Catherine, Gene Genevieve who is called Hettie, and that out little Daisy bell though their other sisters certainly break all record records too, and you can be considered a lucky little boy to be their constant companion. There is no mistaken the fact that they are angel possessed. I wouldn't call them exactly that. I don't hardly believe they're really angels possessed. I believe they're very angels themselves especially they act it. I've heard of angels assuming children forms to comfort very good couples and this may be so here. If they are really little girls possessed of angels you may wonder then how they can come through to suffer all this. Unless God wills it the angels can't do anything to save them from suffering, and can though save them from dangers impossible to escape from without their help. The angels James if you were unable to save them would have stuck for their sake and your behalf so that you would not have needed to worry for when they possess children, they may for the glory and honor of God permit suffering if it has to come but will allow no personal harm as God would not allow it either. That is why He possesses the child with angels on these occasions. It is like the child and the angels are one. So when you did this for the little girls you were entertaining and doing work for angels unawares. And the angels will certainly reward you, and did already in one way by having you succeed. What do you say

"Mother!" To his wife.

"I say God bless them all," Mrs. Andrews said cheerfully. "After the way in which Our Blessed Lord has brought them together, there can be no doubt that they were meant to have this blessing."

"Do you know I half-guessed there was something more than mere gratitude in them when they were at dinner did you not Mother?"

Mrs. Andrews nodded and smiled. "I was sure there was" she said.

"I did not say anything about it when we came in," James said, "because I thought it better that the little angels should have one quiet afternoon, and you know the young ones will feel great at the idea of me being the constant companions of the princesses, though maybe they'll be a little jealous too."

"Never, your mind James," his father said. "Let those laugh that win."

"I won," said James with a twinkle in his eyes.

"And you still intend to remain in the boy scout troop as their aide camp James?"

"Yes father, I have seen enough for the rest of my life, to get even with the enemy for all I have been thinking it over a good deal, and I have determined to learn many a boy and girl about the American ways of doing scouting work. Then when that is completed I'll have my revenge. I'll open the enemy's eyes and let them know who they were trying to make a fool of."

"That's right my boy," Dr. J. Andrews said heartily. "I had always regretted that at first you never had had a fancy for the child scout army, for I used to look forward to your becoming some great boy scout leader a right hand, your brothers and sisters too to the profession since you were away and instead of being ruined have done the training and are leaders of a number of regiments who sure now can do wonders. You have made me very happy James and your mother too for what you have done for these very good little princesses and God too is happy. Happy and also the angels. It will be delightful for us to have you and your little princess friends always together, will it not mother?"

"It will indeed," Mrs. Andrews said in a tone of deep happiness. "Put go James dear and see who is ringing the doorbell."

"Surely dear mother I'll be glad to. But oh I wish it was Penrod."

As he reached the door again the bell rang again and this time as if the party was becoming a little impatient. James opened the door and then gasped.

"Penrod."

Penrod looked long at James as if he could not believe his eyes.

"Why James is it you?" said Penrod taking him heartily by the hand. "Gosh it seems like heaven to see you again. Back home without even us knowing it and he embraced and kissed James heartily. "My good living school chum. That is why I gave you the care of my little angel sisters while I was away. I heard lots about you. But did you finally come home alone?"

"You dear sister's are upstairs asleep in the bedroom," said James gladly. "Of course it won't hurt to bring you up to them. They will be oh so happy. But where is your father and the others?"

"Why they're in the Convention Hall holding a military council. I'll be glad to phone them as soon as my sisters are seen. Lead me to them James. I can't hardly wait to see them."

James and Penrod were soon at the door of the room, but there was no response to his knocking though he knocked three times and loudly too. He slowly opened the door and gave a gasp.

"Why they are sound asleep," he said. "Gosh I hate like heck to awaken them Penrod."

"No don't," said Penrod excitedly but in a whisper. "but in a whisper. He tip toed in and then stood by the three beds. The way they appeared there both boys were deeply moved, and after Penrod imparted a kiss on each of their foreheads with tears of joy in his eyes and then James was bidden to do the same they stole out. Suddenly Violet spoke out in her sleep.

"Penrod oh Penrod, I know James will help us save you again some day. Oh God what he has done for us and he says we don't deserve the crucial things done to us. He was so careful in disguise I'm sure."

Penrod couldn't say a word as he stood there unable and then he went out and they stood in the hall. Then they went out together where they then were alone Penrod gasped the boy by both sides and said:

"James I know it all. Nothing can be put over Jack Evans. He knows how to get communications from the most remote places. I can only say what my father, mother and two brothers would just give to see you. You have done more nobly for my sisters than I had ever expected, and God knows I'll reward you within the full extent of my power. Now don't say you don't deserve a reward. You can't refuse. I'll make you a prince in my father's brother's place and you, father and mother were glad to hear of it. And you'll be companion to my sisters for life. Don't try to say you don't deserve such an honor. You can't escape it. You have loved me fully and though I loved you before I love you much better now. And Jack Evans. He wishes to see you too. He believes you are his equal in a guardian ship, and will certainly do favor for you. He is proud of you James and so are too. What I heard Violet say in my sleep convinces me the full fact. You were like a guardian angel to them. It seems to be brought them through dangers you would not have done myself. And there were tears of gratitude in Penrod's eyes. "He continued. "Father must know first of all they and you are here. I'll phone them as soon as I can. I cover my emotion of gratitude. I almost believe you are an angel too to have brought them safely through those unseen perils. And then too to sink because the sinking of the enemy ships, capturing an important despatch which I made out myself, and got stolen from my hand parts, and winning the battle for the fleet. You are sure wonderful."

"But, but, -- it was not God that me who did it all it was Our Blessed Lord too," said James. "No -- you see I do not deserve all the credit."

"I know it, but you deserve a whole lot of it," said Penrod. "Don't think that my sisters couldn't get mail or telegraph through to me difficult as it seems."

Foxes are not as shy or as slick as they are. I've clever letters telling of things you did, and still have the letters to prove it. Either Jennie, Violet, or any one of my sisters wrote the letters. You did nobly when you saved Violet from death at the hands of her friends, when they mistook her for one of the secret Glendelinian spies who were trying to assassinate my sisters. I almost believe it was foolish of them to disguise within the Christian lines during that dreadful pick up of the many spies and I wrote them so. But Evans says that there is no one who did more for them than you did. I at first didn't believe the letters, nor the new papers and thought something was amiss. I can't understand yet how in the world you did it. It was a miracle pure and simple. Put here in my room where the phone is. I'm going to get Father on the phone phone."

"But ain't he too busy to be bothered?" protested James.

"He may be but he'll listen to me without provocation," said Penrod. "Besides I wasn't with him in the council. I got news too besides that of your return with them which he'll like to hear." Penrod then sat down as James closed the door. Penrod picked up the receiver for he knew it was the telephone number of the Convention Hall. He got the number in no time and soon on the other end came Hello!

"Is that Emperor-Vivian?"

"Yes, yes. Who is it that do you want?"

"This is my son Prince Penrod talking speaking. I have news for you. My good boy, friend James Peterson Andrews is here."

"What's that?" came excitedly from Emperor-Vivian. "James Andrews, the boy who did so much for my daughters. Thank God I'd like to see him. Where is he at in the city. Is he on the way?"

"No he is at home with his father and mother. Came home this morning. I was oh so glad to see him. And my sisters, your good brave little daughters are sleeping soundly upstairs. Go for Havens sake Father try and shorten the Convention and come home. Bring mother and my two brothers with you. Where is Uncle?"

"He's here too," said Emperor-Vivian. "At least he was. He's on his way there. Thank God again: I want to see my daughter and especially my little friend who did so much for them. You may expect mother any minute. She's gone with my brother Emperor-Hanson. They'll be surprised for they know nothing of it yet. I'll come try to be there at quarter of two. It's one now. Takes some time to get there you know. But I'll be there a son. Good by e."

"They'll be here, mother and my Uncle before Father as they're already on the way," said Penrod. "Evans will come with father. He's a Walter Sturving whom she also helped to save."

"He's with Angelina Aronberg."

"Good. And Timothy Croveton. You did a lot for him when he was wounded. He's been living with your father too. He'll be glad to see you, but he won't be back for several days unless I send for him, and that I'll do. He'll be glad to see you since you was so good as to save his life when attacked by that Glendelinian officer."

Then going to his desk he took out a bunch of letters.

"This is the letter that my sisters sent which is evidence that you did all they wrote for them" he said. "If you like, while we are waiting you will have my permission to read them. They won't care. But oh won't I take each of them in my arms when they are awake. They sure must have gone under a strain."

James indeed was astonished beyond measure by the details of the letters he cut off all, and slowly read, but there was one thing they did not write about and that was about the capture of the deserter from the enemy spy. James made mention of it, and Penrod asked:

"Why didn't you tell the little girl?"

"I was so busy watching them for their safety that I didn't think of it," said James. "Yet the same girl was the one who sent the news."

"I was the one who got the communications as Father and no one not even you present were home at the time," said Penrod. "The deserter was stolen from me by some spy out side in the distant camp, and I had no means by which to alter them or warn the commander of the fleet, and was there for a great loss. I was scared too believe me and when he came home a father couldn't do a thing either though he tried, and communicated with Hanson, and some of the great generals. You sure saved us from a great disaster, and caused the spies to leave the parish, and too saved that little girl from the second rails. She was the little daughter of the captain one of the ships. He's only six years old too."

"I was glad I saved the little girl," said James. "I-----"

"Oh James. Oh James."

It was the voice of little Daisy, for she and her sisters were in the room just opposite Penrod's. James put his finger to his mouth meaning to Penrod to keep quiet and not show himself for a moment and went out. Daisy was standing by the open doorway looking down the hall.

"Here I am," said James. "I heard you calling. Are your sisters awake?"

"Yes. I thought you were talking to some one in there. I heard voices and one sounded strangely familiar to it."

James motioned to her to go and look in. She hesitated for a moment and then walked cautiously to the door. She opened it and looked in. Then she gave a great scream of delight, and in another instant was held tight in the arms of her brother. Screaming happily to her sisters to come, that Penrod was here, the doorbell suddenly rang. At first so delighted were the three that they didn't hear it, and so James mother went to answer the doorbell. An orderly stood there.

Empress Vivian and Hanson just coming up," he said. "I see them." They were soon in and hearing a commotion upstairs as of little girls in great joy, they wondered what was up and Empress asked:

"What are those children doing up there and why are they so gay?"

"Your daughters have returned," said Mrs. Anderson lovingly and respectfully.

"My daughters. The Princesses. Thank God, and where is their friend and guardian James?"

"He's up there too. Penrod is there and the little girls just found it out."

Hanson and Empress Vivian were in such a hurry to get up the stairs that they nearly fell. The first one they met was James standing modestly by the door. Had they not known who he was by the picture in the paper they would have thought he was some one else and he peacefully passed him.

"Why?" said Mrs. Empress Vivian here is the little hero James," and she took him up into her arms and hugged and kissed him as if he was her own son, to his embarrassment but also delight. Then she went into the room and Hanson too, and then the happy scene was repeated. James of course came in at Penrod's command, and the door was closed.

"You sure were a great brave little lad," said Hanson himself as he seated James on his knee as if the boy were his own son. "Because of what you did I and my brother took possession of your home only as our headquarters to home you and your parents. Many would be glad indeed to have this honor of receiving us as their guests. But this happy reunion is not complete. I must call-----"

"I already did that," said Penrod. "Father said he would try to make it at quarters to two. He won't bother with a street car but will come in his own taxi he always rides. It may be slower but don't make any stops while the street car does here. Oh gosh I forgot to tell him what I discovered." "Oh never mind that now," said Violet happily. "You can tell him first thing when he comes."

"Yes it wouldn't do no good to phone now," said the Empress. "He must have started off right after you phoned him. It is near that time now. He may be here at any minute now. And Jack Evans. Wait till he sees you too my boy. Little he does a great in his eyes."

"My dear nephew was so jubilant over the fact that his dear little sisters were turned that he forgot the important news," said Hanson with a grin. "But why worry. It is just as important to you as to him."

"I couldn't help forget to get in," said Penrod. "Oh how cut a they looked as they lay sleeping in the room. And Violet dear did you have a dream when you lay there this afternoon?"

"Yes," she said. "How did you know?"

"Penrod told me about it," said Hanson. "He said it was a dream."

"I dreamed a little my experiences over again with James," said Violet. "If you came in why didn't you wake us?"

"I didn't want to spoil your rest," said Penrod. "And I wouldn't allow any one to do so. When my boy friend" he added to James "will you tell us what actually happened, and how you got my sisters through all that unseen peril." "I would like to but would rather let you and your parents all hear it first."

said James. "But your good little sisters sure had some awful experience but they escaped easily."

"Yes and but for you we probably would not have," said Violet. "You did it all."

"Yes, but in the end when I got discouraged and down hearted you helped too and so did your sisters."

"At you did most of it," said Catherine. "You know James with God's help nothing is impossible."

"Yes but I believe your dear little possession angels had a good deal to do with it too," said James. "And nobody can tell me you are not possessed by them. I see and have seen a few of the symptoms, and that nice fragrance also proves it for there is no perfume in the world like it. At least if there is you must know what it is and keep it secret."

"We don't keep it secret," said Angelina. "We have not had no perfume at all all for a long long time, until you gave us the whole big set you had sampled. And that we only used for incensing the Church with an an offering. We did not even know we gave off a strange fragrance, for we did not detect it. That is strange news to us. You don't detect anything do you Mother?"

"Yes I do," said the Empress.

"I do too," said the rest. "We always did but did not think of mentioning it, put you must know the strange condition you are in is true. I don't believe if it was really impossible to rescue you your little girls could come to harm anyway. It is a saying and it is or has been proven to be true. To kill an angel possessed child, you must first kill the angel."

"That's impossible," said Penrod. "An angel is a spirit."

"And you can rest easy about your sisters," said Hanson Vivian. "I'll bet my little noises in the long run will be instruments that the enemy will dread to face. God bless him time you know, and He'll then strike."

"I believe I hear the doorbell ringing," said Violet. "Gram I'm dreaming it. Wait. I want to surprise papa. James to hide for a moment. I'll go and open the door."

She left the room and went down stairs. As she was coming down the bell was ringing like mad now proving that it must have been rung for the last five minutes and no one was answering, so even James Father and mother and brothers and sisters had been in the same room and probably didn't hear it. He wondered exceedingly that Penrod who usually can hear a cat walking didn't hear the bell. He really did but at first thought it was all alarm clock and didn't pay any attention. Violet opened the door quickly and met Empress Vivian and Jack Evans face to face. Both of them couldn't hardly believe their eyes and thought they were seeing thin things.

"Why Violet dear is it you?" said Empress Vivian tears of joy coming to his eyes. "I almost gave you up for lost" and in an instant he had her lovingly in his arms. Evans too was equally as glad and in his heart thanked God most warmly. There was no need of asking Violet whether her sisters were also there for it would have been a foolish question. Here she would be so would be her sisters.

"Take me at once to them," said Empress Vivian joyfully.

And she joyfully led them up the steps and into the room. She opened the door and led the way, and it would take too long to tell of the joyful meeting here. It was sure a very happy reunion. As Empress Vivian and Evans didn't see any boy except Jack, Penrod they at first were astonished and Evans himself asked:

"How in the world did your little girls get here, safe and sound. I thought your boy friend James was with you."

Violet and her sisters giggled and then at their astonished looks produced the boy who was hiding behind Penrod. Penrod at their suggestion.

"Go this is the fine little hero," said the Empress taking him up in his arms too. Well well welcome home to my head quarters and your own home my boy. You have done nobly, and well I couldn't understand how it is but our nations newspapers are full of your good deeds, and strange too no paper ever got into the hands of the enemy either, but Manley knows I of it through spies.

You are the little guardian angel sure enough." Turning to his son he said proudly:

"Penrod my boy you did wisely when you choose your school chum friend to be the wake keeper in your place when you had to only temporarily leave them. You surely placed a good strong guardian over them. Did you really know that he could do all this for them?"

"I didn't expect all that. It is true," said Penrod. "He did much more than I ever hoped upon. But Father I have a confession to make. It is from my experience over there. Though we eat and do every thing and buildhouse almost also in the American way, American peoples are altogether different than we are here in Abbeinnia. It would be a dangerous country for a Glandelinian to go into and start some of his wicked ways. You can't put any thing over on Americans, and they're the most desperate fighters I ever saw. They can't be frustrated in any plans they make, or can't be frustrated in things they do. Here we defend girls nobly, whether they are girl friends or strangers, over there if a boy tries to do harm to a girl the lover, or a stranger will kill him or beat him up, so badly he'll be helpless for life. In a case like this with Glandelinians I'm afraid we Abbeinnians are too gentle. We ought to try some of the American ways in defense of my sisters. I'll bet then the Glandelinians will leave them alone. The fact that James carried through like he did is because he is an American. Only Americans can do that. I knew his qualities and when I had to leave them for a short time that in my mind and as I knew him well I decided to have him guard them for me until either they could return or they could come to me. I see I have not failed in my hope. And sister I don't want to say anything contrary to you but if you want to push your little friend he is a far better back shot than you or me combined. He can pump a one shot rifle as if it was a ten shot rifle. I've seen him do it. If you are with him out alone and thirty or forty Glandelinians chance after you, it will be they who are in peril and not you, and he's terrible at the pistol. He can shoot the smallest branch of a tree and it waving down in the wind too. I knew that and that is why, he chose him to be your protector for me."

"I can tell you all an experience I and my sisters had which makes us almost a little afraid of Americans until we come to know them," said Joice. "We went one day to spy on a certain number of big ranked Glandelinian generals, and we got almost surprised by them and had to save ourselves by hiding under their wide and long table. Just as we did so, three persons men who looked to be foreigners were brought in. Two of them I knew from a glance and so did my sisters to be German, and Irish, but that from their features they were decidedly American also. I wondered what they had done to be arrested by Glandelinian soldiers and finally they were accused of committing murder, before the chief general. Because they had in the short rest time possible during the moment they were fugitives of shooting down a whole platoon of Glandelinian soldiers on the back with one shot rifle. The other appeared to be some Latin Nationality though what he was I or my sisters could not tell. Of course we admired the German and the American, though we could not approve of the awful story; language they used, especially the American in his defiance to the Glandelinian generals. But he sure gave them a piece of his mind, that Irish man, whom I found out was a man called George John McGinn. Never had any of our followers ordered to say anything in back talk to enemy officers because they are dangerous when you do. Neither did we dare it after we learned lessons from experience. We were astonished and shocked when we heard what the American told the general. And one of them rose up white with anger. But McGinn being an American the general feared that what the American said would happen and I guess didn't doom him to a death that he threatened."

"What was the words he told the general?" asked the whole. "Why he told the general that if he was shot he would cause the Americans to be on our side in this war and that it can be proven there is no nation in the world that can lick the United States not even us either. Do you believe that is true Penrod?"

"I'm afraid I'll have to say yes," said Penrod. "The United States has licked other nations that could lick the world, and humbled those nations too. But there would be no danger of us ever waring together. The United States is nearly as good as us even though it has many prisons. Good night I, I rather be country to commit crimes. I've seen the prisons. Good night I, I rather be in a Glandelinian prison. Their prisons over there the reform criminals are are regular hells. The prisoners are never the same person when they do get free. Yes Glandelinia would find that the United States is a dangerous nation, and no doubt if that man you spoke about and his companion too were what shot without good reasons by the Glandelinians I believe Glandelinia would put her foot in hot water. Of course the Americans may have shot down that many men but if the two or three others also were in our uniform Glandelinia would not have any excuse for having them shot, not even if they were spies. Not especially when Glandelinia is the nation she is. I sure wish that country would fight on our side. It would be sure good for us. But it sure was a strong language. Joice Joice but in that cause it was no sin. Glandelinia and all of her contents sure deserve pardon. Put the Irishman Irishman sure had nerve to tell the Glandelinian generals that. Would you know that man if you saw him again?"

"Yes," said Violet. "We never forget faces. He got away and so did his two companions. They are impossible to be held I heard. He's a hard looking man, tough faced, a scolding expression as if Nature intended he should have it, and seems as powerful as an ox. When I heard what he did, and his German companion, I had the momentary fear of what could happen to us if that man McGinn was on the far side. Of all Glandelinians he could have gotten us at any time for we're nothing in shooting qualities to him if he did all that. Yet Thank God no American came fight on their side. Or we would be out of luck."

"Don't you worry," laughed Penrod. "They wouldn't. And don't think Clancy is an American either. He came from Ireland. He may be a good leader but it is said he couldn't catch a snail. I'm hoping to see the day sisters that one of you will show things to the list of Clancy's Glandelinian generals by popping him."

"Now James my boy," said Emperor-Vivian, "will you kindly tell us of your experience in saving my little daughter through the unseen dangers."

James then before the whole circle, even that of his own family who was there too in the room big sitting room related the adventure that they had gone through, subject however to a great many interruptions, from Violet, Jennie or another of her sisters.

"But I'm telling the story to you little girls dear, as I was asked," he said at last. "Some day when you feel better after your trying experiences you angels may give your version of it."

"But he is not telling it right father," Jennie protested, as the sisters mournfully shook their heads, as James. "He keeps all the best part a back. He says about the dangers, tells of what I did to save a little girl from dying of illness, what we did and what we are and how we were born born all our troubles and sorrows and fears, but he says nothing of what he did himself. Then she broke into Abbeinnian. "No father and dearest mother, it is not just, it is not right, I or my sisters will not suffer to have the tale told so. How can it be the true story when he says no word of his courage, of his devotion, of his helping us to save Violet, condemned to die before a firing squad as a spy or to be charged by general Nance, who mistook her for an enemy boy spy trying to kill us because she was disguised, and couldn't speak her natural voice, over of the way he watched over us, and cheered us, and kept away most of our grief, though he often too was very much down hearted for we could see it, no word of his grand heart, of the nobly way he risked his life for us, for his friend Walter Starvig, for all Oh Father and Mother and all here I can't tell you what we all owe to him," and Jennie who had risen to her feet in her earnestness, burst into passionate tears, and Penrod who was standing near took her in his arms and sitting down for held her for a time until she could smile again.

"It is like an Abbeinnian American to keep himself out of it as much as he can," said Penrod. "All brave Americans are like that. They will do a whole lot for you, and do not want any praise for it."

"Well James my boy," said Emperor-Vivian. "Our great friend here Jack Evans knew how to get information, he is very slick at it, and he could even now produce a written account of what you did far more than the details you have told us. Instead of making your self the hero when you told the details you did you make out my daughter as being the heroine instead. It is true you said nothing at all about your self, but you were the instrument by the aid of God in getting my dearest daughter through perils which not only could they have failed to escape from, but from which others could not have saved them from. I and mother ought to be sure we were going to lose Violet when she was mistaken by general Nance as a Glandelinian boy scout spy, and what made it so hard for her when in disguise, and when her voice lost its natural tone, is because she was with that traitorous rascal whom she recognized at once we recognized, and whom you James finally killed or caused to be killed. You got her sisters to identify her after you found where she was kept. All the other details we know as Evans was able to find out everything. You will receive far more than gratitude from us my boy, and as my daughters already love you it is wise for us to see fit to give you a position of rank as high as it is within our own royal power. To move you may need to proceed with the Admiration to the Convention Hall for there they too will proceed to honor you for not only saving the despatch of my son from capture from the enemy, but saving the fleet, and saving the captives little daughter from being murdered by the two scoundrels who had captured her. You have done more in that short space of two weeks and a few days than any one ever known and you deserve the love of my little daughters. That your rank will be we will decide during the sitting meeting in the Convention Convention Hall to move, though my son Penrod has already suggested to me something very unusual. That will be up to the meeting to move now."

"But surely I do not believe, these are a reward just for doing a little thing like that," said James. "I must confess it was not me in peril. The unseen spies did not paste me at all. It is true I had only one encounter with a spy and that was the Glandelinian boy spy who made up as Princess Violet. But Oh heavens it was a perfection on my eye. It was a poor duplicate, and any one by his voice could mistake him for a man than a little girl. His face was not handsome enough and too he was one of those who had double crossed me some time ago and the chance meeting gave me a opportunity to get even. He was raiding Argellina Aaronburg's tent when I came upon him. I didn't care even if he did not have a chance to defend himself. It is our American ways about such kind of enemies. We shoot them like we would shoot a wolf. Then surely the other thing was of no account. I never saw but one or two of the other spies, whom I easily killed when in a sneaking way they were following you dear little daughters. Surely it is a fact it is they who deserve rewards and not me. I didn't suffer but they did--and--"

"Oh yes you did too suffer but forgot about it," said Jennie decidedly. "Often when you didn't know we were standing by you--but you were nearly crying you you--eyes out for us. You almost despaired once and then you did so much for us, when it was difficult then seemed impossible to pass through we thought it was time to do our part and yet that was nothing in comparison to what you did. You were more worried about our safety than we were ourselves. It is true we were very unhappy and good and scared at times but you comforted us. You did a lot more in two weeks for us, than any one did in months," Evans said so and you make little of it. Why should we be a reward? That is due to you, you claim we are oh such good little girls, and it is true, I'll have to admit it, but you are unusually good even for a foreign boy. You have even astonished us for there was not the slightest sin on your part either and papa there is one part of the story he left out perhaps he forgot. He didn't tell you how he saved General Nemo from two or three assassin spies, and got a promotion as his secretary. And it was through that that he was able to get us through the rest of the Christian lines without hindrance by the spies."

"I know that happened," said Emperor Nemo, and so does Jack Evans. It is the first time brother Nemo that you heard of it. I forgot to tell you. Here is the letter General Nemo sent me about James. His conduct was so good and he did a lot of work too and while acting as secretary was able to denounce and cause the arrest of about two thousand suspicious characters."

"That is good news to me," said the Emperor. "That is something else for the lad to be honored by and----there is the supper bell folks. Remember Mrs. Andrews is not a lady to be kept waiting when she cooks a good food."

After the supper was over adding with the General after meals was a general prayer of Thanksgiving to God for the safe return of the little girls, and a special prayer for the guardianship of the proper disposition of the reward for James on the morrow. Then as Empress Vivian saw that Violet and her sisters required rest and quiet she took them up to the bed room prepared for them. As great as the strain had been upon the little girls, it was evident that they must have been angel possessed because they did not fall asleep, and only felt the happier that they were safe once more in their father's immeasurably strong army, which even at many occasions Glandelinian spies of the boldest kind dared to even approach. There is even no record of the "putt and Jeff" spies ever coming to the this Christian Army. The Empress herself decided to stay with her daughters until they were asleep and the Emperor and Evans and Penrod stayed at the table with James. Then being admitted by James mother came Timothy Groveton himself, his arm was still in a sling, but he was his gay self again. Sauteing he said "So sorry girls and general Evans to be late, but I had a little military duty to attend to and just got it through just learned of what happened to you every saintly little daughter. Mrs. Hanley is scared stiff of that little American boy and----and----and----" he checked himself and stared as if he thought he was seeing a ghost.

"Why bless my soul if it ain't James himself," said Tim. "My Dear sweet God but it sure is good to see you again," and he clasped the boy lovingly by the hand and kissed him on the forehead. "When did you get back again?"

"I arrived early this morning," said James. "How is your shoulder?"

"It's much better but only the doctor said I must keep it this way for a time yet. It's doctor's orders you know. Where are the dear little girls?"

"I know they're here otherwise you wouldn't be here."

"They have just gone to bed upstairs and their mothers is with them Tim," said Emperor Vivian. "But you may go up and look in. If they're still awake they'll be glad to receive you, but if not do not wake them as they sure need rest."

"I'll promise that they won't be awakened," said Tim and he went up stairs.

"Tim soon returned, that is half an hour afterwards, while James was finishing cleaning up the dining room."

"I thought you said the little girls were in their room," said Tim. "There are only little angels up there. They were not asleep when I went up there but just had finished their night prayers. They were covered me as if I was a long lost brother and then when I was preparing to go said their night prayers over again and prayed that my shoulder would be better. But James dear where did you get that perfume you gave them? It certainly was delicious. I never smelled any such good perfume in my life and----" what a--you laughing at General Evans?"

"I didn't give them any perfume," said James.

"You smell the heavily perfume of the angels," said Evans. "I'm now going up to see them while my friend the Emperor can entertain you two boys until you too wish to go to bed. But I believe you'll both be too happy to sleep all night."

"But where is the room I'm to sleep in?" asked James.

"You are going to sleep with me to night," said Penrod, and that room is where they are. There is no other bed room, and sure you won't blush alone play with them little girls. It would be a perfection and you'll have their angels watching you and me all night."

"I have often slept with them and there is nothing I found to be ashamed of," said James. "But don't there sometimes come a light from them especially when the room is dark. I sometimes imagined there was a--was it--dreamed."

"I've noticed that my self," said Penrod. "A real possessed child will at night give a sort of light. Jennie's and Violet's and also Argellina's light seems the strongest and the same, but all the light is the same color a strange beautiful light blue."

"I could prove to you my boys," said Emperor Vivian, "and also to you men of the good qualities of my daughters if you really wish to know their character. You my boy James told you father of their disposition when speaking to them about 'a Passion Play' you heard of. I tell you my lad that every I go over the mere mention of it is a mere play of you ought to have seen them when I and my mother wife, call her mother because she is one, and the little girls for the first time when to a passion play. At the sad part a they acted some thing awful and we had to go out. They screamed so when they saw the hammering of nails that the whole audience was excited, and when he was raised on the Cross they fainted, and for two months were ill and wouldn't hardly eat a bite. The shock was terrible upon them and since then we never even so much as mentioned one. The scene affected us greatly too and Mother was greatly sobered but we did not go that bad, though I, afraid I wouldn't care to see it again either for we felt the effects for ever afterwards. My little daughters I thought would never be the same. They do not care for the picture of the Last Supper never have it any where where Judas is shown in it. They have a picture of the Last Supper at home but in that picture Judas is not there. They don't want to hear his name mentioned. In any Church they can't approach a crucifix without tears welling copiously into their eyes."

"I've seen that every time I went to Mass with them," said James. "Even at the Elevation their eyes are tearful. Once too they saw a Glandelinian prisoner who threw mud at a statue of our Blessed Lord, wet sloppy mud, and though Violet's sisters shrieked and then burst into a passion of weeping, I was surprised that Violet didn't put her eyes flashed, she herself scooped up a handful of hard mud and flung it right into his face good and hard so that it entered his eyes so badly that I hear his eyes are being treated in the hospital and yet may be he'll never be better. The little girls wouldn't leave the statue until every particle of mud was cleaned off by them. But the prisoner was sentenced to the Island prison for that offense by the Court Marshall Tribunal."

"Yes, that is the usual case," said Emperor Vivian. "Though for blasphemous actions the penalty here is death."

"He got life," said James. "Life term."

"They are unusually good something very extraordinary for little girls who go through such a life," said Penrod. "Some believe they are so good because the angels possess them, and that they are that way because they and the angels seem to be one. Is that so Father?"

"No it isn't," said Emperor Vivian. "I believe the first symptoms came on them a little before the war came out. I wondered why they so often escaped great dangers like they did when it seemed impossible to escape. They could accomplish things against the enemy that was impossible for others to do. They cried when babies at the sight of a crucifix. The most peculiar thing that came to my mind happened as witnesses told me who were too far off to save them in time was when they were captured by Glandelinians, and there was no hope of rescue or escape. The Glandelinians first tried to make my daughters harg themselves, The side of the gibbet was fixed with a steep ladder and all she would have to do was climb up, attach the noose to the neck and jump off. 432 We'll to command them to do that was like talking to the wall. They wouldn't do it not because they feared to die that way but because there is no such thing as compulsion in that and that it would have been the sin of cowardice and suicide had they obeyed. Enraged the officer in charged ordered them to be shot down and when the men aimed their rifles and really obeyed the command fire, the guns wouldn't go off. The officer in examining the cartridges found they were not blanks, and neither were the rifles in any out of the way condition. The men became scared, excited, and wouldn't obey another command to run them through with the bayonet, and then he himself lunged at, yelling fire with his sabre to run her through. My daughters said afterwards, that they could not tell whether it was lightning or not, but some dreadful flash seemed from nowhere to instantly connect with the sword, there was a cloud of smoke, and a terrific ear-splitting crash like thunder, and the man lay dead blackened to a crisp. The soldiers fled in a dreadful panic, leaving the little girls behind, so that they not having been tied to anything were able to go away at their leisure. Walter Starling was one of the witnesses but was too far away to render assistance on time. He believes one of the angels struck with a flaming sword. For it looked like one appeared to his eyes and connected with the colonel's sword. My daughters of course were shocked over the outcome especially at the sight of the man's horrible death, and the cowardice of his comrades. They'll pick on the seemingly helpless or real helpless and when vengeance overtakes one of their number they flee like cowardly rats. That is one good proof of angel possession. They told me that the flash was similar to that which occurred when the Glandelinians were struck dead on their knees on an occasion before this and they themselves not injured nor the horses either, but that occurred during a terrific thunderstorm. The other occurred from a clear sky (not punch in the eye) with the sun shining.

"I am" "I'm wondering though" said Timothy Groveton himself "why it is that since they are these kind of little girls and love him so that Our Lord would allow them to suffer so at the hand of the enemy or at least seems so." "From many of the incidents I've have experienced," said Jack Evans "I don't believe He will allow it. General Hendon Michael Dargatzis the supreme head of the Gemini said to me one day that he believes that the little girls could avoid much of this if they had remained home or fled to the solitary confinement of the protection of the far northern state of Domobla, Abbeinnia or Abyssinika."

"That could not be the man doesn't understand" said the Emperor "if they would be safe there I would then make them do it. But then I don't want them to be looked upon as cowards either if they are angel possessed then why should we be afraid of their welfare. At the beginning I often was mighty badly worried about their safety but now since even this past experience I am more convinced than ever of their safety. But then you must know their own bad experiences was something which would have caused them unnecessary sorrow, and that was often false news. A number of times I must confess, I had died, I had been killed, I had been fatally wounded, and so on. I was killed according to later reports at the Battle of Cedar Nine Creek. Fortunately they did not get that news. I don't remember ever seeing the battle. It was fought by General Hansonia."

A number of the battle at which I was reported killed I never even saw. My daughters don't fear the enemy and defy the enemy to the last. Those Glandelinians were fools, or crazy who thought they could make little girls like them commit suicide by hanging themselves when they knew it was a sin, and when they are as stubborn against sin, as it is ever possible for any one to be stubborn. They wouldn't sacrifice anything to commit a sin. They have seen sights that no one else could live through and are still alive as if nothing happened. Nothing can daunt my little daughters. They are as brave as they are good."

"But when they are so good, is it right for them to suffer so unjustly" asked Tim."

"Absolutely not. But what can prevent it, when the enemy have no more respect for Our Blessed Lord and Christianity than the Devil has, and too Our Dear Blessed Lord didn't deserve what he suffered, and neither did His Blessed Mother, and yet they didn't escape it. If you will tell my daughters that they don't deserve what they go through, they'll tell you most decidedly that they are no better than Our Blessed Lord, and if He suffered why shouldn't they. They love me and my sons with a true sacred love that is unusual, they love me and their loved ones in a way that cannot be described, but that love is hatred in comparison to their love of God and His Blessed Mother. I remember the day before I knew it was up that they read my death notice I having been killed while out scouting. In fact I even had not left the headquarters which I resided. Their grief over the news was terrible as I learned, but when they went into a Church to get consolation, they saw a large crucifix and the appearance of the image was so heart-breaking and life like that they had to be gently carried out of the church so intense and wild was their grief. They even forgot their grief over my loss. Even when they finally learned the full truth made a mistake and I was not injured, it was some time before consolation came back to them. My little daughters it seems can't bear the sight of a crucifix without bursting out like that and yet they won't be without one either. One awful thing that happened once was that they planned to have a shooting match, and a statue of a evil spirit was to be the object. But it was to be covered over with a dirty trick was played on them. A statue of the Sacred Heart was placed there instead covered with a black cloth. My dear little girls however you know are very suspicious of anything these days, and she and little Jennie didn't like the looks of the statue that is the shape, he and her sisters had been first selected to see whether they could hit it within difficult pistol shot range and later rifle range. They however hesitated about doing it, though some of their friends asked them what delayed their target shooting. But they wouldn't do anything, and finally Jennie decided to uncover it and make sure it was the proposed statue. The shock of what it really was was severe. They didn't cry however, they just seemed unconcerned, and walked away back to their tent. At supper they couldn't eat, and finally collapsed, and were ill for three weeks. I had the entire territory within and without the Christian camp combo combed for the dirty snake that played that trick. I tried to, and I was horrified that when later he was found he was acting like he was a dog, barking and so forth. He was completely out of his mind and though he did not have abilities he was foaming at the mouth."

He must have had an awful wicked intention in trying to play that trick on my good little daughters other wise he would not have been so horribly afflicted. Knowing what had caused it, no doctors would even take care of him. He was sent to some mad house, and, presume he is there yet. If he had not been in that condition I would have had him face a firing squad for that wicked act. But his condition was sufficient punishment. Their love of God is sure extending even Good Friday and Holy Saturday has a sad effect upon them. They do not cry but they have a feeling as if they had lost all, and nothing can comfort them until Easter Sunday comes around. Because of how they feel on Good Friday I often wish that day never came."

"But yet I can't understand it" said James himself. "Everybody whom I met who are of our side speaks of it and hotly too, even the refugees. They blame themselves and blame even the nation for the perils of the little princesses and declare they don't receive protection enough."

"They don't ah," said Emperor Vivan. "What did General Nance and Nemo do when you were within their lines. So rigid and fierce was the drastic measures against the assassin spies that even any one who were disguised within the Christian lines were even arrested and made to produce papers and give satisfactory explanations and if they couldn't well too bad. You know that happened and what a time you James and your sisters Violet a sister had to save her from being hanged when she was arrested by General Nance who mistook her for a spy. It did no good there for her to wear a disguise for it made it more dangerous for her. Nance would not have been to blame even if he had hanged her, if he did not discover this truth in time because he couldn't recognize her. I might have been able to save her however but you went to her quicker. The arresting of her by mistake shows that Nance meant business against my daughters enemies."

"But why do the enemy persecute your daughters like that, surely is not for spy it is. The enemy spy on you and then they have a right to spy too." "The excuse is for spying," said Jack Evans but many of the Gemini and our own Military detectives and revenue agents and others found out different. Military and her sisters are princesses. Manley and his followers are jealous of them. It was said some time before the war broke out he had been their friend but then turned against them through jealousy. I don't believe he ever was their friend, and only acted so when they were near him and were secretly their enemy. And another thing. The Glandelinians hate any body who is contrary to their opinions. They hate anybody that is what you call "Goody Goody" and as they hate Our Blessed Lord and all His Heavenly Creatures they hate a lot all His followers down here on earth. Of course it is true Violet, and her sisters did a lot of spying on the enemy and I trusted a very plan even to causing disaster to the enemy but they had a right to in defense of their holy country. Violet once said to me "continued Evans" if the enemy don't like us to spy, let them keep their spies away from our armies too then."

"But why do the possession angels allow so much to be done to the little girls" asked Penrod. "That is up to the angels" said Emperor Vivan. "We know nothing about their doings unless it is that the Angels have to let Nature take their course. They couldn't stop Our Blessed Lord from going through his sad Passion so maybe that the more they couldn't stop them from it either. Many said they believed 434 that they heard at times at large weeping in the room where the little girls sleep which did not come from them. You must know Angela can feel what you feel. Don't think because they possess Heaven that the angels are happy when people like people offend the One they love so much so often and so grievously. Many times I'm sure angels feel like striking. But the fact that the miraculous escapes they so often had proves they are angel possessed. Given with the strange breaking of the ropes when that one man charged Joice. He had tied stones on her feet to make weight enough to strangle her hands, and she fell on the man killing him instantly.

"I've heard of that, Joice told me" said James.

"Who is one of the two great enemies so far known yet living?" asked Tim.

"I believe it is some Glandelinian officer, a murderous child butcher by the name of Killchild or something," said Emperor Vivian.

At the name James face blanched white. They saw that and Evans asked;

"What's the matter my boy, are you afraid of that man?"

"No," he said beginning to whimper. "He killed,--killed my youngest brother, and my cousin Mildred. And he was such a--a--good--little girl--too."

"And if you save my daughters to get even with the enemy?" asked Mr. Emperor Vivian.

"At first that was partly my intention, and partly for their sake, but when I saw what they are and came to love them as I do I saved them for their sake only. They told me I got satisfaction on the enemy by saving them but I didn't. I want to get Killchild. I'll kill him the first chance I get no matter what the cost."

"He's a dreadful enemy of my daughter and dangerous to every one else as well" said Emperor Vivian. "No body could ever do that man harm and yet it is said those that will fully harm my daughter never have a stroke of luck. No one so far did to them what he did. I could not tell you the details my boy. You wouldn't be able to stand it. You would turn ill from the shock. They showed their bravery though by standing the test. But they would dread to meet him now. Of all Glandelinians he's the only one they can't help being scared of. They confessed that to me often."

James having recovered himself grinned.

"Would God reward me in anything I ask for doing what I did for your daughter's daughter?"

"I believe He would my boy. If it is for your good."

"I wouldn't want it for my own self, for their own good. I will pray to night that if it is his will he'll allow me a chance to set them free."

"Set my daughters free from what?"

"Why I will for their sake justly kill Killchild if he wills it. It's no sin to do that is it?"

"It is and a grievous sin not to do it if you had the chance" said Evans. "It's different in other wars I suppose even if justified in killing in battle but in such a cause as this it would be a sin not to kill Glandelinians who are a hellish menace to others. It would be a good thing to do it for what he would give to get his hands on the poor little girls. But if you succeeded in doing it you would be a wonder against the problem is to find the scoundrel, that snake. Do you know him by sight?"

"I certainly do. I know his face well."

"Is he only a child slave massacre leader or a soldier in the army?"

"That I cannot tell. But he led in the massacre of children in Hest-Cedernine one day. I did not see the details for real but I heard of it. My brother was tied hands and feet tightly and thrown into a quick sand mine. The little girl my cousin was stripped naked despite her struggles, then to prevent her from breathing until she died the Glandelinians who had her fastened a sponge soaked with ammonia to her face, and then when she was dead, took away the front part of her body and tying strings around the rutsures wouldn't fall out, hung her to a tree in that condition for the vultures to eat. It is said Killchild did that to my brother and he himself with his own hands. I've often dreamed of seeing both and saying pleadingly to me 'Avenge us. It will be a sin if you don't.'"

"You may try to get the chance by praying" said Emperor Vivian. "If your prayers are answered you'll have the opportunity. If you succeed in that you'll surely relieve the minds of my daughters a great deal. Oh how they dread that man. The only one who escaped him except by a miracle if they ever get caught by him. What they went through when his prisoners once I could not bear to tell you and they wouldn't want me to tell any one because it was too shocking. It was a horrible whole sale massacre of children and they were made to stay among the dead gutted bodies. He was the worst of all afraid boys you would never have the chance and he's terribly dangerous too."

CHAPTER SEVENTEEN.

James gets two rewards. 2.2.2.344458

"Knowing so much what the poor little princesses have gone through because of him," said Evans "I too have tried to secure him. Nobody too has ever escaped from me, but I've not had anything to that man. If you ever succeed and you only a little boy you'll be a wonder!"

"And you say he is the enemy that the princesses really are scared of. I never thought they were afraid of a ny Glandelinian" said James surprised. "But they really are, you can ask them yourselves" said Emperor Vivian. "It is because that man is the kind that no one can trifle with. It would be my friend if they ever fall into his hands again. There would be no escape. They may fight him off if they have a chance and are armed but they are really scared of him all right because there's no escaping him."

"Well I thought James to himself 'If I get the opportunity they won't need be scared of him any longer.'"

Finally James announced that he wished to turn in for the night, and so they all did, except Emperor Vivian who had a lot of military business to accomplish and had to stay up late. Penrod showed James his bedroom they entered the room, and then the three being a soft light both went to where where the little girls lay in two beds. The beds were large enough for seven or eight little girls to sleep in. They were sound asleep and looked like sleeping angels but Penrod warned James to tip toe for the least sound could awaken them, especially when their little lives were such exciting ones. For a long long time both boys stood looking at the little sleepers very unwilling to pull themselves away. Then they undressed behind a screen they stood up, and after saying their night prayers, and James adding a petition for additional ones both went to bed. James however that night had an awful dream. He it seems was a witness to the murder of his little brother and his cousin, and strove to save them most desperately and could not. He cried out and screamed loudly in his sleep. The horror of the dream woke him up and also Penrod and some of the little girls who suddenly sat up in bed. Jennie the nearest was out of bed and sitting on his in a moment asking James what was the matter.

James through his sobbing told them of his awful dream. They had quite a time to bring him to where he was shaking all over but Jennie was able to comfort him and got him to lie down again. But he couldn't sleep any more after that and he therefore lost his hunger for breakfast too. He didn't get up so early that morning with the rest, and when he was called to come down to breakfast he came down but sat there and did not eat a bite. They could not hardly understand how a dream could affect him that way but Violet said later after breakfast "The dream brought back memories of his sad loss. It is too bad that such a good boy should have to have suffered a loss of a dear one, and we know how it felt when we only thought we did. He's still got over the effects of the dream soon. He did more for us than we can ever pay him for, and so it is up to us to help him out of his difficulties. We will let him enjoy our company until the time comes for him to be called to the attention of the world."

"It would be a good plan to let him go out here back riding with you," said Evans. "Make a tour of the camp. But just for present my little ones don't go outside the camp. You didn't let the enemy know you were here. Better for you to be healthy to let the strain wear off. You ought to take a three months vacation from your duties and let the Gemini do the work for you."

"We intend to" said Joice. "That is if the enemy let us. But we are not going to do any spying for a long long time. But I just thought. How about Gerald Starling. Did he stay a prisoner since the day we captured him?"

"No" said Evans. "In an attack upon our lines recently he was rescued. I suspect that that would happen." said Violet. "Next time it is best for us to put the littleascal out of the way. We do our work against him for nothing. He's as pesty as old James Deldon."

Jennie suddenly thought of something and turning to James came with the question:

"Who was the man who led the massacre of children among which you and little brother and cousin were murdered?"

"Henry Gale," said James.

Violet gave a start and turned white. Her sisters looked startled and glanced fearfully at one another.

"Henry Gale" Violet finally managed to say. "Surely you are fooling."

James. It can't be the man who because of his murders of children is nicknamed Killchild."

"I'm not mistaken" said James almost vehemently. "I would know the man anywhere where I know too he is the only man you little girls fear. I can see it in your faces."

"We have a right to be scared of him," said Daley. "There is no one who can risk chances with him. The very Abbe's Government has put a big price on that reckless head for his destruction for what he does and what he suffers under him but no one can get that fellow, and those who ever had a chance were afraid to try it. We would give up a life if he once ever got us in his possession again. But come let's forget it. It almost proved fatal to him. His name once more when we almost had gotten it. I'll have my order. I'll saddle our own horse the seven beautiful black beauties and you own, or if you like you can ride one of our other horses which is swift, and my sisters can show you a good part of the city of Pando in part perhaps which you have never seen and there's a big church not far off from from which we came when we went to Mass this morning. As you were ill you didn't get up so early but there is chance of your attending the last Mass."

"I would rather go there first," said James. "As I didn't eat my breakfast I may have a chance to go to Holy Communion yet."

"Just as you say," said Daley. "But we will have to hurry."

The boy who was supposed to get out the horses through some misunderstanding of orders got out the horses and carriage instead. When they were called for they were ready and in going out were surprised to see only the horses and carriage.

"But we had you told to bring out eight horses we were going to ride our horses," said Violet in astonishment.

"Never mind," said Angelina. "We might as well ride the carriage now."

"Yes," said Catharine. "We will only delay James for a Mass."

They got in the carriage though there was some slight friendly argument on the matter of getting in, as they wanted James to do so first and he wouldn't say instantly "Oh, ladies first always."

"Then now are we going to get out first?" laughed Violet who was the last one in.

"You forget," James grinned. "That the carriage opens on both sides."

"Oh, I forgot that," said Violet. "So it does. But where is the driver who didn't show up."

"Never mind him," said Jennie scrambling over to the seat. "If we can ride a horse we can drive. She took up the reins and at the Abbe's command the horse went at a brisk trot. It was this early riding all right and within a short time they were before a great big church at Vincent's.

"Who's going to guide the horses and carriage when we all go in the church?" he asked James.

"I'll hire a boy on the street here," said Jennie. "He looked around and just saw a boy come walking out of the church."

"That's Father Mulvihill's altar boy," said James. "He'll guide the horses and carriage."

Jennie called to the boy but had to repeat it twice before he heard he was so engrossed upon his own thoughts. He came up willingly and very respectfully but when he got a good look at Jennie and her sisters he almost gave a jump. With the purpose of going out and with him the city Violet and her sisters were dressed in their prettiest dresses, civilian of course, but had donned their heart-shaped military uniforms. He had looked even to James unattractively pretty to day so pretty he couldn't hardly look upon them without a heart ache and the altar boy fairly gasped on beholding them.

He covered himself with a hawker and snuttling respectfully said:

"What do you wish little girl?"

"Would you mind taking care of my horses and carriage. Until we come out of the church."

"If you like, miss but I surely am not worthy of sitting in a carriage seat where a little angel is sitting. I'll feel queer out of place."

"No get it," said Jennie. "We are not celestial, and we are as much equal as you are. Come take the seat and when we come out we'll pay you for it."

The boy respectfully waited until she got down and then climbed up. Both the eight were in the church. James observed to the rear of the church a large crucifix and hoped that when the little girls would go out they would fail to see it as he didn't wish to have the results as usually come. He wished more to see them smile, laugh and be happy. The entire floor of the church was magnificent, the altar had two big angels in prayer attitude at each side of the Altar and all side altars had angels and the stained glass pictures windows were numerous and beautiful. When they came in they could see by the position of the priest at the Altar that he was just finishing Mass, that they were a little early for the next and the last week day Mass. James and the little girls however couldn't find any pews vacant in the church, and there fore knelt at the rear of the church until the Mass was over.

Violet and her sisters pay as much attention to the proceedings of the Mass as persons would to a Great show in which they were most intensely interested, such attention that James who was even a devotee altar boy was astonished. Whether kneeling or sitting they neither moved nor even had their faces turned any where but toward the Altar and the way they bowed their heads at the priest's elevation of the Sacred Host was touching and awe inspiring. But though he knew what they did, from being conscious of it, James did not look any where else but at the Altar, and when the last time came he went right up and bowed devoutly as a good boy should. What made him more astonished is the way which the priest turned the first time to say Dominus Vobiscum the way he couldn't help for a second glance at Violet and her sisters. Finally the Mass was over and yet for a time Violet and her sisters did not like to leave even when the candles were out. James hoped they wouldn't go out by the rear of the church for the dread what might happen if they happened to see the crucifix but it was not his way to prevent them for it would be wrong.

But for some reason or other he was not to get his wish. Finally they got up and after a moment's respectfully started slowly out toward the rear single file placing their palms in their pocket. It was however quite dark where the crucifix stood and he believed that after all they would not see it. But they had very keen eyes indeed and saw it at the first glimpse and was before with tearful eyes in an instant and for a long time could not tear themselves away, while Jennie embraced the feet of the image lovingly and with a sad face indeed James was deeply moved and felt a devotion himself for our blessed Lord which he never felt before. Then finally they left the church and went out in the vestibule of the church he gently suggested that they should dry their eyes, as he did not want the boat guiding the carriage to see them that way. They took his advice and wiped their eyes. Then they slowly went out. Little angels indeed James thought to himself. "They are more Holy, believe them most of the saints themselves if not all. I guess they didn't cry but like I heard they do because of me being present but they sure looked as if they could have wept bitterly. Gosh I decided it but it wasn't avoided. I'm tempted to take hold of any one of them and hold her in my arms for the rest of the day. Little girls like that are don't deserve what they have to go through. Persecute them because they are a good body good." Oh, I'll show the enemy something. I sure prayed hard in the past that if it is God's will I'll rid them of the one enemy they dread the most. He's got it coming to him as he killed my brother and cousin. When they got in he suggested that he would drive for them. The other boy did not want to accept pay went off from them and even suggested that they all ride and he would drive them where ever they wanted to go. Finally as they accepted his offer James asked him a whisper.

"I couldn't help noticing it as I was paying so much attention to the Mass. Why did the priest look at you little girls so. He looked like he had seen a ghost. Do you know him?"

"Not at all," said Angelina. "I believe he thought he was seeing things. Every body who doesn't know us believes we are not real. I and my sisters are always wondering why it is because we are so pretty girls the more something else, but we didn't notice it or if we did we didn't pay any attention. Did the priest look scared?"

"Not scared," said James. "But he did look queer. He was kind of shaky noticed as he raised the chalice for the elevation, and shaky still when he gave us Holy Communion. But he didn't look exactly scared. I wonder if he thought he was saying Mass for seven little angels like we are?"

"Very pretty girls as angels," said Violet. "I wonder why?"

"But you deserve it," said James modestly.

"Yes, I suppose so but if you knew the names the Glandellians call us-----" "You telling me," said James. "I could recite every one in a long list by heart. There would be no one call you a 'Gutter-snipe, or a 'Cathedral, or a 'St. and other names before me and get away with it. The worst is gutter-snipe. That's the most vicious, treacherous and fiercest reptile known and very venomous too."

"Well the saying goes," said Violet's sister Catharine. "Sticks and stones will break my bones, but names will never hurt me. But it does hurt us though not for our sakes but because for God's sake when they also call us dreadful dirty blasphemous and immodest names. We shoot at them for that."

"But," said James again. "Why shouldn't you deserve to be called and called angels. Indeed it is not that you look so pretty I am sure. The way you act and do it seems as if you and the angels were one, you do the same thing, and all-wise parols that only angels can. There is only one thing lacking though I see," he added. "You don't seem to be as happy as angels are."

"Oh yes we are at times. But I hear they are not happy when we ain't go then what are we to do."

They had some quite some distance and James had noticed that every body on the side walks stared as they rode by. He paid no attention and then suddenly said:

"Why didn't Penrod come out with us?"

James giggled at that.

"You'll find out in the Convention Hall," he said. "He and father is preparing his supper for you."

"Supper!" said James. "I don't understand."

"Wait until the time comes," said Nettie. "When you are sent for then you'll know. Father doesn't want you to talk."

"Maybe you do not know yourselves," said James smiling.

"We are not positively sure what it is but we have our suspicions," said Catherine.

"It is you little girls who ought to get a supper and a good happy one!"

said James. "You are sure well worth it, and no one can deny it."

"Well I suppose it is as you say," said Angelina. "But we don't get what we deserve, we get what we don't deserve and we don't complain either. But look there. This is the big bridge crossing the big Mississippi river into another section of the city. Live in the hall we go to now."

"It might be a long time," said Jo. "We are far away from home as it is."

"I guess we ought to turn back," put in James. "I see also it is starting to rain and we don't want to get wet."

So the horses were turned back and soon they were home and bound. However it did not rain as much as was expected, and when they got near the place Violet and her sisters could not resist the temptation of going back into the church and paying their respects to another visit before going home. James was not surprised, he really had expected this, and the boy who did the driving remained on the seat while they went on into the church. It was dark in the church now and the light at both sides of the altar made a beautiful flickering glow. There were many people in the church, however, the least bent on the same intention, some saying the stations of the cross, or doing other things which showed how devout the Abbeysian people are. How to Violet and her sisters remained in the church James could not tell but the time seemed much shorter to him than it was. In the darkness of the church he at first thought that a sort of slight bluish light came from the little girls but he wasn't sure, but he looked closely and felt a sort of strange finally one of them first made the sign of the cross and then got up. Her sisters followed and then James and soon after their respectful genuflection they filed down towards the front of the church paid for some violet lights, lighted them and then slowly went out by the other entrance not going out by the rear this time. He thought they intended to go out but no they went into the sacristy to look for some of the priests. But they soon found that the priests were out and he then understood that he and so they then filed down the center aisle toward the rear of the church. James expected the same scene as before and indeed he was not fooled, and he felt more respectful to them than before.

Then they slowly and carefully entered the carriage and told the boy the name of the street to drive to, and he did. They had not gone very far when a man who seemed to be a sort of an official suddenly crossed from the side walk into the middle of the street and bade the driver to stop the horse. The boy obeyed wondering though what was wrong.

The man gave a sharp look at the princesses, then nodded in respect. "You are the princesses, Empress's daughters I suppose?" he asked kindly kindly.

"Yes," Violet nodded.

"I see I ought to be able to because only you could look like them. Have you with you a boy whose name is James and is he?"

Violet nodded, and pointed toward James.

"Well I'm an officer of the Court-Martial Tribunal. I was sent by an order to pick you up should you come this way. The boy is wanted as soon as possible in the Convention Hall. He is to be clearing and as captain. You little girls are to be witnesses to him, for it is for what he did for you that he is to be promoted."

"Oh, goodie, goodie," cried the little girls. "I knew it, knew it!"

said Jennie and Violet each placing an arm around him. "We told you so."

"If you like," said Angelina to the officer, "you may ride to the Convention Hall on the empty space on the seat."

"Go on to have to decline the invitation," said the man respectfully, "but I can't leave my post while on duty."

"It's too bad," said Violet. "We would like to have you take a ride with us, but if you can't go, can't. Oh, don't you get some one to take your place."

"Oh, don't be so slow until three o'clock," said the officer's office.

They thanked the man as he went and respectfully drove on.

It took quite some time (if not time) for them to come within sight of the Convention Hall and in fact several times either Violet or Jennie had to ask some one the way to having such come to the city by James help they knew nothing of the mentioned Convention Hall. Finally they came within sight of it and it was indeed a great big building, and there were stories high, and more than a block long. The carriage stopped at the entrance and Violet and her sisters were the first to a light, then James got out. The carriage was still to be taken care of by the boy who had been asked to do the driving. Before they were about to enter the place they overheard one man who looked like a foreigner say to another:

"I know by their beauty that they are the Abbeysian Princesses in disguise."

"How would you like to be one of them?"

"Be one of them! Should say not. They are too sad and hard for me to thank you. I wouldn't live such a life for all the money in the world. Not for me."

The little girl is looked offended at her slight and Jennie turning round suddenly said:

"No one asked you to. And it is too bad about you. You are a cow and you talk like that. It is the kind like to you that refuses to bear a cross. I suppose no matter how small and light it is. Better move on before we did some mischief."

The man reddened in the face and without saying a word moved back to the astonishment of the other man who had not really expected such an answer.

"I'm sorry Princess," he said. "It might have been my fault for asking him that question, but I didn't expect such an answer."

"It isn't your fault," said Jennie decidedly. "Your question had pure intentions. He answered as he was a cow and."

Then she led the way into the Convention Hall. A guard was standing there and he ushered them into the large hall within the building. Around the big hall seated were a large number of boys and girls scouts officers and privates, and men of high rank and rank and the judge and Penrod sat at a long table. No matter who they were or what rank, they all rose as Violet, and her sisters entered with James and only seated themselves when Jennie commanded at a look from Violet them to do so. Violet and her sisters took their seats on the left and right side of the judge and James was about to take a seat beside one of the officers of the army when Violet smilingly got up and had him sit between her and Jennie. The boy saw that Admiral Johnston was also present and so was his brother and several of the captains of the ship including A. Dolphin, and Mr. James. As soon as the judge was quiet General Jack Evans who was also present rose up and presented before the others the proofs of what James had done for Violet and her sisters. Then as Evans gave a short oration on the bravery of the boy the admiral could not help curiously glance around the big room and at the bunch of officers at the table on the opposite side. He gave a slight surprised start. He was looking into the eyes of General Hanson, and Memo too. He wondered, how did they get here. When called up these two also gave their story about the boy, and Memo told of how such a little boy his size was able to put out of commission three of his assailants who tried to assassinate him, and then of the good work he did as his secretary while still guarding the little girl from the unseen spies.

And during the capture of a good number. As the orations went on the boy also saw his parents there, his brothers and sisters, and his colleagues. Violet and her sisters were then spoken to but only one of them was needed to tell of the experiences of herself and her sisters, and the way she spoke of James and made him blush and he would have disappeared had he been such a chance to please embarrassed him greatly. He told her story in as long a narrative as possible, taking her time about it, and like he had done, she didn't say much about herself but spoke of his bravery and courage and how he noted and what he did, and then finished with the sad story of James loss. That James was the enemy of the worst foe Henry Gore called Killchild, and would some day hope to get satisfaction for his sad loss. Then Penrod rose and told a story which is not known until now.

"When I found out James was here in Pandora," he said, "I had good reasons to choose him for my companion when I had to go back and take command of a part of Father's army. I became acquainted with James in St. Paul's school at Adams and Desplaines Street, at Chicago. I knew my past knew Beloch at Adams and Desplaines Street, at Chicago. I knew my past knew I was an Abbeysian and knew, belonging to some Abbeysian royal family but did not know to whom. Most children in that country or nearly all are different than those here and sure are a torment at times to the good brothers who teach them. I therefore kept aloof from them, did not seek their companionship and went back to my guardian where we lived right after school. Finally James came as a new member one spring. He seemed a sort of quiet lad, and spoke to no one and not to even me at first. He was studious more horrible than any other. It was I'm sure God's will that caused these little girls to have to care for them so meritorious and obnoxious promiscuous young boy office-holders. Vivian himself will therefore after I am through take a course in your behalf although without precedent. You have a less behaved well when you first knew the other Prince Penrod, and in these last two weeks have done wonders fully in behalf of the Vivian Girl Princesses. Early this morning their Father His Gracious Majesty suggested to them to make up their minds as to what reward they wished you to have and they said they were so grateful to you that they had already rewarded you as far as it was in their power, and that was to allow you to be their companion with their brother and parents for life. As to the other reward they said it was up to their father or their little brother Penrod.

For fully two minutes later that there was a clapping of hands in a deafening uproar from every one and the boy and girl scouts also cheered and waved a forest of pretty red yellow and purple and other colored flags. Then a still became quiet and Emperor Vivian rose to speak himself. Every one was now at full attention for when he speaks all must be as quiet as a mouse.

"I began" cannot find many words to say in behalf of this brave lad for the others have said them for me. But his reward had been voted for last night. At first it was he should continue on the full pay list all his life, and that in the boy scout troop he should be promoted at once to the rank of lieutenant colonel, three months hence to that of a boy scout general, and again in another three months to the rank of Chief general, put my daughters, my beloved wife, and Penrod, and my two grown brothers who will be here soon to see James they having been compelled to go away for several days, have won the votes of what they wish him to be. One of my own sons took sides with the Glandelinian cause because despite being born to me and my wife he at the time was born in Glandelinia city which of course I suppose does make him a Glandelinian. But just the same that makes him a traitor to God and us to side with such a wicked cause, and besides too he really is the most wicked of all the Glandelinian generals, and even if he did repent later on and we forgive him he by the law of Abbeinnia and all its people couldn't never be a prince for his treason, and we ourselves could not save him from death if he was caught. I have since he took sides with Glandelinia been compelled to disinherit him from all his princely office of Abbeinnia even though it was at the cost of our government. There is no man meaner to my daughters than he is or would be if he had them in his power, even though he be their eldest brother for he was the first born. God alone knows why my first born is so wicked but he is so dangerous that it must be God's Holy will of protection that prevents my daughters from ever coming into contact with him. They have never seen him since he left us did you Violet."

"No" she answered. "We would hate to meet with him now. He would be too dangerous and escape from him impossible. He is jealous of us too for it seems one of us is in his place since he was thrown out of our home, and he would do dreadful things to us if he had the chance. We were warned severely by you Father and Dargatoo to obey and keep away from him at all occasions, not to spy on him as that would be fatal, and we will never go near him. We will confess we are afraid too. He's no more dangerous than Killchild."

"Might said Emperor Vivian. "And you little girls could see that even you could not fill the vacancy so that is why you strove so hard to get the vote won on your side and Penrod won. It is there for a reward that James shall for reward in a leading you through take that office as Prince James the Second, as one of my sons is also James. And yet that office won't by no means deprive him of his own home life with his parents for his parents and whole family shall receive what elevations in rank in my Palace which can be found and all will occupy the place. Yes Mr James and as his father will be second lieutenant to my friend and the famous guardians of my daughters Jack Ambrose Evans the highest rank which any man can be elevated under me. Somebody has to fill that vacant space and it might as well be James. James Tim Greveton was one of the voters and so was Walter Starling. All the highest girl scout boy leaders and girls too also voted with Violet and her sisters and Penrod on the same issue. So James has won the highest honors than an ever be given to a boy and even a foreign lad too, but he has deserved the reward and has won it."

"We will also have a carnival in order to honor him of his bravery" said Jack Evans.

James was so overcome with surprise and pleasure that he could only stammer a word or two thanks, and Emperor Vivian, Jack Evans, the first, second, his colleagues and all the others including the boy and girl scouts warmly shook hands with him, and then Violet and her sisters took turns at kissing him on the cheek which indeed made him blush, then he was escorted back to the carriage, still in a state of great bewilderment at the honor which had been bestowed upon him. 2.2.2.2.22

As soon as the little girls, and Emperor Vivian and the two boys James and Penrod got in the carriage, then the boy and girls couples occupied in front and rear of it and followed it in procession toward where the great Festival was to be celebrated. With a word of whom to the horse the boy who drove the carriage halted first at the home of James where Emperor Vivian had his headquarters, Violet and her sisters were the first to alight from the carriage, and stood beside it while James came next, and then Emperor Vivian while Penrod had alighted on the other side. The boy was told to drive the carriage into its barn, and then to report to them.

While he was waiting for them to go inside the house first Penrod himself wondered.

"Now in the world did it happen to find a boy like James. One of the best friends and protectors of my sisters yet in the world. I wonder though what life and adventures they will see later on when our army moves from this city to obstruct My let's now moving down the Big Old Knoll Road toward Pandora. Well I suppose there is nothing for me and they to do but to make the best of a bad situation. But I would like to get my hands on the guy who invented wars. War comes from so many sinful people in the world playing the suicidal fool."

The who who had driven the carriage then reported to Emperor Vivian who despite his protestations gave him a large gold piece saying that they would not even allow any one to do service and not get something for it.

Then the march began for the Carnival or where it was to be held. This time Violet and her sisters, and the two boys rode the horses who see horses and twenty minutes later they were passing down a principal outskirt street of Pandora with its pretty white cottages and more pretentious residences set back from the street with beautiful with the content of lawn and May flowers.

Violet, and her sisters sighed happily as they breathed the fresh pure air.

"How different from the hot stuffy city. I pray God that we may be happy here in Father's army and forget the horrible past."

"Yes Violet said Penrod. I believe we shall be happy here. I am hoping that the worst of the times will be over and with James getting acquainted with his new position something tells me that my dear little sisters will have a good little new prince, for father has such difficulty in even trying to locate a good boy of holy and brave and courageous refinement and mental talent to help my little sisters in their adventures, and I am overjoyed that you have come to us. From what you have done for my sisters I know I and they and Father and dearest mother can trust you as we can trust an angel, and I am sure we shall be happy together."

"Indeed I feel at home with you and your father and ready Penrod, and since I had gone through the adventure with you sisters I have come to love them as if they were more than sisters or sweet hearts, for they are the seven dearest dearest little girls on the earth to my way of feeling."

"And we love you too" came the laughing answer from Violet, and her sisters.

As they continued on in their hearts, as they raised their eyes toward the blue sky they thanked God that the future seemed so bright.

"Our Dearest God in Heaven" they in a inwardly prayed "Our dangerous time this new state. He help us to lead him to love These as we love These and keep him good and happy for all he has done for us."

In half an hour they were close to the place where the Festival was to be held.

"Susan Farrell" Jennie Vivian said as she called one of the girl scouts to her. "Father John called to us last night before we went to bed and asked if we couldn't take charge of one of the refreshment booths at this great Festival, but as Father said we have not enough to help us, I told Father John I had a most efficient efficient girl scout who could be my helper. You will help us."

"But Princess Jennie" Susan faltered. "Do you think" a sudden wave of color flushed her cheeks. "For refreshment booth? Well, do you think, really think that I could do it."

Four beautiful little arms were flung about her and four or seven pleading laughing eyes looked into hers.

"Dear Susan you must take it please and help us."

"Well I'll try my best but it's such an honor to help you princesses that I do not believe I deserve it."

The Festival was to be held at night, every street leading into the festival grounds was a blaze of colored lights, red light, blue light, yellow light, green lights, orange lights, purple and other colors and a regular array of lights, prettily arranged amid the sparrows and banks of flowers. The booth occupied by Violet and her sisters was a marvel of unusual attraction, mostly no doubt because Violet and her sisters were in personal charge and no doubt looked like pretty human food angels. The food was a most rare and refined taste was evident, the delicate colorings, the subdued lighting effects, the snow white tables for the feasters. Violet and her sisters and Angelina Aronburg assisted by Susan and six other sweet faced girls and boys too and also by James and Penrod, each dressed in the Abbotinian clothing of citizenry here and their pretty foreheads bound in a garland ring of flowers, glided from table to table in childish happy enthusiasm, while Susan Farrol skillfully filled their orders. It was a novelty at this festival, yet one boy scout who was a foreigner and who had recently been scolded by Susan and who wished to get even, saw his tables empty and the choicest portions good naturedly demanding guests from the young waitresses in the refreshment booth got jealous and hated Susan.

"I certainly do not see why Father John ever gave that girl scout Susan Farrol charge also of the refreshment booth with the Princesses. Why she is in the army as a scout only for a few months if not more. I should not be surprised if there is some reason why she is doing here in Pandora away from general Vivian's army. Do you know?" he said to him co-worker. "I suspect something. My brother works in the scout troop post office, and he told me that he saw a post card addressed to her the other day. 'Mother dear - given you the post.' It said. Father peculiar it seems to me, and then to think that Father John or the Princesses had given her work as an assistant in the refreshment Festival booth. Very one knows that booth should bring in more than any other two booths combined."

"Now James Ward said the girl scout who was assisting him. 'Don't you remember that you are not acting like an Abbotinian should. You are jealous of her that in all become too you did deserve it a little the admonishment she gave you. You are too a foreigner. I am an Abbotinian. You brother had no right to read the post card. You are stabbing with you brother.'"

"Stabbing indeed. I am stabbing no one, and if you would care to know the truth that she is not what she seems."

"The word was hard and the tone bitter."

"Yes James, I do not doubt that. But I didn't know she had a mother that she only had a father and a mother. I think you are mistaken about the post card. She has no mother."

The evening went on and the Festival was a wonderful success. Father John beamed with holy pleasure and was surrounded by happy faces.

"Good idea Father the beautiful Princesses in the refreshment booth" an enthusiastic exclamation office exclaimed. "They emptied my pocket. They are making a great clean up. Keep them going three days and the whole city will be broke buying from them."

"Oh Princess Daisy and Heitie. Susan exclaimed as joyfully hugged by the two little girls. "It is so heavenly and I feel so happy. I have never been so happy before."

Bright tea-filled her eyes.

"You deserve it all dear. You are so generous too and so unselfish that you are bound to be happy in the case of the child scout troop. And by the way" he playfully added. "Henry Phillips one of the boy scout captains, asked Violet to day about the nice little girl assistant I have."

"Yes Daisy and you should have seen all the money he spent at our booth. I know he likes Susan because he hasn't left the booth yet."

Susan blushed, but it was a blush of pleasure. The energetic boy scout Henry Phillips had been interested in the booth occupied by Violet and her sisters and that night, and even they had noticed the look of admiration in his eyes that a little girl is not even slow to see in the eyes of a pure boy scout. The festival indeed was a wonderful success, and on the closing hour in a speech which captured his audience Penrod himself praised the work of those in charge of the various booths, but there was a smile of pleasure that lit his handsome features when he announced that the highest score had come from the large Refreshment booth, and consequently the diamond ring offered by Violet, and her sisters to the champion worker goes to Miss Susan Farrol."

James Ward alone did not seem to enthusiasm at the announcement.

"Just wait I will have an announcement to make very soon that will cause quite a different kind of enthusiasm."

"James Ward. This co-worker replied. "Why should we be envious because she had done more for God and the Princesses than any one else."

"For God and the Princesses. Wait and see. I should like sure to have the auditing of her military accounts."

"What do you mean as what do you mean?" asked the other in blank astonishment. "Do you mean to say that Miss Susan Farrol"

"I say nothing. Wait and see."

Three hours later after the Festival was over Susan happily contented was returning with two of her scouts from the booth. To night she was doubly happy for she knew that the little Princesses, who loved Holy Communion so well truly loved and trusted her, but there was another reason. Penrod had wished to see her and it was Catherine Vivian who had marked; Brothers dear Susan and we shall be so happy when she had been elevated in rank. She has done much for the scout troop already. Will you do it?" Penrod had turned with a quick smile of pleasure, and looked at Susan understandingly. Now radiant and happy she was passing the period of James home, when a familiar voice reached her sounded like James Ward.

"I really thought it was my duty to tell you that Miss Susan Farrol was hardly the proper person to have charge of your booth to night. I suspected her for a long while, but my eyes were finally opened by my brother. He told me of a postcard which came to Susan Farrol, stating that her mother forgave her the past."

Susan stood petrified. A cold clammy feeling swept over her body and she was unable to move. "I wrote" the voice in the room continued "to a friend in the city of Angelina Agatha, a military detective, and asked him to look up this girl scout. He found that she at times gave information to the enemy. At the city girl scout office he found that she was not listed among the White list of names but on a pink one which means--they could not recommend her, just listen to this letter."

Dear James Ward;

I looked up the history of the Farrol girl scout. You find nothing against her from those who knew her, but at Turner Grove, where she once worked as a girl scout official I found he listed among the purple and pink card. They not being sure of it would not give me no information but I know the colored card means that she can't be recommended. I say to put her down as a spy."

Susan was trembling. A faintness, a dizziness was upon her and she put out her hand and grasped the balustrade and she burst but crying softly. A voice, calm, very dignified and slow measured which sounded from Angelina Vivian herself was answering and very sharply:

"Master James Ward I and my sisters and brother here and also Father has listened to you with impatience, and now that you have finished I tell you that we do not believe a word of it of that ignominious letter. She has no mother and Susan has proved her true character since she has been a girl scout. We trust her."

Passing a my wagon drowned the rest of the words. Susan staggered down the stairs and went out, and back to her own room in another house. Blindly she threw what articles of clothing she could find into her satchel. With fingers hardly able to hold the pen she wrote a note and sent a boy scout to give it to the first princess he met with:

"Dear Princesses. I overheard James Ward. Good by, I'm going back to general Vivian. I will write and tell you all. S.F."

With a last look at the room where she had been so happy she stole down the back stairs and into the night.

"Oh my God must my whole life be shattered because of that slanderous boy?" she cried as she hurried down the street in the direction of the railroad station. Suddenly she drew back into the protecting shadow of a doorway, for she recognized the passing buggy speeding toward the princess headquarters. It was Walter Starling with Timothy Grosvenor, and Henry Phillips was with them and to night she would not be there. She must go it seems forever and leave the happiness that had come to her during these few short days in Pandora--and all because this boy to get even with her for the little admonishment she had given him him justly had caused her house of happiness to crash to the ground.

"Oh my dear God" she sobbed as she staggered on. I came from the Festival to night happy. You know know all things and that I am innocent as to what that boy says. I never even received such a postcard. This boy, this James Ward--is a daily communicant a foreigner too like me and yet he has ruined me unless the princesses won't believe him. Oh dear God don't let them believe it. I cannot--my God do not let me lose my faith. Don't let the good princesses believe it. It is all a lie."

Nearly a week passed, and James Ward again stood in the parlor of James Ward's home.

"Master James Ward" and this time it was Jennie, her own sister having gone out with Penrod and James Andrew, and her voice sounded very much offended;

"I have sent for you, because I wish to read to you two letters I have received."

"Dear Princesses, I am heart broken, and the tears stain the paper as I write this to you. Unintentionally I overheard the letter which James Ward read to you, and his statement that I was not a person to be trusted with the work in the Refreshment booth. When I left your headquarters my heart was full of despair, and to night as I sit in a room of General Vivian's headquarters with my father and the Nurse Sarah, I wonder what the future holds for me. My father insists stubbornly that I should ask for my resignation but General Vivian won't hear of it. My father and others can prove that the statement of that boy was not true. One evening at supper time, I slightly admonished him because he forgot to say his grace before meals. I suspected he would do this and he has. I desired to resign from the girl scout troop as what good is it for me to be one if I am to be in disgrace for something I'm accused of which I never did. No one in General Vivian's army knows of what I'm accused of Princesses, because if they did and wouldn't believe it they would also up in my behalf. Even after supper that evening I was so sorry for the slight scolding I had given the boy and met him after supper and told him I felt bad about it, but that any way he should not have forgotten to say his grace before meals. Why I am accused of being a spy is because I was entrusted with the combination of the safe which contained General Blain's nightingale plans. The day after I was not feeling well because the day before I believed I had overworked myself and I went home and was in bed for two days. When I did return I learned some Gladiolusian spy had learned the combination of the safe and broke in and stole the plans. General Vivian can prove it was not my fault. No one knew of it however but he and me and oh why should I now be branded to the world as a spy and a double crosser when I am not. Good bye, and say good bye for me to all the rest of my friends whom I love. Say good bye to your brother Penrod, to my dearest friend Mildred Manning, and to Henry Phillip whom I respect too much to ruin his life if he suspects now I did it. The future? God only knows the future. Tonight it is only black despair will not send my address, because I cannot hope to ever meet you little Princesses again until my good name is cleared. I'm resigning from the girl scout troop to night if General Vivian will let me. It is against my will but father is angry because I'm accused of something I didn't do and so is my nurse, and they believing you may have believed the boy, being such little girls as you are, have turned against you. I cannot charge that idea. Yet I hope you will not think that I misplaced the trust which my mistress put in me. But forgive father and my nurse. They don't understand you. I don't know what Gen. I'm going to do if General Vivian won't permit me to resign. But any way unless I'm cleared I cannot come back, will not come back to General or Penrod or Vivian's army and probably father won't let me leave. He is awfully mad and often says he believes you are not what is said of you. He is coming to see you and to raise can. Please try to reason with him Princesses. He is good, but he is dangerous now when he thinks you are in the wrong. It is all the fault of that bad slanderous boy. God forgive the little fool and save you from the effects of my father's wrath. But reason with him Princesses. He is dangerous when angry."

Susan Farrol."

"Have you shown that letter from the detective to others, after I begged you not to do so?" she asked.

"No Princess. I didn't dare for they wouldn't look at me. All the Vivianites don't like me now."

"James" and there was a sharp tone in Jennie's voice while her eyes had a peculiar flash in them. "May God forgive you for your foolish and sinful act, though we ourselves don't see where we should though we will on one condition. I'll state that condition later on. Do you not know that Catholic theologians say that one who reveals the secret sin of another commits a sin as serious if not worse than the one whose sin was revealed. You have blasted this little girl's reputation, just because you wanted to get even for the slight admonishment she gave you which was justified, and you have committed a sin more serious than some of those the worst of Gladiolusians committed. And you kneel at the altar railing morning after morning and now there were tears in Jennie's eyes at the thought of it" then came from God's Holy Table, and use the tongue upon which has rested the Body and Blood of your Saviour, to ruin the life of one of your own Nationality by such lies as you have told. This second letter tells all about you from Jack Saunders who has discovered and overheard your wicked plan to blast his reputation. On it is such forgiveness as you that drives souls from God and make a mockery of religion and your revenge only intended for the poor girl had even spread to me and my sisters. Before this outside of Jack Evans we had no better friend than Mr. Jack Farrol. He warned Catherine twice when we were in hopeless peril, showed her a way to save us. Things go good but go religious and beautiful he has sent us because we had been so good to his daughter though you win, he has turned over will to nag against us. Now we will brave as we are seek the protection of our father when that man comes in his anger. If he was in the right he would be justified against us, for we are a little girls who he tells us we should believe nothing that is not proved. We didn't, but she thought so. Suppose and went away and now because of you we are in a fine mess. I have sent for my two brothers to come in a hurry because we need them, and Penrod too will be by our side. Yet may God forgive you as I trust this poor child, whose life you have over will ruin if something isn't done will forgive you. He is too noble not to forgive you. But, and my sister won't."

The boy looked scared and downcast. But after a moment she added: "Unless you make a paragon, you will have to stand up for us at the time he comes and tell him it is all your fault. That we did not believe you and you are to find Susan Farrol and make amends before all the Vivianites who fortunately don't believe a word of it. If you don't you'll be removed out of your uniform and drummed out of camp in disgrace for that. I am sure, and thank God we won't order to face a firing squad which is the usual punishment for such an offense. You stand up and stand up and now crying now is a mortal sin, which if committed by a person much older than you would have faced the death penalty. And you too an officer's captain. But until the time comes till we have to meet the fury of that man because of you and folly you will have to consider yourself under arrest. Please hand me your sword."

The boy reluctantly did so. Jennie then called to some of the boy scouts and had him placed in solitary confinement in his own part of the camp while she threw herself upon her bed and wept bitterly. More for Susan than for herself. When her sister came home with James and Penrod she showed them both the letters, and after reading them they were that is her sisters were upset but Penrod was angry. But Penrod had a plan.

"We will test what kind of a character that man James' father and especially what sort of a heart" he said. "Until before he comes you little girls must continually appear at your best, but if he doesn't reason himself don't fear he can't do nothing to you. It is saddening that he should turn like that after he was so good to you little girls, but I suppose a father when he believes his little daughter has been wronged will take her defense. He will think too this it is the way you have shown your gratitude to him for what he did for you. If I had been you Jennie, would not have dealt so lightly with that little hoodlum. A gladiator is an awful offense especially if it is one to the grade of a mortal sin though of course you can use your own judgement. But the worse of it is he may have got you into trouble with his father for he thinks the world of his little girl." But I don't think he could do anything."

"He could accuse us of rash judgement" said Violet.

"I don't believe so" said James and she w. "Besides I believe the possession angels will take a hand in convincing him some way. Show him Jack Saunders' letter. That is one of the ways of convincing him. And I and Penrod and you father who overheard from that boy's letter can prove that you didn't believe a word of it. If he doesn't believe us then he will himself be unreasonable."

"When will he come?" asked Penrod.

"Susan in his letter didn't say. Maybe he father wouldn't let her tell. He may come at any minute to day. He may come to morrow."

"Did Susan's father ever see you my dear sister?"

"No" he never did," said Joice.

"Well" said Mildred Manning. "The sight of you I'm sure if he is a good reasonable man will cool him down. I'll bet if you little girls can't touch his heart then there is something wrong. But when he comes I wish he would bring Susan. But if trouble comes that boy will rue this I'll tell you." And Penrod said the last words hotly enough.

"Mildred Manning cried awfully that day Susan left" said Catherine.

"And Jack Saunders tried to comfort her but couldn't add Angelina. I told them that had I known she was in the house at the time I would not have let her leave so soon until I and my sister could have convinced her that we wouldn't believe a thing that is not proven. That detective letter she read to me is no proof."

"A nd no priest will give that boy Absolution until the paragon is made" said Daisy. "It is sure an awful shame. So unkindful a revenge over a trifling."

I hope it teaches him a lesson."

"I don't think I'll give him back his commission" said Jennie. "I'll send him back to private and let him work hard to get back his captaincy. I really ought not keep him in the troop at all. What say Fenrod?"

"If he reports give him another chance," he answered. "But otherwise do as you see fit. It is up to you."

"But there is no need of being afraid of Susan's father," said James. "I believe when he sees you he will calm down. Heaven knows only an angel possessed child could like you, and go through what you did. You say he never saw you before though he knows about you. That will make it better. I'll bet he will be afraid to approach you when he sees you in all your best attire which will show your beauty. The more I couldn't lose my sleep over it."

"We will try not to," said Violet. "But it is not that. We are distressed only over poor Susan. In the refreshment booth she was oh so happy as she worked so much for us. And now all that is spoiled, and what is spoiled for her is spoiled for us, because it hurt us too. But why did she so foolishly go away. Surely she should have had more confidence in us than that, though I suppose she didn't know us well enough. But had she been more wise and dared to see us in spite of that bad boy all would have been settled, and she would not have been so distressed. I was so mad at that bad boy and broken up I could have slapped him."

"Are you the guard sir in front of this tent?"

The girl scout looked quizzically at the man. He was respectfully dressed, looked a little right, and was sort of tall, but dignified in appearance as if he was a man who was pretty well off.

"I am," she answered.

"I would wish to see the Vivian Girl Princesses."

"You would have to have a important pass," said the girl scout. "As you are a stranger and even no soldier can see them without a pass I cannot understand how you can. But you may seek information inside the tent. I'll let you in, you may pass."

The man went in, and seeing by his uniform that there was a high rank girl scout officer in there he removed his hat as she rose from her table by which she was writing something.

"Well sir what would you wish please?"

He looked at her in astonishment and then said:

"Are you the little Annie Rooney girl whom Mrs. Meany used to be so cruel to?"

"No sir. My name is Ann is Rooney all right, but I do not know anybody by the name of Mrs. Meany and neither have I been in any other country but my own. What is it you wish to see me for. Hurry sir as I am awful busy."

"I would like very much to see Princess Violet, and her sisters."

"If you will have to have a pass, and identification papers."

"I could get any here."

"I should say not. You'll have to go to Miss Jennie Francis Turner to get a pass. He has the papers with their names signed by their own hand and written by ink which is impossible to erase. If you want to see them you'll have to prove to her your identity though and she'll ask you a lot of questions. There's a lot of red tape about getting passes, as so many spies have tried to harm them. You being a foreigner and a stranger might not even get a pass from her and she is very particular. But you might try. I'll give you directions how to get there. Go down this company street till you reach Company M of the 344th Infantry. There of course the army is all soldiery but she'll have her head quarters there. But you'll also have to have a pass to see her. But that I'll make out for you."

She took a slip of paper on which were printed words, wrote her name and ink on it, and then using a blue blotter handed it to him.

"You'll see a small wooden building on Galore Street" she said. "That's it. How far is it?"

"Only about two blocks. You can take a street car though if you are in a hurry. With my pass you can ride free."

He saluted her respectfully and walked out. He decided as two blocks were not far, and that he might get there in the time while he stood waiting for a car, he walked it. Then for a moment he stood before a small stone building. It was indeed very small only a one story affair, but who ever had a flower bed in front of it had had an eye for beauty. It was surrounded by a large flower bed covered garden with tall stately elm trees growing and a beautiful yellow fence around it (take a fit). At the gate he told the men sent there that he wished to see Jennie Francis, and as he produced the pass given by Annie Rooney they allowed him to pass in.

448

The guard at the door a boy scout this time ushered him in without question but told him he would have to wait for a few minutes, as Miss Turner was busy with other calls, and led him into the reception room while he went to report that he had come. He was surprised that he was not asked his name. But it is only up to the leader to do this. As he waited almost impatiently he saw a number of boy and girl scouts go in and out, and finally he heard foot steps approaching and into the room came a ten year old girl scout dressed like a princess almost. He was very sweet looking but there were appearances of her face that showed that in usual cases she was as good to you as she could be and not at all hard to get along with.

Before she could ask the question he said:

"Miss Annie Rooney sent me here saying I could get a pass to see the Vivian Girl Princesses."

She looked at him closely and then said:

"You would have to get yourself identified first. They are so often threatened by disguised foes that we cannot take chances with strangers. You look to me like an Irish boy. What is your name?"

"My name is Jack Michael Farrol."

"Jack Michael Farrol," our last name sounds familiar. You are the father of Susan Farrol?"

"Yes she is my daughter. I come to see about why she was suspected of double crossing the Vivian Girls, or why they believed that boy who told the lie."

"They did not believe him," Jennie shot back. "He is under arrest on the charge of slandering and had lost his commission as captain. You can't fool them. I'm surprised that you thought they believed it."

"Then why was she discharged?"

"She was not discharged. She was discharged from the girl scout camp here for fear the princesses would believe him."

"The man could not believe his ears."

"Then I must have almost misjudged the princesses" then he said. "I was really going to tell them a thing or two."

"Tell them a thing or two. Why you would have sure used the day" said Jennie. "I'm almost sharply. If a person does really commit an offense she was accused of they would have a right to discharge them. But if you were just going to scold the princesses over that, then you'll have to expect something before you'll get a pass from me. The idea."

"But hasn't a father the right to defend his little daughter when she has been wronged unjustly?"

"Yes, that is true, but you are the one starting on rash judgement not Violet, or her sisters. They didn't even believe the first letter, and it is her fault for going off as she did. Had she stayed and went in when the accusation was, there she could have stated her own side of the story and the boy would have got himself in trouble again. There is no one that can do this. The princesses, that angel possession condition can make them see at once whether you tell lies or not. Partly the supposed to be detective letter almost hood winked them but as they doubted it they secretly had the letter investigated, and ha, ha found there was no detective by that name or such an address. That letter the boy made up and wrote himself. You ought to have known that the princesses don't jump to every conclusion there is when you accuse any one before them they'll look very closely at your very face and eyes and can tell whether you are telling the truth or not. Plain Night Linger reported to me the papers were not stolen. Emperor Vivian has them. The general took them out of the safe himself and gave them to the king. And the boy takes advantage of that stating she sent the papers to the enemy. What till Emperor Vivian hears of it. He won't be easy on that boy. If you go decently before the princesses I'll give you a pass since you are Susan's father but you must not blame them for it as they are not the cause of Susan's misery but that little rascal. And they cried too when they learned Susan went away on over hearing the brattle. I'll have to make a separation within two days, and get Susan back here again or I'm instructed to have him drummed out of the city and army in disgrace."

"I'll admit I am mistaken and that I would not do it," said Mr. Farrol. "I don't wish to blame any body who is not responsible, but if I see that boy I'll tell him a thing or two for under no conditions will I have my daughter's reputation ruined. I don't know when she can come back, as the shock she received has made her ill."

"Well I'll give you a pass then" said the girl scout leader. "But if she is not too ill to come have her here as soon as possible. The news that she was not believed by the princesses and that they cried at her departure ought to bring her around. But you'll have a long way to get there and have to take a car. I'll give you the pass and the address."

It took her some time after she went into the room to get the pass and then she wrote out the address of the place. and the street it was on, and then coming handed both papers to him. He thanked her warmly and saluted and then she opened the door for him but told him again warningly not to say anything out of the way to the Princesses, though she finally added with a smile:

"I don't believe you will have the heart to then you see them, you never seen them yet have you face to face?"

"No, this will be my first time..."

"I want to warn you though," she continued that when you present the pass to the guard it must be verified. But don't worry it's all right and I'll convince them when they phone me."

He thanked her and bid good by again and soon was on the street. As he was surprised that it took him an hour to reach the street indicated, and then soon was standing before the gate of the building used by the Emperor as his headquarters. The guard looked at the pass but had it brought to the officer of the guard who called Jennie Turner up on the phone and receiving an answer that it was O.K. Mr. Farrol was allowed to pass in. But on this day Violet and her sisters no any one were home, and the orderly told Mr. Farrol that he would have to make the best of it for they would be gone for the whole day. In fact it would be late at night before they would return, for they had all gone out scouting. This news was a great disappointment to Mr. Farrol but he had to make the best of it and said that he would come again the following morning.

"They will sleep late to morrow morning," said the guard, "and will not be disturbed by no one. Is there anything important that you wished to see them for?"

"I'm Susan Farrol's father," said the man. "And I came to see if my daughter couldn't be restored to her proper position. I came to prove that she is innocent." "It is too bad," said the orderly, "that you didn't first sent a letter and give them the date of time you were coming. Then you would have found them here. Did you come all the way from where you are located?"

"I came from a hundred miles from here. Susan is not in the army. She is home. General Vivian sent her back to me until she got well. She is badly upset because she believes the Princesses believed the boy when he accused her of turning to the enemy side."

"If she had stayed here she would have found out the truth," said the orderly. "It is too bad, but you will have to come back to morrow afternoon. I will tell them you were here and then they'll be expecting you."

Mr. Farrol then saluted the orderly and went out. But he wondered where and how he could find lodging in this part of the city when soldiers occupied most of the vacant houses. To go to the main camp he could not as the army wouldn't room him there as he was not a soldier. After leaving Andrews house he looked at a number of houses and inquired but could find no vacancies. He finally thought of inquiring at one of the other girl scout headquarters, and finally reaching one, for he could tell by the girl scout flag flying there, for only girl scout leaders were in this part of the city. He inquired of the sentry on duty if he could get one of the girl scout leaders to direct him to a place where he could find lodgings for the day and night for so many houses were occupied by soldiers and child scouts here.

"I can't leave my post to go and see him," said the sentry who was a soldier. "If you got a pass I can let you go in and ask him."

"I've only got these two passes," said the man and he produced them.

"Are you admitted into the headquarters of the princesses?"

"Yes, they are out and won't be back until late at night. The Emperor and all are out scouting so I heard."

"Well if you were admitted then I suppose the pass has been verified," said the guard. "Let me see them."

The man produced the passes, and after looking them over, the soldier handed them back and said:

"This pass only admits you at their headquarters, but if you were allowed access there then you may go in here too. So you may go. Go to that front entrance, and ring the bell. There is no guard there as none are needed."

The man had a long walk down a beautiful gravel side walk but he finally reached the house, and ringing the bell as directed. In a minute a boy scout came to the door and then the man to make sure of admittance showed the pass.

"You've got the wrong place Mr. Farrol," said the boy. "This is the headquarters of Miss Mary Stank Stanok. That of the princesses is about two blocks from here on the next carline street."

"I have been there," said Mr. Farrol. "I wished to see this girl scout leader. I wish to ask of her a favor if she can do it."

"Oh all right. Step in. I'll lead you to her room."

Soon they were standing before a door and the boy knocked three times as was the rule.

"Come in," came a girl's voice. The boy stepped in first, telling the man to wait outside. Then he reappeared and said:

"Go in. She'll see you."

Mr. Farrol then reappeared soon standing before her. He was not pretty to his vision but she was nice looking nevertheless, and graceful and had a face that told him she was real blooded Abbeinnian. Her hair was however done up in the old country German style, and though it may be called black there was more dark brown than black. She seemed to be about eleven years old and looked some what dignified and severe. But she greeted him respectfully and motioned to him to be seated.

He then stated why he came to the city, telling the full details and then stated that he found it almost impossible to find lodgings in this part of the city as it was so full of soldiery and children scouts and asked whether she could help him find a place that he could occupy until to morrow afternoon. He said that he was willing to pay any price for the lodging that would be asked.

"There was no need of your coming to plead your daughter's case," said Mary Stanok first. "The princesses didn't believe what she was accused of, and know that the boy was lying and placed him under arrest. I doubt if he will ever be a boy scout again because I'm afraid his former comrades won't have him among them for doing that. But as to a lodging I don't know where you can get one. Unless you go to the part of the city where the people are more ad but as you say that is so far away and would cost too much to travel back and forth. He looked at her with a list watch. Then she suddenly thought. "I'll tell you what. I'll send you to Miss Mildred Manning. I'll write her a note and she'll take care of you seeing you was her friend's father. She is not far from here and will take only a two minutes walk. I'll give you the address."

He then hastily but neatly wrote a short note, stamped it, printed her name and then gave him a card with the address.

"You can see her and I believe she'll help you."

"Could you make me a pass to her place?"

"No, it is not necessary. That pass to the headquarters of the Princesses will take you any where without question. Use that."

"Thanks Miss Stanok," said the man. "I hope you all the good luck in the world."

"You deserve it more than I because you are the father of such a good boy," said she as she too like the others opened the door for him.

He was not long reaching the headquarters of Mildred Manning and to his surprise it was a big tri colored tent in the yard of a home which was also occupied by other child scout offices. He presented the pass to the guard who looked queer and then laughed.

"I'm sorry sir," he said "but you got the wrong place."

"I'm wishing to see Miss Mildred Manning Mr. SENTRY. I know where the princesses live."

"You have the wrong place," said the guard. "There it is. In that large white house across the street. Her sisters live here especially Aggie."

The man some what dumbfounded slowly went across the street, presented again the pass, and this time was admitted. To his surprise he saw the address was the same here also. As he went in he wondered exceedingly if Miss Mildred Manning would know him, and if she did would she be the same to him as she had been when she went with Susan so often with him before his little daughter became a scout.

He thought he would have to ring a bell but there were two guards at the door, and these were also men. However as long as he was able to pass the outside guards they did not question him but greeted him respectfully and opened the door for him. But inside he was greeted by a girl and boy scout who respectfully asking him whom he wished to see led him to the room where he stated his errand and who it was that he came to see. The girl scout did not knock at the door however but went in the boy himself staying out side.

"What are you waiting for?" said the boy grinning. "That is he go in."

The man surprised went in not having recognized her in the dark hallway. She at the moment not looking up, but glancing at something important on her table respectfully motioned him to a chair. Then she sat down and looking up said:

"What is it you wish Mr. Farrol? I'm----" she got no further but looked at him closely.

"Why if it isn't Susan Farrol's good father," she exclaimed in joy and bewilderment. "Thank God you have come to our camp. I had so badly wanted to see you since poor Susan went away." and she went to him quickly and took him by the hand and he shook it in a friendly manner. She then moved her chair closer to him and sat on it.

"Oh I miss her so much since she left." said Mildred and tears sprang to her eyes. She was an angel to me since the day we first met, and poor Violet and her sisters thought the world of her and done many things for her. Oh why was she so foolish not to have confidence in them, in spite of what she overheard. They didn't believe it. Only think he has only to move now to make a paragon and to day he said he can't do nothing because he is a prisoner. I told him he should write a confession to Susan, telling him what happened for his life, and to ask her to come back and make the princesses happy again. He did write but he believes she won't get it by to morrow. Would you not please, please, please bring poor Susan back. She is innocent and Violet and her sisters said so. They didn't believe that boy. They could see he was lying and oh they are so upset and angry. Had he been a man he would have faced a firing squad for that sin. Please could not tell your daughter and have her come back."

"For a moment the man's face was black with anger."

"Only to move now" he sneered. "I ought to have known and I'd intercept that letter so it wouldn't reach her. Then see how he'll look. He doesn't deserve to remain in the scout troop. But yes I'll tell her as soon as I get back. But the princesses are not in camp and I am also in a jeopardy. I cannot find any place to locate myself until to morrow afternoon, and Miss Mary Stanok sent me here with this note. I was hoping you could find a place for me to spend the rest of the day and night. I'll pay well for it."

She took the note and read it. "You can have a room here as there is a vacancy" she said. "I believe she knew that and knew that I would recognize you and therefore sent you here. I have plenty of room in this house, or would you rather sleep in the tent with us. We could fix up a good bed and you would have more comfort so stuffy and warm in this house."

"I think the tent would be best" said M-Farrol. "How much would you charge?" "Get Susan back here is all I asked" she said smiling sweetly because she too was a very pretty little girl.

"That depends on her" said M-Farrol regretfully. "I can only do so I believe by getting one of the princesses to either write to her or come and see her. They couldn't now because Susan didn't give an address when she wrote about her innocence. Of course at first I suspected that they had used rash judgement and I was awfully angry at them. I insisted to Susan to resign but I found out once a boy or girl goes into the scout troop no resignation will be accepted on a condition of this kind, and General Viviana angrily refused when I came to him about it. He said that I and she should use reason, and should remember and it is true too I know, that it is a lot of red tape for a foreign girl or boy to get into the troop of scouts, and that if it had not been for you Mildred, she would never had got in. For signs are not wanted at all now unless they are as good as Abbiecnnians. The General spoke of our gratefulness, and this is what he said which after that partly convinced me Violet and her sisters did not send her off. The general said to my little daughter."

"Missie Farrol" and his voice was calm and cold. "I understand that because of what you heard a boy tell to princess Argeline, that you suspect they will punish you, and that you now intend to resign. And there was such an emphasis on the word 'Resign' that scared her and at first aroused my opposition. Then she said 'I did not intend to but my father wishes me to resign.' Then she said 'Resign? Missie Farrol, you have shown lack of confidence in the princesses who have been so good to you, and your resigning will offend them so and break their hearts more than anything else we did. That will show on your part our gratefulness. It is because of your lack of confidence that you left so hastily when you overheard that boy tell princess Argeline about you. I cannot let you resign. If you do so all of the scout troop will have nothing further to do with you if you hurt the princesses that way. I am sure they do not believe that boy. He has no proof."

Then I broke in angrily. "I'm sure they did listen to him. He had a letter. That seems to prove the lie, and it is injustice that they should believe it. 'Injustice' He said, and he rose from his seat and looked me in the eye. 'Do you sir a foreigner who do not know the princesses speak of injustice when you don't even know the meaning of the word.' Then he turned to Susan and said 'Susan I will not allow you to commit a disgraceful act of injustice by resigning' and he looked at her with those cold military penetrating eyes, and he was so calm and reserved Mildred, that at first it angered me more but left me helpless. You ask if it is injustice for your father to try to get you to resign from a troop of boy and girl scouts who had been like little boy and girl angels to you. It is for you who is supposed to be such a good girl and injustice deliberately to break the hearts of of the Vivian Girl Princesses, who have had such love and confidence in you and for you, and when your own conscience tells you, that if you do so, you could not then under any condition come back again no matter how you regretted it and wanted to return. Your resignation however would not be accepted by the highest authority on your grounds, and for even the attempt you would make yourself in the future unworthy of the love and respect of the girl and boy scout who are here in the army and elsewhere and elsewhere. He then turned to me and said "You little girl cannot resign on that pretext. Better listen to reason find out the true details and you both won't regret the action. Be faithful to your commission and to them, and your conscience, go back to Empress Viviana's army then all will still more respect you and congratulate you and for you across you had you will be still more worthy of their love and confidence. If they have temporarily believed the boy, and it turns out that he told lies as you said, they will have their eyes opened to what a sin and brazen defiance of his conscience he had lead under the pretext of duty, and then they can no longer respect him much less love him. Take my advice don't do this rash thing." And that he has been the cause of my being here."

"You ought to have sent a notice or a telegram" said Mildred, and then you would not have been kept waiting like this. They would have remained home. They may come back later too than is said, or not at all if they were captured. Scouting is dangerous. But I have been praying that they will safely return."

As usual the next morning dawned dark and smoky in the skies again, and very warm. At about ten o'clock in the morning M-Farrol again presented himself to the sentries at the gateway of the princesses headquarters but the guards were different this time. But as the Officer of the guard had signed his name to the pass, showing it had been verified he was allowed to pass through the soldier said:

"I doubt if you can see them though."

"Why have they not returned?" he asked looking a little worried now as he thought of the dangers of scouting.

"Oh yes, they returned four hours earlier than expected but they all of them I believe did not rise yet. But if you don't mind waiting you can go in and they'll receive you soon."

When M-Farrol was at the door he was admitted by James himself who looked at the man curiously. Then he asked:

"Who do you wish to see sir?"

"The Vivian Girl Princesses."

James looked at his watch just as his sister came out to see who had come:

"Why they are not home" he said.

"Not home? Why the guard said they were in bed."

"James looked sober and thoughtful."

"I'm sorry but if you are impatient to see them go to St Vincent's Church. They have been there since five o'clock this morning and have not come yet. Poor little angel angels. I'll bet they were so tired they fell asleep in the church."

"James said his sister: "If you wish I'll go and inform them they have a visitor."

"No I'll go" said James. "You show the man into the reception room."

James put on his hat and went out, and the man waited while the girl sat down by the window.

"Did they come home late" he asked.

"Why you mean last night? Why no sir. They were not expected until midnight but they were in bed by ten. They found out lots and Empress Viviana is going to act. A part of the army starts to advance to morrow. You must remember it is Sunday and the little princesses intended to attend every mass to day James attended the first four and had to leave to give mother and father a chance to go. But they were tired and Father objected to their getting up so early with him but it did no good. They'll sacrifice anything for God and His Blessed Mother. It would be a joke though if James found them asleep in the church."

It was just about ten to twelve, noon when M-Farrol who was sitting by an open window saw James come down the side walk, and smiling after him were seven little--which he first believed to be real little angels all dressed in white and wearing saucy little military hats. He was astounded and a strange feeling of awe came over him.

"Are they the princesses?" he asked.

The girl looked out the window.

"Yes" she said getting up. "Father is coming too. He is in the room. I'll have to lead them in."

She went to the door and reached it just as one of them was going to ring the bell...

Violet was the first to enter followed by her sisters, Penrod and James.

"And so you thought we fell asleep" said Violet as she met him. "We were held spell bound by the High Mass that we couldn't think of nothing else. Was he waiting long and who is he."

"I believe he was waiting for twenty minutes," said James. "It was at eleven thirty when he came. I don't know who he is but he must be all right for his Pass was verified. He was here yesterday so the sentry told me but no one was home. Then we went out scouting my father and mother went elsewhere and no one was home when he came."

Violet and her sisters however did not go into the room where he was but to their room with Penrod sending James with the information that he would be summoned as soon as they prepared themselves to meet him for they had a suspicion who he was. When James told him he believed the little girls with their father when he came home would eat dinner first but they don't eat until nine. He was only kept waiting for about three minutes and then James said he could come and to his surprise the man first straightened his tie, and combed his hair again before he followed him.

When James ushered the man into the room where the Vivian girls were the stout stood speechless with admiration, awe and a sudden love. How could he come with even an intention for the slightest admonishment to such good lovely angelic little creatures. Besides before this he had already been convinced.

Seated by a table was Penrod.

For a full moment he stood looking at the little girls unable to find a word to say anything. Surely to this man they did not seem anything but unreal or as to say not of this world, and they appeared strangely transformed or something, and there was a strangeness in the room too which he could not account for and which made him feel strange and a little afraid. For that moment he didn't in his heart believe they were little girls but some angelic beings of Heaven having taken that form for surely little girls could not look like that and cause such a strange feeling for any one in the room. Finally it was Daisy who spoke up first.

"What's the matter Mr Farrol. What do you look at us that way. Are we ghosts?" and she smiled.

"No," he finally said "but are --you--- you the famous princesses that I--- I have --heard so much --about."

Violet and her sisters giggled, they couldn't help it to see their lives, for the man looked dreadfully embarrassed.

"To get it" said Angelina. "Be at home with us since you came to see us. We are not spirits but little girls. There is nothing to be so awed about us. There is a chair Mr Farrol. Sit down and make yourself at home and tell us why you came. We were expecting you to come but not so unexpectedly as we would not have kept you waiting for a day."

"I came to vindicate my little daughter Susan to --prove her innocence--- but I see it was not necessary," he said. "he is ill from the shock but I believe she'll be all right. Here is that boy James."

"Violet and her sisters first looked at each other, and then Jennie looking sober said "Gorry Mr Farrol we don't allow any one to see that boy. He is not fit for you to go and see. He is under strict guard in his own tent. I took away his captiancy yesterday afternoon and placed him under arrest under charge of slander with intent to kill a good little girl scout character and reputation. We suspected it even when he first told us the lie for I and Angelina who looked at him mostly closely then could see it in his eyes that he was lying. We did not do anything to him then because we wanted to catch him red handed. Then Jack Saunders note came to me and just as I had sent for him when I was alone my sisters being out with James your daughter's letter came and verified our suspicions and I placed him under arrest. I must confess I gave him a week or so for reparation, but Penrod told father, was a little too easy with the bad boy, and father severely took a hand, so we have nothing to do with the punishment of the boy. He sent a scout yesterday asking me when we got home for from the scouting tour to intercede with father but as yet we have not done a thing. Of course by pleading we could turn father over to our cause, but why should we? He going to Holy Communion. Communion every day and then leading God's holy table he goes and slanders a good girl scout, and causes her to be broken down and ill, and us misery too by such an act. We do not believe we could do any thing now because that is up to the boy and girl scouts, and when I asked Jack something about whether he would like to see James back again, he turned his back upon me upon me. That is a boy scout's salutation of "I don't want him." If all are of the opinion and won't be turned the foolish sinners is out of luck and we will not do anything for father can't either then. They say he did that because Susan slightly admonished him for sinning his Grace before meals because he was in a hurry to eat but as far as we see it may have been envy. We had a festival in celebration of this little boy here who done a lot for us" indicating James and her, and I and my sisters and Susan with several others were in charge of the main refreshment booth. I believe and so do my sisters and Penrod that so many more came to our booth than his, because of us, than any other reason, but as his assistant told me he was envious of Susan and she suspected he would plan revenge for he talked very bitterly about Susan. That explains it all. Father looking up a record of slander says to us the sin committed was very grave, very severe and could have caused even him severe punishment. Had you poor little girl only come in or not overheard him she would not have had to have all this misery for nothing. We would give anything to have her back with us, and we will do all our selves that is possible to make a reparation if he doesn't. Put the way boy and girl scouts are we could explain---"

"Let me say" put in Penrod. "Go see sir in Abbisanna among us boys and men we look upon little girls and young and old women as something unusually sacred. We would never forgive a fist blow struck at a girl or woman. A slander is a worst one than from a fist, and there for we therefore believe James Ward is out of luck. The strange conscience is we have another boy by the same name which I believe was with Timothy Groveton and others during the Bee line raid, and he is the hottest and said if he came back they'd run James out of the city. We might give the fool a chance and see if we can pacify them. If not it ain't our fault. He brought it on himself and that will be his punishment."

"I'm suspicious of that my self" said Mr Farrol. "In camp and in the city I met with a lot of boy and girl scouts passing me in various directions and they look more or less sullen as something had gone out of their life. Mildred Manning is upset over Susan going and without her knowing it, found her crying for her last night. When I came I and my House keeper Sarah brought Susan to Pandora with me to one of the hospitals to have her brought around for the shock had made her quite ill. The doctor told me that only a good nurse could bring her round, now Princesses I know about you and have seen with my eyes what good little girls you are. I will confess though at first my coming was going to be strictly hostile because I thought you had been unreasonable and had believed that boy after all she had been to you and done for you, but I see it was I who was deceived. But Princess Argeline ah---see which one of you is Princess Argeline?"

"I am" said Argeline.

"I wished to ask how was it that the letter from the detective didn't fool you."

"I could not say at first that I was not fooled on that," said she. "But I could see in his eyes that he was lying, and thought to have that letter investigated before I or any of my denisters would approach him. Then I learned what had happened concerning Susan, that she had overheard and was broken hearted, then I took sick when my sisters came home and found out what was the matter with me and why I was weeping so they too were upset and Penrod was so sore as a bull, and I couldn't blame him and she looked lovingly upon him" he hates like poison to even see a tear in our eyes. "Well some how or other he got hold of that letter from the detective", and a cast of letter too, and having a piece of hand writing of the boys in his possession discovered that the boy had forged or as you call it wrote that letter himself. In the meantime not knowing what Penrod did, father telephoned to Angelina Agathia, and found there was no such detective or no such address. The small note Susan sent us made us feel doubly worse. Well though though we did nothing then, we had that boy secretly and closely watched, then came Jack's note, and the testimony of James Ward's girl helps, and then what made us feel worse was Susan's letter which came when Jennie alone was home."

"I felt like taking drastic measures" said Jennie "but decided to wait until father came home. When he did we showed him the detective letter" Susan's note, and letter from Jack's confession. "Then father was angry and ordered the boy to be watched closely. When Susan was gone, and the sad news was spread of what had happened, they seemed of course indifferent, and said nothing much, but when the time came for meals that sad evening no one could eat. They didn't even answer the mess call, and when questioned by the Mess Sergeant and his assistance they all broke down and cried bitterly. No I'm afraid they won't have nothing to do with James. We might try but as father said he ain't worth our consideration as it is a sinful blow struck at us too."

For a moment Susan lying on her bed in a Hospital hardly did not stir. She had laid partly asleep but her face showed she had been crying. Finally the Nurse shook her a little harder thinking to herself "Poor little girl. She won't have occasion to feel so any more." Susan dear wake up. Here are visitors."

Finally she came to herself and look up. Beside her bed stood her father. At the other side of the bed stood what seemed to be seven tiny little angels. "Here are your friends" said her father. "My poor foolish little girl. They never believed that boy."

Susan looked aghast at first and soared but then the fact that they came to the hospital to see her and with her father, and that they looked so sober so sober proved that they were sincere. Four of the little Princesses sat on her bed and Jennie and Violet caressingly took her white hands in theirs and Jennie said;

"You must come back to us Susan. Don't let this upset you so. Had you come in when you overheard that boy you would not have suffered like this. For all you have done for him and tears rolled down Jennie's cheeks" how could we believe that boy, Angelina that day could see in his eyes he was lying. Come back to us. He won't harm you any more. And Jennie put her arm around Susan who now was weeping, but a weeping which would do all the good in the world for her, and Jennie and her sisters cried too. After a while when Susan felt relieved, and Violet and her sisters to the relief of the other good patient were themselves again one of the patient said;

"That certainly was a dirty trick that boy played Princess. The poor little girl was in a deplorable condition. The doctor got her a little to herself by continually saying that it couldn't be possible that the dear princess could have believed it. We are glad you good little girls have come. You have done her a world of good."

"We are glad we came" said Violet. "We left home about an hour after dinner to day and with her father came here."

Joice had Susan ring for the nurse and when that good woman came Daisy asked;

"Could Susan come with us to our own home. We could take better care of her with us with her. She will soon be all right."

"I will have to find out from the doctor who attends her" said the Nurse. "I'll inform the Sister in charge of this floor and she'll call him."

It was fifteen minutes however before the nurse returned. With her was the doctor who looked with astonishment at the seven beautiful little girls. And he too felt queer, and also in such a way that he could not refuse their request since he saw they could do her more good than he could.

"Yes" said the Doctor, "you good little angel princesses can do her much more more good than a hundred doctors like me can. He turned to the Nurse and said; "It is best that she go right away. They can take her on a stretcher. We have our handsome carriage waiting outside" said Violet. "Our brother is driving it. I believe he is getting worried for we told him we wouldn't be long. Can we call to him from a window" she asked.

"Where is he at?" asked the doctor.

"At the front entrance," said Catherine.

"I'll see that he gets a word that you're taking her home," said the doctor. "Then he'll have a seat prepared for her."

Penrod was indeed elated when he got the news and he was ready when the Doctor opened the door and Susan's father carried her down the few front steps and placed her in the carriage. Then there was a hearty good by to the doctor the little girls got in, and then Susan's father, and after some cheery words between them and the nurse and doctor the carriage was soon on its way. It was a long distance from Andrew's home to the hospital and so it was nearly evening before they came within sight of it.

James Andrews was the first to meet them as Penrod drew up at the gate. James was surprised to see the new comers with Mr. Farrol and he led the way as he brought the little girl up the steps. Violet directed him to a room which was vacant near their others and her sisters, and she was laid gently on the bed. Violet and her sisters and also Penrod remained in the room to see that Susan was comfortable.

Penrod did not remain long, but went out softly with the purpose to tell his father that the little girl was home with them and was much better now. Mr. Farrol didn't hesitate in coming.

"It is a blessing that my six daughters had the chance to bring her here" said the good King. "Every body was worried about her, and there will be joy among all the child scouts when the announcement is made. He stood by the bed looking down upon the little girl who tried to smile up at him. "We are all agreed that this happened" he said to her looking down upon her affectionately. "But don't you worry Susan. Not a word of it was believed for my dear good little daughter knew the brat was lying. But we are surprised that you didn't have more confidence in them."

"At first" she said tearfully "I didn't think. To hear him tell Angelina that it oh hurt me so. I didn't think or know whether they would believe him. But I do must forgive him but oh I know all the others won't I'm sure."

"Why did he do it?" asked Penrod.

"He envied me because the large refreshment booth took in most of the customers."

"And they came mostly because of my own little girl" said Mr. Farrol.

"That was the meanest trick that ever was known yet. I don't believe the meanest Glandelinian would play a trick like that. The soldiers who took him in hand sure gave him a good sound whipping, and took his uniform away from him. For my part I am not in favor of his returning even if he would be repentant for I wouldn't trust him again. At little daughter I'm afraid you don't see it that way."

"Suddenly came a voice in Jennie's right arm mysteriously and sweet;

"Don't take him back. Pity your poor friend Susan. They all won't have him and they're justified."

The words only took the time one could speak that sentence and Jennie smiled though tears were in her eyes and she said;

"Father you I and my sisters and Penrod are one. The offense is too severe. He may be forgiven if he is so sorry but come back he cannot."

"It is good though to see what the boy and girl scouts say" declared Penrod. "We can consult the leaders to morrow. They know how all their followers feel and will tell us."

So it was settled.

Two days later Susan felt much more like herself and when James sister brought in to her a good steaming hot supper and arranged so she could eat it in comfort she was able to eat better than she had since the day the sad event happened. After the supper hour was over Violet and her sisters again came in to see her, while Penrod and James dressed now in their military uniform when to see some of the boy and girl scout leaders to have them assemble all the others on the morrow after breakfast. Violet and her sisters entertained Susan until Susan felt much better and was soon asleep to the great comfort of her father who had not seen her smile since that time until to day. This of course to say was the same large room which they and Penrod and James occupied for sleeping. Soon some of the little girls went to bed after their night prayers but their sisters remained up a little longer.

Word also had been sent at once to Mildred Manning that Susan was back and in the headquarters of Princess Vivian and her sisters. However she did not get the news until late that evening, and though she was almost impatient to see her she knew she was too late to go that time and that she must wait until the morrow. She would come and see her then.

A little later after breakfast the next morning, all the boy and girl scout officers were assembled in a large circle in the big grassy yard of Andrews home. Violet and her sisters and Penrod and also James with Susan were seated in the middle, and Mildred Manning was beside her having been the first one to arrive. Timothy Groveton was forced however to be a little late, and therefore while they were waiting for him to arrive Mr. Farrol told of the condition of his little girl from the shock of the lie, and that at first she had been so prostrated that he feared greatly for her health. Finally when Mr. Farrol was through Tim finally came into the yard.

Then when he had seated himself by some of the little girls Violet herself always chosen the leader of her sisters, by her sisters stated the circumstances. He did not take very long and finally she ended with saying;

"and we wish to find out the decision as to what all the rest say."

"They don't want to even see him again" said Tim. "Of course if he has to come back nothing will be said, but they will have no use for him and he won't be considered a coward or respect. Of course it is up to you and your sisters Violet."

"Then he is out of luck" said Penrod. "I knew he would meet bad luck sis, because in doing wrong to Susan, he also did wrong to you and my other dear sisters by making you feel so bad. Therefore he cannot return to the scout troop."

"But what can we do with him" said Joice. "We can't send him home now as he lives far away, and as it is said his father is a decent man we cannot justly deport him. To send him home in these times might place him in peril, as the enemy are securing all part of the country."

"Put him among the refugees" said Mr. Farrol.

"The refugees wouldn't have him among them either," said Mary Statten. "I overheard conversation among some of the boys and girls there." "But then we are in a hole ourselves," said Argeline. "What are we to do?" "Keep him in solitary confinement in this house," said Jennie Turner. "Oh indeed?" sneered Penrod. "What a suggestion. We wouldn't have him here where I wouldn't give him a room as I hear he is not repentant of it, whether that is true or not but I heard he wouldn't give in to a priest."

"I went to try to convince him of his folly," said Argeline. "Aronburg and no did Argeline riches, and her sister Jennie. In fact James did not even want to see us but of course being a prisoner now in his tent there was no avoiding us. I could see the frank boy of the last season had been replaced by an unhappy James. Then came the moment I believe when a Guardian angel had tried to lead him to a range of things. I told him I would bring him a priest and if he was sorry for the sin he could confess it. He did not say a word. I wonder if any of you boys and girls scouts and you dear princesses have ever seen a group in the Metropolitan Museum of Art in Argeline's Agathia city."

"I did once," said Penrod. "It is called 'the two Natures in man' and the sculptor has represented the eternal struggle as a wrestling to a finish between two great big wrestlers. In the group, Man's lower nature is down but not out. Man's Higher Nature stands over the prostrate form and I came away wondering which will finally deliver the fatal blow..."

"Well," said Argeline Aronburg, "I believe such a struggle was going on in James. I could see it by his eyes and I said a silent prayer to his and my Guardian Guardian Angel to get him the grace to be part of his trouble and allow a priest to see him. He finally said he would but that his sin was unforgiven and that he would not receive Absolution. In the calm stillness of that glorious evening small white clouds glided along the northern horizon. A shell-toned bird flew above my tent, and some hopeless beginner's beginner was making wailing notes on a saxophone. The shouts of some distant ball players came to us softened by the distance, while a singing crowd of K.P. were going about their detail with more energy than ham-money. Then their alleged melody was toned down by distance. Finally the priest came, and said 'what do you want to see me for?' Father I felt a pang for I understood this question at night. James foolish had had refused this opportunity that had come to him. I was still there waiting till he would decide to go to Confession before I would go out."

"I said James do you know what I have been thinking about?"

"No Miss Aronburg."

"Well there has been running through my mind the memory of a figure that a boy once used in his English Composition. What to hear it?"

"I guess so Miss Aronburg," he answered looking more shyly as Father remained.

"He was writing on 'how Holy Communion helps me.' and he wrote I always think of the letters H.C. as standing for high current, and think of myself as being charged frequently and being strong all the time. As soon as I weaken I re-charge myself and do not fear any temptation. James I don't want to pry into your private affairs without your permission, but you won't mind a good friend asking you to be faithful to Confession and Holy Communion this season as last?" At once his eyes blazed sullenly and he said:

"Miss Aronburg I made my Easter duty."

"You are the only one since then who had quit Daily Communion. And this is May. Listen James. If I leave your tent and Argeline Riches too and her sister, you and Father will have all the privacy you want here. Suppose if we leave you with him alone you'll examine your conscience and then make your Confession right here. You are the only boy so far who needs to make Confession. O.K.?"

But comrades he shook his head, and this happened before he did that sinful trick. Father spoke in and said Easter to May is a long time in Abbeinnia for a boy to neglect the grace of the Sacrament. He didn't answer. Father and Argeline Riches then said, "James all right. We will leave here but I'm going to ask you to do us a favor for old times sake. You won't refuse that will you?" What is it he asked suspiciously and we saw in his eyes that flare up of dislike that us girls come to associate with boys who know wrong and know they are doing it. "Think over what we are talking about to night and when you get back to your tent get out your hand book for boys' scouts of Abbeinnia and open it at Page ten and read the paragraph on 'Confession.'" "You have no right to suggest," he blazed up.

"Well," read it. It won't hurt you and then like a sensible boy come around to the Church and make your Confession at the usual time to morrow. We would all like to help you James to be happy again, but you must let us help and the priest too. But the boy had kept a sullen silence and my two friends left him alone with the priest. As I made my way along toward my own place I tried hard to wipe out of my mind a saddening experience and I reached for my beads and said a decade for that foolish unfortunate boy who had played with sin and would not wash himself of it. Then that night Princess Argeline came to you and made up that slenderous Susan. That comes because he neglected his Holy Communion."

"I thought before he did that that he was a Daily Communicant," said Jennie.

"They say he was."

"I'd rather save his soul than do anything else," said Violet. "It would be our duty if we could succeed. We have plenty of time if he will listen to reason. Our Father's army is so large that it will take quite a while for it to be on the move. Then if he becomes all right for a while and there is no danger of his falling back into such a sin then maybe we would not need to take his rank as boy scout from him."

"But the Vivianites won't have him back," said Jennie.

"He could be sent to some other distant camp where they know nothing of his foolish sin. The news of his wrong doing surely did not go out side of this camp unless some nosy foreigner peddled it," said Argeline.

"Well we will try it any way," said Violet. "It may not be necessary to hold him a prisoner any longer. It is our duty before Our Dear Blessed Lord to bring the poor boob to reason and ---"

A boy scout came up respectfully and said:

"Sorry Princess to have to interrupt you but Father says you own Priest wishes to see you."

"Let him come in the garden," said Violet.

The priest came up and having after standing before them a full three minutes without saying a word and his face as white as a sheet Violet said:

"What's troubling you Father? I can see it in your face."

"There's boy scouts went out of this army and got off too without the usual seeing him. They went off without permission, within the face of Your Father's positive refusal. In checking up on names I learned who they are. They borrowed the old camp wagon. It was a wonder they got it to run."

"How did you find it out?" asked Joise looking worried.

"The camp director missed the first and the priest mentioned the names of the missing Trio. James Abbott, Ward was one of them and the other two also. Foreigners were his companions. The Director," said the priest had declared about depriving the camp of the Company of these three young boys and had intended to send them elsewhere to morrow on probation and to home as soon as the opportunity arrived."

"We had planned about trying to bring James to reason and make him repent of that sin," said Argeline.

"Too late," said the priest and his voice shook. I had been asleep last night when the Director shook my cot most violently to awaken me and called:

"Padre get up and come at once. Something dreadful has happened." With that I awoke. I was fully awake. I learned that a scouting party of Christian Cavalry had when returning to the first Christian signal station had received a signal message by five shots like the sounding of a drum, that some camp boy scouts of the Vivianites had been met with a terrible disaster. Naturally I seized the Holy Oil and my flash and finished dressing in the Director's car as we tore through the darkness. All the director knew was that the disaster occurred at the lonely rail-way crossing. At first I thought they had been struck by a train at the crossing, but as we came to the rail-road, we saw several red lights shining and lanterns swinging. With drawn reins the Director stopped his horses by the road side which seemed covered with a as much earth as if there had been a gigantic eruption. A man with a large bright flash light came running up.

"You from the Christian camp?" He has asked me and I answered that I was and he said: "Too bad. I was behind their wagon. I don't know where it came from whether by mistake from a Christian gunner or from the enemy distant batteries, but I heard the loud shriek of some shell. There was an explosion right where the three boys were driving the wagon truck. The wreckage of the truck is scattered along a thousand yards or so." And the boys I forced myself to say, "Poor lads. They never had a chance to escape. They are somewhere lying in sure if they were not blown to pieces. We have sent to camp for volunteers ---" I left the man talking to the Director and ran to that wreck strewn road bed. A good stretch of the tracks had been pulled up, and many of the ties blown here and there lying every way and a big depression was in the ground. A grim tragedy all that bit of wreckage and scattered mounds of ground debris and other things showed. About a hundred yards from the crossing I came upon what I described to find. It was what was left of James. Other men were looking diligently for the others in every section but could find nothing. By some Frank James face was spared. Only one deep gash over the right ear. Horribly it is that I found a good part of his entrails scattered all over the ground and only the back of his body was remaining. Quickly I gave conditional Absolution and anointed. I drew the circle of my flash light on the uniform shirt and the stick out of the breast pocket was something white and damp. I drew it out, here it is," and the priest handed it to Violet. I saw it was a means of betraying your presence here in the city to Glandelinian spies to get avenge. The two other happened to be enemy boy scouts in disguise. And this was the intention James Ward had before he and his two companions went to their judgment. I elevated the circle of my flash and gazed on James face. There was an expression in his young eyes I had never seen before. Please God never again shall I be obliged to look on such an expression. Stamped there was more than the sudden realization of a screaming shell--there was stark horror stamped in those staring eyes. I shivered in the warm night air, for I could not rid my self of the thought in what state of preparedness had this boy been, when he was so suddenly with out warning catapulted out of this world. I felt suddenly sick to my stomach, at the memory of that last opportunity in the tent--all unknowingly--I a priest had offered this young soul to be prepared. Never mind princesses the details of the rest of that bitter night how we tried to find the bodies of the other two but could not. To me such a scene will remain unforgettable. If James failed in his great examination, and intended to betray you little girls for taking sides with Susan against him, he must go over many times--as he will for a very reason of the future--the down ward steps, the wrong two friends, the growing habit, the neglected graces, the last opportunity and a swift summons to render an account of his young Stewardship. If this boy James Ward is not at this moment happy happy, he is miserable in God's permanent prison calls. The one slim ray of hope is princesses;

"Between the stirrup and the ground;
Mercy I asked, Mercy I found."

Violet and her sisters and all who heard were horrified even as the priest continued:
"But princesses it is to slay to imitate. Am I right?"
"The Angels have it," said most of the others but Violet and her sisters could not say a word. They were spell bound with horror.
"It was really awful," said the priest, "but I cannot understand princesses how it would affect you like this. No one any how can know whether he really lost his soul but God, and therefore it would do no harm for me to continually say Masses for his soul. Any person can be before his death have only an instant regret for his sin and that may be sufficient to save him from Eternal Death. Besides too Princesses as that paper gave you proves that he was going to betray you to spies and cause all over again in this very city what you have just been compelled to flee from from the other Christian armies. When spies beset you so fiercely within your own armies as to cause you to flee from their shelter, you people sure must have been great. I'm afraid that the boys wicked plot was much too evil for even Our Blessed Lord to attempt a low him to carry it through and therefore God must have allowed the disaster to occur. But why worry over such a lad who had first tried to blast the reputation of one little girl, and then with two others desert the camp with the base intention of trying to betray you little princesses to the enemy?"

"But such a horrible fate," said Catherine with a look of stark terror in her eyes. "He died in the guilt of mortal sin, and if he was killed so quickly that and so horribly there does not seem to have been a chance for even a small spark of repentance. It makes me shiver all over to think of it."

"It's an awful fate if he is in that awful place," said Daisy. "But I am very much afraid that he is, and that Masses would do no good."
"But--but we won't suggest against saying Masses for his soul," said Angelina. "If he is in Purgatory he is in the most suffering place and I'll take take many Masses to bring him out. But we are sure of that he is lost forever."

The priest soon sadly departed, Violet sadly dismissed the meeting and she and her sisters slowly went into the house, too scared and melancholic to say anything further. And at dinner time they could not hardly eat the best of things that was given out, and finally they asked to be excused.

They stayed in their room all afternoon and even when called to anxiously by James and the women, they did not come down to supper but asked to be excused again; they didn't feel just right.

"The sad fact that the fool of a boy must have lost his soul has been an awful shock upon them," said the priest. "It would have been better if the priest had not told them what had happened."
"But it was his duty," said Penrod. "I hate to see them miss a meal like this and they had not eaten nothing for dinner either hardly. I'm going up and try to coax them down. This will never do, and I hope they won't lose any sleep over it."

"But it is surely a horrible thing for any one to lose his soul," said his father. "It shocked me too when I heard of it."

"It's not our fault," said Penrod bitterly. "It upset me too when I got the news at the same time from the priest but I am trying to eat though I must say I have been forcing my self too. I don't know if she is lost or not my sisters are worth a good deal to me than he in my eyes and I don't want to see them suffer like this. Better here of to see we keep all other foreign news out of the country. They're mostly all sinners. Only few are ever good. I know from being in foreign countries."

"If the little girls are really angel possessed," put in James, "could not your sisters get communication with them and find out whether she is lost or not?"

"There is no necessity," said Empress Vivian herself. "If the little fool is only spending a long term in Purgatory then they would not be feeling that way. The angels would check that in a hurry. I'm positive the boy is lost for all eternity. Often it has happened James my boy that God has struck when any one tried to do the real fatal harm to the little dears. Ain't I right, Mother?" Penrod.

"You sure are Father. I remember the day when Violet and her dear sisters tried to capture general Tomas Federal. In his attempt to escape which of course was a successful one, he struck Angelina as she told me on the right side of the head with his right fist and knocked her sprawling to the ground. The little girls attacked him then but he fought them off and escaped on a swift horse. I heard however he had to resign from the army because he ain't fit to command any more. Ever since that day he has never been able to use his right arm or even to lift it. The Doctors think it is some sort of paralysis but can make it out and that it is beyond all Medical skill. They are ignorant what happened but I am sure what it is. He struck poor Angelina and one of her angels struck back."

(Penrod then went up the steps down)
Penrod then went slowly up the steps and gently knocked at the door. It was Susan herself who opened the door and Penrod went in. It took some considerable coaxing on his part to get them to comply with his wishes, but when he finally told them that to fast like that in their condition as they were now would do them physical harm, they finally gave in but twofold and came down to supper. However through some reason or other probably becoming hungry after the first taste they did eat more than was expected, and then a little after supper they felt somewhat better.

The next morning however all the boy and girl scouts who had been gathered gathered about the headquarters were told the news about James promotion by Empress Vivian herself. Most of the girls except a small of them rather were delighted at the thought of James becoming a prince in wicked Germanias place, but the boy scouts went into fits of laughter and many of them chaffed James so unmercifully for the next day or two that it was just as well that Violet and her sisters still felt the effects of James Ward's tragic death so that they stayed in their rooms. By the time they felt better and came out they had recovered their gravity. Then two more days later on the day after James Andrew passed his final examination, Jennie Vivian and he were told to clasp hands together and a priest blessed them pronouncing James as Prince Andrew of Abbeinnia. During this time they had received occasional news from Catherine Lee. And too Walter Starling had steadily recovered his strength and memory, and as soon as chance had become better and the reign of terror of the long battle of Despressionville had come to an end he had decided to go back to general Vivian's army. But Violet, and her sisters begged him not so to so pleadingly that he consented to stay with them here in Empress Vivian's army. Empress Vivian herself was at war with all Glandelinians now, and Walter Starling decided to give the princesses all the assistance now, and through some of his old friends, who had escaped the bloody wave of destruction at Despressionville, he also decided to help James and Penrod by taking chief command of all the boy and girl scouts and let Timothy Grove to have a rest home away from out with all his work.

Walter Starling had often attracted Shero-Viviane attention by his constant deeds of desperate valor in behalf of his little daughter and therefore gave him the commission. All the boy and girls too were delighted at finding Violet, and her sisters back with them, and saw enough too to feel assured that most of their worst sorrows and miseries would soon be over. Their adventures might continue and perils too, but that only makes Violet and her sisters happy over their bravery and laugh in the face of the enemy.

"But---but---James please" pleaded Violet almost whimpering in her fear. "Don't take chances---please he is a dangerous man."

"Don't be scared Princess." Answered James. "They say when people are good to you they have good luck don't they. Wasn't I good to you and your dear sisters?"

"Yes, yes you were," she said lovingly and eagerly "but---but"

"I'm not going to lose my chance. My opportunity. It was given to me. God answered my prayer! I've proved to you how good a shot I am with any gun which is only a single shot. Here he comes. Hide yourselves girls. I'll get behind this tree."

In giving forth first frightful looks at him, they wisely obeyed. They had left the camp outside the city this new day not for scouting purposes but only for to see a little country and to have a good time. Penrod had been with them but thinking not of any enemy troop being near he had lagged a little behind to pick a good pack of beautiful flowers which the little girls wished to use for the altar in the church. They had only been out half an hour from the Christian lines but who should come down a turn of the road but Cruel wicked Kill child and a squadron of his cavaliers. Violet and her sisters had recognized him first and almost screamed and then notified James who took the initiative. He knew he was a good steady dead shot, as good as any cow boy with any shot gun rifle and pistol if not better, and he could clean up this column before they would have a chance to shoot back. He had no intention of doing that however but of getting the murderer of his little brother Kill child, the bloody devilish murderer of God alone knows how many poor little innocent holy Christian child slaves and other children murdered in a way that could not be pictured and from which Violet and her sisters had narrowly escaped when in his cruel power Violet had at first tried to restrain him. But she knew she couldn't. The boys anger was up, so for he thought only of his loss, and of the fact too that if he could get rid of him for their sake they would be much happier.

On came the column until they were within his easy range. He felt regretful that Violet and her sisters had forgotten and didn't carry their rifles and pistols. They had their long keen knives in their strange secret hiding places but what good would that do against all the thirty one horse men. James for a moment at the sight of the man felt shaky, not from nervousness but from his rage. He steadied himself and then took good aim. There was the puff of smoke, the report and without a cry the murderous man fell from his horse shot through the head. The other soldier soldiers were some distance behind him, and for a moment they were thrown into confusion. Violet and Jennie fearing the consequence though they felt immensely relieved to see their dreaded enemy out of the way tried to work their way to James to warn him to look out for the rest. But before they could, the soldiers had gotten the dead man out of the way and then started toward the direction of the shot, firing as they did so. Violet and her sisters at that moment thought James had a ten shot rifle for it seemed to go off like one. The Glandelinians were thrown into a horrible panicky panic but before those who were too close could wheel their horses to retreat some more of them were shot down, and the horses ran down the road, some of the other little girls however managing to stop them with the purpose to take them to camp as trophies. Never before had Violet and her sisters seen Penrod, who had hurried up on his own horse at the sound of the shooting, seen a more unusual sight. A single boy with a one shot rifle shooting down twenty Glandelinians including Killchild and routing the survivors, and shooting more down as they fled.

As soon as the excitement was over "We'll have to clear out of here now and get back to camp" was Penrod's first (if not foist) words. "I'll take a bunch of the horses captured sister---dead and let James take charge of the rest. I want you to take the lead and let's get to the city as soon as possible. They'll raise the alarm incamp and bring a whole regiment to the spot spot."

Actions however speak louder than words, and they were soon within sight of the Christian encampments. First stand not far away were the houses of the city. The same sentry was still on duty whom they had passed a moment before.

"My gracious Princess and Princesses" cried the man wide eyes in astonishment and clutching his head. "I thought you were only out for a lark. Here you come back with a swarm of horses belonging to Glandelinian cavaliers. Where did you get them?"

"It was not us" said Violet with a happy giggle. "Ask James. He'll tell you." James however did not wish to praise himself but Penrod said:

"I don't believe the same small party of Glandelinians would want to meet him again. He is the victor and the capture of the horses. He ran off a squadron of Glandelinians single handed. I never expected such a thing to happen in my life. And he got the man the Abbeianian government would give a hue and cry of a reward to see slain, not captured. That Killchild fellow."

"Don't tell how in the world did he do it?" asked the sentry more astonished as a number of soldiers and child scouts of another organization came running up.

"I don't know the full details" grinned Penrod. "I tarried behind gathering these flowers I got tied to the saddle, and suddenly heard firing. I thought my sisters and James were attacked and hurried to give aid and saw the most astonishing sight. Twenty one Glandelinians lay dead on the road, the horses coming running toward me, and about twenty others retreating as if before a cyclone while he brought four more down while they fled. It is the most astonishing sight I ever saw."

They passed the guards who still looked at them scratching their heads in wonderment. The news soon spread through the camp, and while many came forward to see the small party with the horses others went out to see for sure what happened on the road and found really twenty seven bodies lying there. There were no more Glandelinians yet within sight and the bodies were stripped of their ammunition and weapons, and then they returned to camp. As Penrod's little squadron continued on until they reached the city, having left the horses in the camp, as they had no need of them no one for a time spoke. Violet and her sisters too were bewildered and astonished at the scene they had witnessed, and joy full too, and felt greatly at ease for one of their most powerful and dreaded enemies was no more. They felt so elated that they could just cry out and sing. Finally when they were not among too many people and had entered the first street (not dead beat) of the city Penrod asked:

"James where did you get such a quick firing rifle?"

"It is only a one shot rifle."

"Only a one shot rifle? Impossible."

"Yes it is" said Violet. "It is the only rifle he carried with him. Show it to him James."

"It is only a Winchester one shot rifle," said James as he handed it over to Penrod. "It's my father's rifle but he gave it to me to use to defend the little girls. At first my father said that after I used up all the bullets that came with it it would do me no more good."

Penrod looked it over carefully. It was altogether different in the make than Abbeianian military rifles, somewhat shorter.

"It sure is a swell rifle" said the prince. "ut why will it be no good after you use up the bullet?"

"My father said that only those bullets fit the cartridge chamber."

"It is too bad," said Joice. "It's such a swell rifle. you handled it like it pumped ten shots in no time. Here you any more of those bullets left that belongs to the gun?"

"No" said James grinning. "I found thanks be to God your own kind fits it easily too. Those is what I used, from my cartridge belt you gave me."

"Does your father know it yet?"

"Yes," he told him and he wouldn't believe it. I proved it by inserting in one that fits your own kind of rifle and by firing it. Your kind are the same size only the cartridge explodes much louder."

"How did you come to meet with those Glandelinians?" asked Penrod.

"I didn't meet with them" said James. "None of us did."

"ut then how is it you shot at them?"

"Your sisters saw them coming. Argeline with field glasses detected who they were, and who was in the lead, and I therefore wouldn't miss my opportunity for all the world.2"

"And oh, I was so scared that he was doing something rash," said Violet. I entertained him not to take a chance, but he said that he knew what he was doing. At I didn't think he was so dangerous with a rifle. I can thank God I wasn't Mark Kilchlid. It's awful to think where he may be but it is a relief to us that he is gone. James you did what no body else could do."

"What?" he asked looking surprised and partly embarrassed. "Why I said you did what all others couldn't do, since that awful time we were so dreadfully exposed naked amongst so many dreadfully torn bodies of hundreds of hundreds of little children and we had gone through untold horrors at his hands when his prisoners, every means possible was taken to try to apprehend that dreadful scoundrel. Not merely only for to punish him but also for our sake because he was so dreaded by us though of course we can't remember ever seeing him since that time until now. Federal agents military detectives, every one of authority tried to get him but it was impossible. All attempts for so many months had been made and he escaped escaped and whipped them gallantly in many fights with great loss to his enemies. There is placed on our heads by Manley and his Confederates a heavy reward for our capture dead or alive, but that is nothing to the reward offered by my father and the Abbeinnian Government for his destruction. No body no matter how desperately they tried, how stubbornly and persistently they made the attempts they could never claim that reward for he always won fights, was dangerous to tackle and as easy to escape as an eel in your hand in water. The naevious attempt had been made to ambush him and he rode through the ambush uncatched orlew his ambuscade men."

and he rode through the ambush unharmed. We had opportunities to ambush him but he eluded us and shot one of us badly on the forehead. The Gemini have in great numbers apparently served in the Glandelinian ranks, with the purpose to try and find an opportunity to kill him but to no avail. He was strongly protected and to try and kill him there was like killing yourself at the same time. Once we had an opportunity James and would you believe it one of our targets warned us for our safety to leave him alone while we were within foe lines. And yet you got him, and so easily and killed twenty seven Glandelinian soldiers beside him. Wonderful boy."

"On it was nothing," said James. "Probably the others were foolish to let him see them first. I didn't. But we Americans have a way you Abolitionians don't. I did it Indian fashion. That is how he got his. I have now revenged my loss and relieved you little girls of your great anxiety. So you can feel much safer now."

"What do you mean Indian fashion" asked Violet.

"What do you mean Indian fashion?" asked Vivian.
"I laid myself down behind a large stump after pulling a lot of branches from a tree and piling it up and around the stump. That is a way a lone Indian ambushes his enemies. One Indian can get a dozen men in no time that way and his enemies can't get at him. The leaves and branches absorb the smoke properly on a breezy day like this so the enemy couldn't tell where the shots come from."

"I thought you went behind a tree " ? said Jennie.

"I thought you went behind a tree," I said, smiling.

"I did untill I could construct the Indian 'Trick' said James. "There is one thing unfortunately we had no chance to do" said Penrod. "We did not bring in the body of Kill Child to prove to Father and the army that the rascal, rascal is dead."

that the "bad" fascists
"ye-but I believe if the enemy didn't re-covers him already on own soldier hearing of it would do that," said James. "I suppose now when it is learned of I'll be the hero of the day. And yet it was nothing for me to do that. It was the easiest thing possible. The Glandelinians didn't have a chance. But let's forget that for a time," continued James. "It may seem peculiar or strange but I'd like to ask you little Princesses a question. Promise me you won't think I am silly or that you will laugh when I ask it?"
"It better not be a funny question" warned Violet. "It takes almost nothing to make us laugh. What is the question?"

"You have not anything such as What Our Blessed Mother Had have you called Her Immaculate Conception have you? That is we're you little girl is conceived without Original sin?"

without Original Sin?" Violet and her sisters looked at each other in blank amazement. They didn't even smile to his surprise. "It was no funny question. "Why no?" Jennie herself finally said. "We were Baptized when we were little infants. What makes you ask such a serious question?" "Because you are so unattractively good, and especially you little girls though you seem when walking and riding to appear slightly proud really hate pride in all its manifestations, you are humble of heart so much in imitation of Our Blessed Lord and His Holy Mother and do all other good things that you have made me often think of Her and her Immaculate

C o n c e r t i o n . . "

"BUT HE NEVER WENT IN THE STATE

"But we were never in the State of grace at the first moment of our existence" said Violet. "But when we were created in Baptism we hung to the Graces and stuck to them when they increased upon us like leeches, and guarded it in our souls by as all Abbiannians do carefully avoiding and detesting anything that might seduce us into committing not only mortal sins but even the smallest sin, and by using the means of grace we have at our disposal, constant prayer and the frequent reception of the Sacraments. But ut we were never Conceived without sin, though often we really wished we had been, but only that happened to our Dear Blessed Mother. But don't fool yourself James. I could be possible that a person even if Conceived without sin could still fall into sin if they didn't make use of the graces they received. Sinful sins to us like a horrid disease that fills body wounds with dreadful flesh eating wriggling worms. We treasure sanctifying grace in our souls more than a miser would his old useless tawny gold. This is the most precious gift bestowed on us in Baptism, and is meant by God to always remain in our souls. It is the fruit of the precious Blood of Jesus Christ shed for us on the Cross and tears came to her eyes as she mentioned the cross. It is the spotless gem bestowed upon our Dear Blessed Mother in the very first moment of her Creation to her soul. Her Immaculate Conception as you know means that she received at the first moment of her existence the state of grace. But that regrettably never came to us. Is it not enough to warm our hearts with love for her when we think that as children of God, and brothers and sisters of Jesus Christ, we have Mary for our Mother. Can we ever forget that in His hour of Agony on the Cross and now it seems as if she would start to weep. He gave her to us in a special way, when he bade the beloved disciple, St John, as representative of the human race, accept and care for her as His Mother?"

"It is disappointing to me too" said James "but then it is God's will. Then I thank to be, but Violet" turning to her "Is your right name Violet?"

"Why?"

"Why?"

"I often heard you called Susan."

"I often hear you called Susan,"
 "That is my nickname," Said Violet. "I so often go after the flowers called Black-eyed Susans that they are so pretty on a Church Altar! I love all flowers but more so the beautiful Violets and Forget me notes. You could never imagine James dear how eagerly on all the hillsides of our country country every summer all us Abbeian children hunted through the meadows for all kinds of flowers to make nosegays for our parents and for our beautiful Church Altars, and as spiritual offerings that would more than gratify our Good Mother in Heaven and would be symbolized by the flowers in their gardens and in their fields. I always had the joy of finding huge clusters of the fragrant sweet smelling Violets hidden away under the hedges of a Country lane, and using them to decorate my room or for the Altar which of course brought me to have the real name of Violet, for Violet is a meaning of humility."

By this time they had come to the street near where the Church they go to was, and Violet and her sister desired ~~titotates~~ to stop in and give the flowers picked by Penrod to one of the priests to the altar.

"Why not one of you little girls put the flowers on the altar you & your little yourself suggested Pen" ed. "You being so pure pure of heart are allowed to."

heart are allowed to." Violet just before entering had looked in and shook her head. "No room for them" she whispered. "I'll give them to the priest." While her sisters and the two boys knelt in the pews Violet took the flowers into the sacristy to give them to who ever she would meet. Only the good sacristan was there however just finishing sweeping up the floor and as Violet entered with the flowers in her hand, and a row of smaller and whiter white ones round her golden head he stood spellbound as if he saw a beautiful apparition. The strange way she wore her hat added to her unusual spiritual like beauty. At first of course he was a little afraid. She had come so noiselessly and too he had glanced around the room only an instant before and had seen nobody there, and now to his surprised eyes she was there as suddenly as if he had seen a spirit / please don't be she was there as suddenly as if he had been a priest.

"I beg your pardon," she said politely. "But Mr. Sacra-stein, please don't be so scared of me. I'm p--ince-ess violet and I came to bring these flowers for the altar. There is no room for me to put them on as there are too many."
"A-a-a-a-a-a-a all right p---p---princess," he faltered. "I'll give them--- to p---the first priest I see" and he wity a shaky hand ~~gave~~ took the offered flowers and left the Sacra-stein in haste to give them to the first priest he met. It happened to be the very priest who had r-ecently told of the death of James Ward the wayward boy.

"A-----a----- little angel---in the form of a little girl---aye me these" for the altar," gasped the man. "I'm sure she was a spirit. I'm almost afraid to go back in there again."

"O, Oh tut tut" said the priest as he took the offered flowers. "Come back to the Sacristy with me. You should have thanked her for the kind offering." They both went back to the Sacristy, the Sacristan however with a little trembling, and to the surprise of both there was no one there. Violet never waited for any one to thank her, and she and her sisters did not like priestly praise and would avoid it if they could...2.2.

"What did I tell you" said the Sacristan. "She's gone. It was a spirit I'm sure, and spirit from heaven dressed like a little girl."

"Are you sure?" asked the priest doubtfully. "But a real little girl couldn't be so beautiful as that. I could not hardly stand it to look upon her. And she appeared so suddenly and noiselessly."

The priest knew in his heart that it was one of the Vivian girls because no other children were as pretty as she or her sisters were. He decided to look in the Church and see for himself and sure enough in one of the pews were seven little girls their heads bowed devotedly in prayer while two boys dressed as princes were in a pew behind them. He knew then it was one of them who had given him the flowers for the altar. "God bless those dear little princesses," the priest muttered devotedly. "There's no child in the world like them."

Violet and her sisters remained there regardless of how the time passed, having sent a boy scout on with the horses as they had intended to walk it home the rest of the way. James felt he had been rewarded in the quest after the wicked man Henry Gale and therefore also offered prayers of thanksgiving. Finally Penrod knew by his wrist watch that his sisters had remained in the church for over an hour and still they did not appear as if they were going to leave.

"Gosh" he thought to himself. "What a blessing I have to have been given such good little girls as these for sisters, but I sometimes wonder if they are real and not angels taking the form of little girls."

Half an hour later Violet was the first to get up and then her sisters and then Penrod and James followed. They however went down the aisle in front of the altar and went out that way. A They walked home silently all the way and too it was only about an hour's walk but they did not mind it. At this time Violet and her sisters and Penrod, as exciting and wonderful as it was had quite forgotten about the incident with "Killchild" and mainly what caused them to forget was their devotion in the church. It was just about half half an hour before supper time when they arrived at James home. The Alde Camp (not a camp de hemp) let them in, Violet and her sisters going first. Emperovivian as the side side camp said was busy in his council room with some of his generals and that Jack Evans would entertain them while they were waiting for supper. James through his modesty and because of his dislike of home came please said nothing about his adventure with the Glandelinians. Penrod and Violet and her sisters too still did not think of it either. They only now thought of the strange questions James had asked of Violet, and Jennie.

"How long are we going to remain in this city of Pandora" asked Violet as soon as she and her sisters were seated in their own drawing room with Evans.

"I have no idea" said Evans. "I asked your father this morning and he said the way things are just now and because of the size of his army there is no possibility of his moving for some days until he can learn the intentions of the Glandelinian generals. There is an enormous Glandelinian army near here about equally the size of ours and it won't move either but so far there is no signs of a battle coming even though the enemy armies won't move off. One section is stretching along the Big Girl Knoll Road not far from here menacing Doona and El Vesco, and other places. It will take a long time to get these huge armies in action but when they do oh boy, there will be some big battles believe me."

"If we do stay here for some time I hope we will be having some rest" said Penrod. "I don't like to see my sisters persecuted all the time by the enemy. I hope no Glandelinian spies get in this city."

"I don't believe those kind who go after the little girls can" said Evans.

"We may be troubled by the spies but not that kind."

"But they are just as dangerous in a way" said Angelina. "For if they capture any of our planes they could do plenty of mischief against us and-----"

At that moment the telephone in front of Evans on the table loudly rang.

Every one was quiet at the moment that Evans picked up the receiver.

"Hello, Hello" he called. "This is not Emperovivian. He is too busy to be bothered just now. Eh what? Oh no. Yes I'm Jack Evans. No I don't know anything about it. What did you say they were found. And Killchild you say was among them. About twenty seven bodies eh. Where did you say the Glandelinians ran into an ambush? Well that is strange. Are you sure, is was kill child?---eh what. You say if I'm not sure you can have the princesses identify him. Well for Heaven's sake. The whole County would give anything for the end of such a sound. Are you positively sure it was him and not another man dressed like him? Here was he brought in. Oh All right. And then there came a number of more excited words on the other end of the telephone while Violet and her sisters looked at Penrod, and he at them, and then to James. "Well that certainly is news. And you don't know who killed him whether it was a party of boy and girl scouts. Oh you say it is said a party of child scouts did do it from behind bushes and trees, and yet all the Vivianites deny that they have even been outside of the camp or city to day! Then it must have been some boy and girl scouts from a local quarter. What you say the report declares there were only eight child scouts, two boys and seven girls?" Evans put his hand on the mouth piece for an instant and looked suspiciously at Violet and her sisters and the two boys as he listened to more of the conversation. "Then he continued" why yes in that case I'd better have Emperovivian come to the phone and learn details;" and putting down the receiver, he got up looked at the children again strangely and then went into to where Emperovivian was with his other officers.

"I'm so sorry to disturb you your Majesty" said Evans. "at you are wanted on the phone. An important message. That foe of your dear daughter called Kill child and a cavalry squadron with him ran into an ambush and were massacred. Better come and see what the report is all about."

"What?" the Emperovivian was on his feet in an instant looking at Evans.

"Well it must be so. The party wants to talk to you on the phone."

Emperovivian excused himself, and went to the room and picking up the receiver sat down and said; in answer to the hello "Yes This is Emperovivian. What happened?" And then he got the details. As he listened carefully he took a note down with his pencil of what he had heard. When he heard seven girls and one boy was with or was at the scene of the massacre he wondered exceedingly but did not at the time think of Violet and her sisters or of James as the man said the Vivianites deny that they were out of camp or the city, and so do not claim or deserve the honor of putting such a dreadful whole sale massacre of children out of existence, but that they must have come from some local centre. Evans all the time was staring at Violet and her sisters and the two boys for he had his suspicions. For only they were far outside the city and the Christian lines that day having started immediately before sunrise, not having attended Mass that morning as there wasn't any.

because that priest didn't get up that early. Emperovivian however did not know that having thought they only went for a visit through the city. But Emperovivian could not hardly believe it was true, and said he would doubt it until it was proved. "Then he went on" you say that if the man is Kill child my daughter's daughter could prove it by identifying him? Well where is he at? Well all right. That is good news for the whole country, and my saintly daughter won't need to dread that sound of any longer but didn't any one recognize the ones who ambushed him and his followers? Yes but that the leader of the ambushers forbade them to tell until the proper time. Well that's strange, though then for a moment he too suddenly flashed a look at his little daughters and the two boys. Why yew my daughters are here in this very room with my son and prince Andrews, and and---and---what? Well I'll have them identify the body of the man. Too bad though no one knows who did it as they are shirking the reward. What, it was a revengeful motive, not just mere war duty or to get the reward? Well that's strange still, and this time Emperovivian flashed a strange look at James, who slightly digested. Well I'll soon find out. If the man is Kill child then it is sure good luck for my daughters. Where is the body.

At the instant tent of Company D. That's too far for my daughters to go this evening after they look so tired to night. I'll let them identify him in the morning. Yes, that's right. Tent Number Eight you say. Company D. That's good. They can see for themselves good by e."

"Well" said Emperovivian looking at Evans. "It does seem that something like a miracle has happened. So Henry Gale the fierce and most dreaded murderer of children is gone. That sound I knew how many were banding the almost greatest efforts to get him and had often boasted that there was no one who could ever get him, and that he would continue to destroy all children and his soldiers can lay hands on. He was not a general of very high rank of course but he was so dreadful that no general has been as cruel and merciless as he had been. Yet now I received the news that he and his party of cavalry soldiers out looking for more children to capture and destroy had fallen into a deadly ambush and only a few of his followers escaped. It seems strange though that the one who reported this said there were only eight persons who had formed the ambuscade and that no child scouts had been out. And yet these ambuscaders were children. Daughters and he looked at his beautiful children searchingly;

"Do you know anything about that?"

Violet giggled and pointed indicating to James. "Ask him" she said. "He knows."

"Empero-Vivian looked at James closely.

"I shot General Henry Gale," James finally said, without emotion, ~~about~~ embarrassment or pride in his voice. "You little daughters were with me but they unfortunately did not have any weapons. I did not think of vengeance that time however, it was either him or they. They would not have had a chance to escape for he and his party was coming so fast. I thought only of saving them. And as he was one of their worst enemies it was good riddance."

"But how in the world did you shoot all them down single handed without them getting at you?" asked Evans.

James told of how he formed his post.

"When I got the news first I suspected you right away" said Evans. "From the fact that the reporter said none of the child scouts of the Vivianites were out and those of the other camps were too far away to have a hand in it and you two boys and my dear friends the princesses were out side the lines. You must have surely used a fast firing rifle with chambers for a good supply."

"It was a one shot--ah--ahh what you call it rifle" said Jennie forgetting for the moment the name of it.

"A Winchester rifle" spoke in voice. "It's of American make. James showed it to us."

"How in the name of Heaven did you shoot all those down with a single shot rifle" asked Empero-Vivian. "Did you work a miracle with it or something boy?"

"No" said James more modestly. "I know how to handle them. It took fifteen minutes though to do all I did."

"Fifteen minutes" said Evans. "Do you think that that was a long time. I don't see how you did it, and they not even get a chance shot at you. Does the rifle make much noise?"

"Not as much noise as your own kind sin"

"Have you got it with you yet?"

"Yes it is in here," answered the boy. "I stood it over in the corner. It's not loaded now though."

James got up and brought it to the general who looked it over and then handed it to Empero-Vivian.

"It's a strange make of gun, greatly different than our kind," said Evans. "I don't believe I'd know how to shoot that thing off. It's a wicked looking thing too. I can see also by the single shot chamber that it would hold bullet as used for our pistols and our own rifles too. Handy thing but it sure looks wicked. I'd hate to have to face its muzzle."

The great monarch studied the gun carefully, then said-

"Any one who knows how to handle this rifle could surely shoot fast with it even if it is a one shot rifle. The cartridge head slips out as soon as the trigger hits it so that as fast again you could insert another without needing to pull the spent thing out. Good invention, but you sure have to know how to use it. He tested the trigger and tried to work it but could not make it respond. James graciously showed him how and after some practice he finally got it. He then inserted one of his own pistol bullets and aiming it at a small branch of a tree through an open window pulled the trigger. Empero-Vivian was always a good shot, and he hit the branch cutting it off neatly. The only noise that came from the rifle was "PING"

"He sure did fire fast" said Angelina. "The Glandelinians yelled off their horses as fast as they came on. I and my sisters were scared for we thought sure he would finally be hit by their shots for they answered with their own rifles but they never could do anything. When panic stricken a number were shot down before they could wheel their horses and retreat. It was wonderful. At first we didn't believe he could do it, but he did. And as he and his sisters gave him a look that made him blush red."

"You have done wonderfully my boy in riding them of their worse foes" said the Empero-Vivian. "and there fore you sure ought to merit some of the reward that the Government had promised to those who would cause the capture and destruction of such a man. The best thing that can be done however is that the reward could be forwarded in due time to your father and mother so that they can have a far more comfortable home to live in in the future, while you who have preserved my little girls from so many unseen dangers merit their companionship for life. As soon as my two good sons arrive you shall be introduced to them."

PANDORA AND HIS FRIENDS HEAR SOME NEWS.

THE KNIFE WITH THE BUCKHORN HANDLE.

THE SUSPICIOUS ACTION OF JAMES ANDREWS.

CONCLUSION.

The next morning it came up to all the boy and girl scouts to decide whether they would accept Andrews that is James as their mascot. We usually know what that means for an animal especially to be an mascot or mascot but among boy and girl scouts, next to their highest commander a mascot has also the highest position, and only those favored by the prince, Empero-Vivian or the Vivian Girls can be a mascot among boy and girl scouts, or among the soldiers, and to be a mascot mascot you have to be an officer.

"Angelina Aronburg said we'd take a vote on it."

"Yes and to night is the regular meeting night of the Vivianite Boy and girl scout troop, and it is to take place on the schedule of eight o'clock around an enormous camp fire within the big St. Nicholas Park in this city, so we will soon know where we stand."

"But do you think spies may interfere or try to get information," asked another

"Let them get all the information they want. That won't do a bit of good. For it concerns nothing about plans and what care we what the enemy think who we elect and who we don't elect. As the Americans over there say they can go to--"

"A nice hot place where there is no winter or summer but forest fires all the year round for ever and beautiful creatures" called Demore and lost souls. Or rather if you are not afraid to mention it "HELL."

"Thith hath been a pretty hot spring for the crowd crowd all told don't you think, I'll Aggie."

"It certainly has my German lad as sure as your name is Ted Stancklinburg. Our camping though had been cut short recently by forest fires, in fact we must be the creators of them without matches they follow us so much, and even with so many rainy days we are having now it does no good - it only makes so much smoke the sun don't shine any more" thanks to the enemy. We had no sun since Easter."

"Yet, after three hundred of the fellowth came down with bad cases of heat prostrate and the sun no done it either and the smoke is so plentiful. The heat comes from the east down."

"That was some news to me to find out that a boy who is a foreigner is the only one so far that could do a thing like he did to General Kill child and his gang of cut throat child murderers and do it so quickly with a one shot rifle."

"Oh I used to think at first that all that talk about him so easily pulling the dear princesses through unseen perils impossible to escape from was a silly yarn too Toby, but now I put a heap of stock in the same," declared the unusually tall and thin boy who seemed to answer to the queer name of "I'll Aggie" he evidently been rubbed so by his comrades, as an undersized cub, and when shooting up later on had been unable to shake off the absurd nickname.

"But here we still got a long time left of our vacation from activity since the move won't move off from the vicinity of Pandora and is concentrated at the West Ward Dorinda, you know," remarked the chap called Toby and it would be a shame to let the summer time dribble away without one more whack at some sort of adventure, and one more whack at the forest fires since one is advancing toward Pandora, and the open air life we love so well, and we could take James Andrews, Pandora and his argal sisters with us."

Toby just held your horse," exclaimed the one who lisped so dreadfully because of an injury he had received to his lips once through a shell fragment and which had not yet healed up completely, and whose name was Theodore Stancklinburg though never called anything but Ted. "You let Miss Angelina Aronburg decide for the crowd. I'm dead certain He'll lay out a Joyouth, confound my lipsing, I can't help it, y Joyouth plan at the meeting no night that will call for the unanimous approval of every member of the troop to be found in thith city these hot dog like days."

"Hear, hear Ted has got it down pay, let me tell you," cried Toby Manning brother of, I'll Aggie, who is the bosom of his family was occasionally minded that he had it seemed been born to be a boy scout.

"Yes you know our faithful and hard working chief girl and boy scout leader to a dot, Ted," added the long legged scout with a handsome grin in his good looking and freckled face. Though tall and long legged he was by no means thin, and despite his size it looked as if he could win with bare hands a fight with a young ox. "You trust Angelina Aronburg to think up a program that will meet with universal approval in James Andrews' behalf. But this is a pretty warm proposition for a late May day. I believe though it is August in Africa. Let's sit where we will get a breeze for a while, while we are waiting for Angelina Aronburg and Angelina Riches to show up."

"Accordingly the trio of boys and boy scouts leaders too they were and of very high rank in boy and new uniforms, that looked as though they had been a present of the Princesses (they had been) proceeded to perch upon the top most rail of the fence surrounding James home at a point where a splendid oak tree threw its wide spreading branches partly across the side walk. They were just outside the main front entrance of James home. These three lads belonged to the local troop of scouts, not of the Vivianites, but of the Lagoians, but they had come here to visit some brother and sisters of theirs during their vacation, and decided to stay until the vacation was over. All boy and girl scouts on the various Christian armies were always in a flourishing condition. Under the leadership of Chenoweth Walter the Wolf Patrol of the troop nearly a million strong in general kindergines army had accomplished so many unusual things that no enemy scouts never came near kindergines army for fear of the little "Human wolves" as they called them, and a great few had taken possession of many boy and girls to become enrolled when among rescued child slaves old enough to be accepted. In kindergines great army now concentrating on the grounds across the Big Old Knoll or Yellow Brick Road, there were also the Beaver Patrol (they worked like beavers too to the sorrow of the enemy) with a full number of five hundred thousand boys and nearly twice as many girls, as well as the Fox (the enemy feared them more than a hen fears a fox) seemed destined to finish their quota of eight hundred thousand new members in the early fall. Fall out side the present number of over a million old timers. They were dressed these three kinds as much as the Vivianites by the foe, and were the Salvation of the Christian armies they were in. The three boys whom we may say have met on the road chanced to be among the original charter members of the troop. All of them belonged to the Wolf Patrol, for it often happens that fellows wearing the same totem are brought close together than others. Since it chanced that the exciting incidents which we have started out to chronicle in the present story fell almost exclusively to the Vivianites, the boys belonging originally to the "dangerous" Wolfe Patrol it might be well to give a brief description of who and what they were before going any further for the enemy with the help of James Andrews will soon give anything if these three never existed, or the four others."

Ted Stancklingburg, being the Patrol leader of the Wolf Patrol, the chief of them all come first in line. He was a manly lad, German in name but really a full blooded Abbeianian, with nearly as many winning qualities of violet or her sisters, that made him a prime favorite among all his comrades and the soldiers and generals too. At one time his father had charge of a vast farm and cattle ranch up in the Calvernia north west, and while there the boy had learned a thousand things calculated to be useful to him in his capacity of a scout general. Because he was such a "holy terror" to the enemy he had long ago received official authority from the Vivian Girl Princesses to act as deputy general or an assistant scout master to general King Kindergines, the highest commission for a boy scout there is. Ted filled the position in such a clever fashion that no one ever questioned his ability to play the part of guide either. He was also a dreadful dangerous raider, and the enemy could give credit to great losses suffered because of him and his raids. Ted however was now for a time afflicted with a dreadful limp on account of a hip injury which though a healing was taking its time about it, so that as the boys used to say if offered a foot he could get no closer to the real thing when dared, than to say "Thoft Thopap. He hated his condition, hated the enemy for it, and decided the pay the enemy a beautiful; 2 beaut beautiful reward. Then there was Mark Anthony Gunnington, who was looked upon as Ted's chum. He was the grand son of a famous gunner and there were those who prophesied that some day Mark would follow in the foot steps of his illustrious ancestor, for he though a boy knew the works of a considerable enemy and Christian cannon. Mark was also something of an artist with a pencil. He drew off hand, charcoal or other sketches of Glandelinian generals always in a humorous vein that excited roars of merriment. Mark was also something of a musician and had in the beginning been elected to fill the position of bugler to one of the troops. Again to speak of Ted he was a marvel in his way, for he had no knowledge of medicine than most doctors did and on this account they often called him "Doctor Ted, or "Old Saw bones." In a case of shell fragment wounds, fainting from heat, or cramps or near drowning, cut from enemy sabres, gumbo gunshot wounds, broken bones from flight injuries with the diabolical enemy, or in fact anything likely to happen to boy and girl scouts when engaged with the enemy, Ted was what Lil Aggie always called; "Johnny on the spot." Though Toby himself could never pin him down to saying which spot. Toby Jones was really the funny boy of his regiment of the Patrol. His father being one of those Conventinian Veterans, who had accompanied Emperor Vivian to Evangeline St Clair, and saw the full fury of the battle both leg would do but the boy must bear the venturated name and so he was Christianed Tobias, Emperor Jones. Toby was ambitious with scouting, leaning lay in the line of scouting as near to the enemy as any one would have dared, and he was always trying to watch every movement of the foe that would even discount all the efforts of such heroes as the Vivian Girls. The dreadful fate of the girl scout Doris Green and her famous scout ing squad when had no terrors for Toby, though his chums were always warning him to be wary that gunners of a Glandelinian battery don't spot him.

"Glandelinian scout put role may dread us or dread to meet us," one of them said, "but it is us who dread the Glandelinian gunners. They fear nobody." Doris Green had been out scouting with thirty girl scouts, and some regiment of Christian cavalry passed the spot two hours later and found what was left of their remains and the remains of their horses. A high explosive shell from an enemy gunner had been aimed true to the mark.

Toby had on several occasions of the past, attempted to show off with one of his ambitious scout ing efforts, and a number of girl scouts had to go his rescue. He had been trapped and was surrounded by the foe who tried to shoot him. He fortunately had a good number of bullets with him and he had killed a good number to his credit. When he came of his effort to lead the effort of the enemy it would have been fit for a moving picture to witness the ludicrous results that came because of this over vaulting ambition on the part of Toby so that he was nicknamed named "Snoodle Toby."

But he was not one whit discouraged, though fourteen times he was in a hospital because of his dare devil recklessness, and often declared that unless his life was cut short he meant to see that the name of the Joneses went ringing down the ages as one of the most illustrious since the days of the American Paul Jones, who fought sea battle in the American Revolutionary War. Till Aggie Arthur Stanbury was also a very good scout and a loyal companion who could play a joke on the enemy, and take one when it was aimed at him, he was a rather fond of photography, and a crazy for geography and addicted to some what harmless brag. Another member of this gang of boy scout officers of the Original Wolfe Patrol division was a Southern Calvernian boy, Charles St Peters by name, the though known simply as "Spud" because he was such a lover of potatoes. He possessed all the traits to be found in all Abbeianian boys who have been born and raised south of the Angelina and Ageline lines. He was inclined to be rather more holy than most Abbeianian boys are, but was inclined to be a good deal to touchiness whenever he thought any one doubted his honor, talked with a quaint little twang, that was really delightfully musical and taken in all had grown to be a prime favorite with his fellow boy and girl scout officers. However "Spud" had one silly weak knee which though he tried hard to overcome it, would occasionally crop up. A matter of good they had been to him for some reason or other he avoided the presence of the Vivian girls, and it was found out he was dreadfully superstitious of them, and believed that they were really beautiful spirits, which failing he laid to having associated with some for legends and in some way abiding or imbibing their belief that the little girls were really supernatural. Though he loved their inner indescribable beauty and so intently ways that never theless scared him. Yes at large to say at one time he even carried a rabbit foot for luck, and to ward off the Vivian girls. The animal was said to have been killed in a game yard in the full moon and it was a sure enough hid foot too, which he believed indeed to be a very important distinction, since no other would answer. He was not an Abbeianian either in his action as it seemed, but this doesn't mean he believed in ghost and such like. Of late however "Spud" said less about these things than when he first came to be a boy scout, and Angelina Aronburg believed he was by degrees out growing the foolish superstitious beliefs about poor violet and her sisters. He had lodged at times for this company but was afraid of them... 2.2.2.34456

Other additions to the officers of the Wolf Patrol divisions were Henry Michael Condit, known simply as "Hen" as he liked to cackle like one and Andy John Ditt. The latter was a fat good natured chap, always perspiring, and who had a queer habit indeed of placing his forefinger alongside his nose when puzzled or reflecting. Put to a Gladiolusian foe he was as cool as well as stout that a lemon or a cab apple or a crab apple was too sweet for the taste in comparison. An occasional mention may be made in these pages to other official members of the troop it might be well the reference to simply give a list of their names, and let it "go at that" as fill Aggie would say. Matty Peter Eggleston was another leader, and after him came "Red-head" Huggings, Ty Collins, Jaspermer Riwether, Tom Cropsey, Larry Billing, Phil Dale, and "Doubting George" hobnobbing cousin to Ted. Jack Armistage filled the position of third leader and after him came Nat Scottie into Ben Gimmonize, and Jim Comfort. Apparently the three fellows perched on and drew rail fence had agreed to wait for the boy leaders who were to join them in starting first for the favorite "Swimming hole in the Park" for their conversation has first been to this fact. fill Aggie began to grow a little impatient, and he wiped his perspiring face and in so many words gave his two chums to understand that if the laggards did not put in appearance in side of ten minutes he meant to start without them.

"A fine lot of scoundrels" Spud and Andy are showing themselves to be, not keeping their word. The tall boy grumbled, "There didn't you hear the clock strike eight. They were to be here not late to the quarter to the hour! Suppose something happened that keeps them."

"Oh well you know Spud Spud" isn't in a hurry. Chuckled Toby. "Fellows raised down in southern California are used to taking their time. It's the warm climate that does it; he told me, but speaking of angels, and you hear their wings they say--for unless my eyes deceive me, there comes" Spud "right now."

"Yeth and thauntherg halorg, like he might be away ahead of the time that form eating her a Spud with what, call a cool cutthroat?" When the fourth lad joined the bunch there was a lot of good natured badinage indulged in all around, at first the manner of boys in general.

"Do you intend waiting any longer for Andy?" asked the new comer. "Yeth we have waited fifteen minutes for you Spud" said Ted, and it would be only fair to give poor old Andy ten minutes more."

"Spud" immediately took out his watch and held it in his hand just as though he might be a might have been the judge at a sprinting match.

"I couldn't help being late" late myself got to talking with Angeline Vivian out there down the company street and couldn't pull myself away. What is keeping Andy though I wonder."

Before five minutes had crept past however there was a cry raised.

"Here comes poor old Andy," said Toby mounted on his horse and coming like the wind after all look at him puffing away will you. He just knows he has been keeping us waiting here so long and that is making him put on so much steam. Now he nearly took a header into that fence."

The boys sat there on the rail fence and began to greet the coming horse back rider with loud shouts;

"It he up Andy Andy."

"One good turn deserves another you know."

"A little more power to the left foot, or you'll slide the horse into a house yet Andy."

"Oh Andy doesn't you mother at home know your risky risking your precious old neck on that beast of a horse?"

Though usually he would grin or smile or laugh at these words he did not this time but looked mighty sullen and serious, and did not cease his exertions until he had reached the place where his four chums sat on the fence. Then they saw that while his round face was red and the perspiration stood out in beads on his forehead, there was a drawn almost a scared look on his countenance.

"Hey what ails the fellow" burst out fill Aggie, as though discovering that Andy Andy was trembling more with some mysterious emotion than fatigue.

"Yeth hurry up and tell us what's happened" cried Ted Stalcklingburg jumping off his perch, and hastening to the side of the panting boy who had just dismounted with difficulty. Andy Andy seemed to swallow something that may have hastened to choke him when making a great effort he managed to say a few words.

"Terrible thing happened fellows. Knocks the reputation of the Wolf Patrol divisions all to smithereens."

Of course this excited and alarmed those four scouts as nothing else could have done.

"Has anything happened again to the Vivian girls?" almost shouted Toby.

"No it's Hen Condit" answered Andy Andy. "He's gone and stole a lot of important papers from General Jack Evans headquarters and lit out that's what. That is why Andrews Penrod and the princesses were not home. They were at after him but he got away, and him belonging to our Wolf Patrol too."

"Hey for the love of heaven and Saint Peter say that over again 'on't you Andy Andy? I sure believe my ears must have played mean tricks on me." Exclaimed fill Aggie his face becoming pale.

"Henry Condit" robbed Jack Evans the guardian of the Vivian girls, and the little princesses are you telling us? Dashed Toby. "Come off now, you're just trying to give us taffy, to see what we would say thinking it smart."

"I tell you honestly and cross my heart to die just came from the house of Andrews" continued the perspiring scout, mopping his reeking forehead with a suspicious looking handkerchief, that may once on a time have been good and white. "You see General Jack Evans did not this morning let the little princesses get up as early as they generally do, because last night they were really badly worn out and tired. It occurred when he and they were at Mass with Andrews and Penrod, and say they even think that Evans might have been given a dose of scotch whisky to make him sleep longer because they awoke sooner than he did and had a hard time to arouse him."

"Hold on fellows" snapped Toby just then. "As luck would have it here comes the girl scout chief Mattie Turner on her own horse. He said she had to go over to St. Johns Camps on an important errand for the head who is a general this morning, which was the only reason she couldn't join us on the meeting. Let's hold her up and Andy can tell the whole story then."

When they made urgent gestures to the pretty girl scout chief (she hastened on the swiftly flying horse horse (it flies without wings) she hastened to draw rein in laughing joyfully and gleefully at the same time.

"I hurried over and back on purpose to follow you boys to the old swimming hole with my own bathing suit to join you" she told them "but I didn't expect to meet you good little gentlemen on the way. Don't delay me as you know it is good little ladies first."

"Put Jennie please listen, this is no joke, something awful has happened and you ought to know about it." Declared Toby at which the good little girl looked searchingly at each of the others in turn, and seeing how grave they appeared, she demanded what it meant.

"Why you see Jennie" exclaimed fill Aggie. "Andy Andy here was late in joining us. He came along on his horse urging it on for all his was worth and looking like he had seen the ghost one of the foolish foolish people believe in. He only started to tell us when you came in sight. We were waiting for Angeline Aron and Angeline Aron to come and join us but something is delaying her, but it's a terrible, that do you think, he says our Wolf Patrol Lieutenant Henry Condit, he deserted us, and robbed the princesses and Evans in the bargain."

Jennie Turner was off her horse in short order and she faintly fainted. She faced Andy Andy, as a lawer might a witness on the stand; and Jennie just knew how to pump a fellow so as to get the main facts without loss of time as any girl scout leader understood.

"Go on and tell us about it Andy Andy," she commanded. "How did you happen to learn about the fact in the first place?"

"Why you see Jennie" answered the other, only too willing to explain to the best of her ability. "Angeline picked, she sent me over on an errand to James Andrews house, an errand to James himself. He has wished to see him. He wasn't there neither were any one at home except Evans and some other. I was made than hops too when I learned of it too, because I just knew that such little girls like the princesses doesn't deserve double crossing by no one."

"What did you find when you got there?" asked Jennie Turner, who knew Andy Andy to be long winded and that often the quickest way to learn facts from him was to put him on the grill.

"Why they were all upset." Admitted Andy Andy.

"I thought you said they were not all there?" said Jennie Turner.

"Andrews and Violet and her sisters were not there. They were away at their Daily Mass and so was Evans. Emperor Vivian was there though and he was as mad as a bull seeing red, and his wife the Empress was as white as chalk yes, and scared too. See me that when the Emperor went into the library after the little girls and their brothers and Andrews had gone he found the safe open and every thing gone. It was an inside job the Chief Gemini Rodney Graves said, because nobody had busted the safe and it was the safe belonging to Andrews father."

"Then the chief of the Gemini, was there was he?" questioned the chief girl scout leader.

"Surely he was indeed, Empero-Vivian had phoned him. There were a dozen officers in the house too and more seemed coming right along, and a crowd of child scouts were about the place awaiting commands to do whatever - toll concerning the strange robbery. Biggest kind of excitement. Oh it's going to be town property before night I guess, and again within this city now lots of people will be pointing their fingers at every fellow suspicious of being strange and saying they knew strange were no better than the law all round here. Oh - you would I not like to get hold of that Hen Candide though."

"Oh what makes them believe it was Hen," continued Jennie.

"Say that is the queerest part of the whole thing," answered the fat boy. "The silly gump gave the whole business away himself - went and left a note behind him written on Violet's typewriter telling that he was the guilty villain, and that they needn't expect him to be seen again because he had lit out for the Glandelinian camp and don't dare follow him because the wise he'll put it wise to the assassin spies where the Vivian Girls are."

"What? you don't say," gasped, ill Aggie - she half stunned by this later intelligence. "I would never thought that Hen could be such a fool to double cross the Vivian Girls after they trusted him so, and yet a bigger fool as to vomit himself like that."

"Then was he last seen?" demanded Jennie Turner still after information which she must know.

"He went to bed last night they said just as usual; but shucks it would be the easiest thing for him to get into their headquarters with the pass he had and in getting out climb down from the window if he got a notion. I've known him to do the same thing a dozen of times just for fun, rather than take the trouble to go around the stairs."

"Then Hen has disappeared, deserted the camp, and no one has seen him this morning?"

"Never a soul," Empero-Vivian said that his wife the Emperoress was the first to do discover the loss. She had went to the room of Violet and her sisters and seeing her them gone had at first thought they took the important papers."

"But surely if it is theirs and their fathers they would have a right to know he told them what they did was all right."

"Yes but they didn't take anything. They were still at Mass with their brother Evans and Andrew, Empero-Vivian and the Emperess having gone to an earlier Mass. And Empero-Vivian is whopping mad over it. He nearly took a fit when the Gemini Chief said he reckoned that somebody had chlo'formed him and Evans. He called Hen a viper and said that if he could only catch him he'd see that he got his deserts."

"Listen Andy Andy, did you see that note?" asked Jennie Turner.

"That's what I did let me tell you" came the prompt reply, "and it was in Hen's well known hand writing too, I could tell that a good distance from my face if I saw it. Now I not heard the scout Master tell him he was well nicknamed because his paper looked like a Hen had dabbled in the ink, and then strolled around every which way."

"Then you can tell us about what it said can't you?" continued Jennie.

"Landy Andy laid that ready for finger (hee hee) of his alongside his nose, as though that action would aid his memory. Then he closed one eye, a nother singular habit of his, after which he slowly went on to say--"

"Doubtless the exact words have slipped me, besides to tell you the truth it was very hard also to read it, but it was something like this. He said circumstances which he could not control had forced him to do this thing, that because of the Glandelinian cause he really served with he could not be sorry if he tried, and that also as it was his duty to be a spy and disguise as a Christian boy scout it could not be helped. He hoped the Vivian Girls would forgive him, and for get there was such a fellow in the wide world as Hen Candide. There was also some more that I can't just recollect, but it was to the effect that he believed he had plenty of things coming and money too, so that Empero-Vivian could take it out of that, and call it square. But it is horrible, and just this what this is going to do to the armies before Pandora Jennie. Never since the Vivianites were organized organized has it met up with such a terrible blow..."

"All of them looked very serious. They knew that a certain element within the Christian lines would only be too eager to seize upon this incident to take advantage to try and prove what certain foreigners had always tried to falsify claim, which was that Ablesannian boy and girl scouts after all were no goodier than children of their own nations, and that when put to the test they could only turn out bad as well as the rest, not thinking that at times Glandelinian boy scouts can fool you easily enough by being in the cloak and acting as any Christian about for the time being."

untill he sees an opportunity to do his treacherous act."

"Yes in the eyes of Glandelinians the honor of the Wolf Patrol is hanging in the balance," Jennie said, "Will Aggie, are we boys going to just stand by and not lift a hand because it was one of our make believe chums and yet a Glandelinian spy in disguise who did this mean job, obliging the Princesses. If it was any one else and they called on us to back him down, wouldn't we respond right away. Here's a supreme test before us that is going to prove how much our honor means. We can't let a Glandelinian scamp get away with them..."

"I say the same Jennie," urged Chatze indignantly. "Let's all get busy and see if we can't help Violet, and her sisters run down Hen Candide like a fox we have got the trail off. Let's fetch him back to face Empero-Vivian and Violet, and her sisters, and prove too all Glandelinians that the boys and girls of the Ablesannian Wolf Patrol can never stand for wrong doing in their ranks and don't excuse spies either. Yes gosh it is surely up to us to show our colors."

Jennie Turner rubbed her forehead. She looked thoughtful, as though possibly she might see a little further into this mysterious happening than any of the rest.

"Listen fellows," she told them. "I've known for some little time that Hen was that Hen was acting very queerly. I had a hard time to get him to go to daily Mass, and among us all he never went to Holy Communion. He failed to attend the last three meetings, and when I asked him about it he avoided my eye. I've been wondering what it all meant and had intended to have a good heart to heart talk with him as soon as I got a chance."

"Hold on," said Toby. "I wonder now if that man, saw him with could have anything to do with this ugly business..."

Jennie turned on him nett like a flash. "Flash."

"It may have more to do with it than you think Toby," she remarked. "Then was it you saw them and where?"

"Just yesterday morning," replied the other, "and down at the bridge across the river, you know that long city bridge on Central Street. Violet and her sisters were crossing it on their way to Mass with their parents and brothers, and Hen nodded to them and me, but it struck me even at the time he acted like he hoped to goodness I or they too wouldn't bother to stop to say anything to him."

"And a man you didn't know was with him you say?" questioned Jennie.

"Well I didn't have the chance to glimpse his face, in fact I believe he did not want me to see his face for he turned his head away as, and they passed, but I made up my mind he was a stranger in this city, so far as I could could see, he was in no uniform but dressed as a civilian..."

"Indeed that looks mighty suspicious I should say huh," declared Chatze positively. "That stranger is the spy I'll be bound according to my mind huh."

"It may have been that poor weak Hen has been cowed and bulldozed into doing the whole thing," suggested, ill Aggie, sagely.

"It seems strange how he could do such a thing after what Violet and her sister saw him do for him, and once when he was sick Jennie and Argeline sat up all night for him."

"Now I wonder if that could really be the case?" remarked Ted?

"Do you mean," said Toby "that you suspect it was the spy himself all along, and that he might have kidnapped Hen and wrote that note himself?"

"Most likely."

"We ought to get busy and do something right away Jennie," observed Toby Jones to her.

"I'm glad to know that's the way you boys really feel about it," continued Jennie. "This is a bad piece of business. I myself know all that Violet and her sisters had done for Hen, and once when Hen's father lost all his property during the Ablesannian war Violet and her sisters out of their own treasury restored everything for him and paid out of their own pocket the doctor bill for Hen's injured father. When Hen was sick with Scarlet Fever Argeline and Jennie nursed him the danger of catching it, sat up for him at night while their sisters took turns other nights. Argeline's possession no doubt preserved them from taking the fever. I don't know I can't make myself believe Hen did that. Surely if so it was an awful act of ingratitude and how must poor Violet and her sister feel. They must be broken hearted. But if it was only that second level who did it himself, and kidnapped the boy and slandered him well fix him. It is up to all the boy and girl scouts of the whole regiment of Vivianites to concert upon the mystery and find out the truly truth. But Oh God, pray the boy really is innocent. I had with the help of Violet and her sisters laid out a great scheme for a good thrilling outing for all of us to start this vacation since the fog is quiet but every thing must give way to making your comrades down, and learning the whole truth."

"Fully for you Jennie." ejaculated Lill Aggie, looking delighted. The others were almost as exuberant in their expressions of approval. Just a brief time before some of the number had been wondering what could be done to give them a short sojourn in the woods outside the city to begin with the vacation period, and hence a longcome this necessity calling to the other members of the Wolf Patrol to awaken and defend the honor of their organization.

"Here every one of you jump onto your horses" ordered Jennie Turner as she mounted her own horse.

"Are you meaning to go to Andre's house?" called out Landy Andy.

"Yes."

In another moment they were off and they were quickly at Andre's house. Fully covered by boys and girls scouts were in and around the house upon which such a sudden catastrophe had fallen, not the curiosity but all eager to find clues in which they could follow the runaway and the others. They talked among themselves, asked questions, examined the quarters not assigned by Hen, and shook their heads pityingly as they observed the white face of the good mother of Violet, and her sisters, who with Penrod and James were still at Maes and knew nothing of what had happened. Evans himself was there and he was rather rather a severe man and looked very angry, and kept calling the boy hard names as he told how Hen must have known the combination of the safe, and that after all Violet, and her sisters had done for him he should turn around and do them such a dirty trick.

"When they learn of this returning from Maes they won't be able to eat their late breakfast they'll be so upset" he said.

Jennie Turner and the others managed to see the convicting note. They were all of the same opinion as Landy, and agreed that no one but Hen could have ever written those fearful words.

"I would never have believed Hen was such a silly Ass," was what Lill Aggie remarked, after surveying the crooked writing, which of course he knew only too well. Then to the greater feeling of awe and sympathy Violet and her sisters and the prince and James were seen coming, James of course this time in the lead for he had been the first to see what this crowd in front of his house and wondering what was wrong.

"Attention" he commanded to every body outside and they obeyed at once for he was soon to be a prince too. Penrod and the little girls excitedly with fast beating hearts hurried up as James demanded;

"What happened here? What's wrong?"

"Your house had been robbed. Hen Conditer robbed your safe and stole all the important papers in it" said one of the girls scouts. But James knew no one by that name and asked;

"Whose Hen Conditer? There were no Hens in my place. How could a chicken rob my safe?"

"A boy scout by that name did it" she said.

He then was in the place first, commanding the others to step aside and went into the room where the safe stood wide open. Jennie Turner and the boys just mentioned followed. James examined what was left in his safe just as Penrod, and Violet and her sisters wide eyed came in.

"But how did he get the safe open?" demanded James. "Did he know its combination?"

I never gave it to him. Where my father, and my sisters that at they were not here. Am I the mess; the house not properly guarded and this to happen. Who was that boy any way?"

Most of those in the place never knew, but Jennie Turner came up to him and explained the whole situation, and Violet and her sisters hearing it couldn't believe their ears, but when they saw the note they were convinced and horrified.

"I'm sick!" said Vice Violet as suddenly dropping into her chair and covering her face with her hands. "This to happen and after all we did for the boy and his poor parents."

"Such light indignation" moaned Jennie. "This is a cruel blow to us the worst yet."

Jack Evans now tried to cheer them and most of the scouts were cleared out of the building except Jennie Turner and the four boys who had followed her. It was dreadfully hard for Violet and her sisters to gain control of themselves. Very few things hit them harder than uncertainty. But at they were more regretted at rick then angry, and Evans tried to convince them not to worry, for surely they knew that any one who does them a wrong never has any good luck afterwards. There were a few foreigners in the building, come to see merely from curiosity sake, but also more from sympathy and sorrow for the poor little girls, and they too tried to cheer the little girls by telling them they were such good little girls, and praising them as much as possible. After they had hung inside there for some time until the little girls were more like themselves again, and Jennie had asked all the questions of Jack Evans she could think of, she and the boy went outside on the veranda to talk it over.
